Zywicki put the dagger in the Hofstra hearts when he picked up a ground ball after a hectic scramble for the loose ball took a half-dozen players away from the cage, leaving Zywicki open in front of Southard to easily beat the Hofstra goalie to extend the lead to 11-7 with only 2:20 to play.

Morris added an empty-netter to cap off the day's scoring with 83 seconds to play.

"It was a really hard fought game," Cannella said. "I thought the guys persevered through a lot. We were fortunate to get up and Hofstra made a couple runs at us. It's a testament to our defense and how they played today... We're happy it was a team win, an overall win for us."

Hofstra got on the board with the first goal of the game, but UMass held its opposition scoreless over the next 15:53, while going on a 5-0 run with the help of Morris' first two goals.

The Pride answered with a three-goal run of their own to close the gap to 5-4 before UMass took control.

The Minutemen and Pride combined for 17 goals in Saturday's matchup after scoring only nine total during last season's meeting.

Minutemen manage rare win in 2005 by downing Niagra

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

When it goes into the record books for posterity, the Massachusetts hockey team's game against Niagara on Saturday will be little other than another result in another year.

Right now, though, the Minutemen will take a win, any win, and especially one that comes on the road.

Niagra	3

That's exactly what they got Saturday, when they beat the Purple Eagles 4-3 at Dwyer Arena in Niagara Falls, N.Y.

UMass improved to 12-20-2 with just its third road win of the season.

Niagara, which fell to 13-17-2, led by a goal midway through the game, but a pair of quick UMass tallies early in the third period provided the edge.

Tim Vitek, Stephen Werner, Zech Klann, and Marvin Degon each had goals for the Minutemen, and Degon added an assist in the team's first win in more than three weeks, a 3-1 victory over Merrimack on Feb. 5.

Degon's goal was the decisive score for the Minutemen, coming 2:55 into the third period off of assists by Kevin Jarman and Stephen Jacobs. Degon's ninth goal of the season came 1:39 after Klann opened the period with a go-ahead tally from Mark Matheson that broke a 2-2 tie.

The Minutemen earned that tie on a shorthanded goal from Werner, who scored unassisted with 1:11 to go in the period. Klann was in the box for hooking, serving one of UMass' eight penalties.

Seven of those penalties set up power plays for Niagara, which scored twice on the man advantage. That included Ryan Gale's goal 9:07 into the second period that gave the Purple Eagles a 2-1 lead, which lasted until Klann's equalizer.

Vitek got the Minutemen on the board early, scoring a goal from Degon's feed just 38 seconds into the game. The Minutemen have scored first in 12 of their games this season, and are 6-4-2 when they do so.

The Purple Eagles retaliated midway through the first with Andrew

Lackner's game-tying goal, which came on a power play after David Leaderer was sent off for tripping. Gale then added his man-advantage goal to take the lead, before the Minutemen responded.

UMass has two more games left in its regular season schedule, both against Northeastern. The Minutemen, who at 5-15-2 in Hockey East, are in eighth place, two points behind Providence.

Though they have clinched a playoff spot, the Minutemen would have a chance to change their destination for the conference quarterfinals when they play sixth-place Northeastern. If the season were to end today, UMass would visit No. 1 UNH, though just four points separate the Wildcats from fourth-place Maine.

up, then his two free throws after Temple's Antywane Marshall hit a three-pointer between possessions.

Freeman led all Minutemen scorers with 13 points. Freeman also grabbed seven boards in the contest, but it was not enough to spark an second-half offense against Temple's zone.

After Freeman's second free throw of the half, the wheels seemed to fall off for UMass. The Owls came down the court, set up its offense but could not find the basket. It was this possession, however, that exhibited just how proficient Temple's offensive rebound was.

Temple had eight offensive rebounds as it would go on to miss every one of its shot, including four three-pointers. The Minutemen eventually recovered the ball off Maurice Maxwell rebound, but it was clear that the Owls were in command.

"Eventually you are either going to let people keep getting rebounds or let them get lay-ups after awhile. I thought the game was a very physical game and I don't know why it was allowed to be that way."

The Minutemen would get as close as five points away before the Owls blew the doors open. Temple's Mark Tyndale received a full-court pass from Collins and dunked the ball home. In the ensuing possession Maurice Maxwell missed a three which was reeled in by Robinson.

Temple's freshman sharpshooter, DaShone Kirkendoll, received the ball off of Temple's next offensive set and drilled a three, putting the score at 45-35.

"We want to see kids that are bouncing back from a tough situation in a positive way; hustling and scrapping and I thought they did," Temple's interim coach Dan Leibovitz said.

The first half saw the Minutemen jump out to a 22-11 lead on a three-pointer by senior captain Anthony Anderson with 8:14 left in the half. Anderson had six points on the night on two threes.

The six points were the first Anderson has scored since he scored four in UMass' 63-56 loss to Fordham on Feb. 12. Lappas was pleased with the way Anderson played, but realizes that he is still recovering.

After the shot, the Maroon and White were outscored 15-3 as Temple gained its second and final lead of the game.

NOTES: Chaney was suspended for the rest of the regular season for his actions against Saint Joseph's on Feb. 22. Chaney's only other suspension came in 1994 after he threatened then-UMass coach John Calipari in a press conference. He was suspended for one game... Saturday's game was the first time all season that the entire UMass team dressed.

was good. Its hard to get a sense of the defense during practices because grounding a ball indoors is a lot different than doing it outside on the ground."

In the following two games, UMass was outscored nine runs to two in the final games of the weekend, with losses to Nebraska 3-1 and South Carolina 6-1, respectively.

Against ranked Nebraska, Proctor had another impressive showing. Recording the second RBI of her career, Proctor gave the team the only point of the game. While scoring was low, hitting wasn't, with senior Pam Sulick, junior Kristi Stefanoni and sophomore Candice Molinari all singling in the second inning, but none of them were run in.

Defensively, junior Jenna Busa made her debut start in the tournament. She posted three runs, seven hits and three walks, and was able to get out of a jam in the bottom of the first inning with bases loaded.

The second game was a loss to South Carolina in which the first hit came in the top of the sixth inning by Stefanoni, which later led to the only score of the game that Molinari drove in. South Carolina pulled ahead from there, winning 6-1. LaFogg gave up five runs, eight hits and three walks in the Minutemen's third loss of the tournament.

On the final day of play, UMass led San Diego State 5-1, but due to downpours, the game was canceled and consequently, did not count.

Minutemen off on the right foot with win over Hofstra

BY JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — Following last season, a season mired by injuries and mediocrity, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team launched its 2005 campaign with a solid effort, knocking down No. 25 Hofstra 12-7 at Shuart Stadium on Saturday.

UMass returns to action during its home opener at Garber Field against Yale this Saturday at 1 p.m.

Hofstra	7

With a bitter taste in their mouth and a chip on their shoulder from a 7-7 record last year, the No. 15 Minutemen (1-0) wanted to start the season off with a complete, group effort to take down the rival Pride (0-1).

And that is just what happened in front of 1,170 fans who braved through stretches of snow, occasional sunlight, clouds and strong winds during the day.

The Minutemen played brutal, airtight defense all game, deflecting and altering shots so only a seldom few even made it to goalie Bill Schell, who didn't have to make a save all game due to Hofstra's limited opportunities.

"Our defense played real well," attacker Jeff Zywicki said. "We had a game plan all week, and they pretty much executed it perfectly... Our defense didn't let down. They played tough all the way through, and they played real well."

Zywicki and fellow attacker Sean Morris led the way for the Massachusetts offense that remained steady throughout the day.

Morris charged the attack with a career-high four goals, three of which came in the second quarter, and one assist to tie his career high in points.

"We knew we had to be more physical and outplay them and out scrap them," Morris said. "Fortunately, we did that. We got ground balls, and I was on the tail-end of a couple goals that kids just made good plays on so it was a great team effort, and we earned the win today."

Zywicki scored three goals and added a pair of assists in his first game since Feb. 28, 2004, in UMass' 12-7 loss to North Carolina. The redshirt senior suffered a back injury in the first half of what was the first game of the Maroon and White's season and could never make it back to the field.

"It was awesome," Zywicki said with a gleaming smile on his face. "It felt so good to come back and play. It was a rough 2004, the whole year pretty much not playing anything at all, and it just felt great to be out there with all these guys and especially to get the win."

The Minutemen clearly missed Zywicki's talent on the field last year, as he boasted a team-leading line of 41 goals and 21 assists for 62 points.

"You kind of expect that from Jeff," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "He had his opportunities and finished them so we're happy to see that. He's an outstanding player."

In a game of goal-scoring runs, the Minutemen started their most important one with a 5-4 advantage in the second quarter.

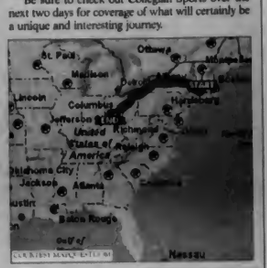
NOTICE: Special Collegian feature begins tomorrow

It's the trip they never thought they would make, the game they never thought they would see and a drive unlike any they've ever been on. But in the end not only are they going to do it, they're going to take you, the reader, along with them for the most grueling, ruthless and physically draining road trip in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

As the focus of a two-day Collegian Sports feature on road trips in sports, veteran men's basketball beat reporters Mike Marzelli and Bob McGovern will leave with their photographer for Dayton, Ohio at midnight tonight to cover the Minutemen in their final road game of the 2004-05 regular season; a 7 p.m. tip-off tomorrow at the University of Dayton Arena. Following the game, they will immediately return to Amherst to complete a sleep-deprived, 1,600-mile stretch of 24 driving hours within a 36-hour span.



As is the case with any solid, reputable journalists, they will be armed only with the bare essentials: a laptop, a tape recorder, a notebook and pens and, of course, plenty of sports to talk about. Their assignment: to provide you, the readers of the Collegian, with a detailed, running blog of what life on the road as a collegiate sports journalist is truly like during the trip, and what goes through the mind of this campus' foremost UMass basketball experts when there is no escaping the confines of a rental car.

Call it the Collegian's own version of a true-life reality show; an entertaining, scattered, raw and hilarious account of a trip no journalist should ever have to make that will undoubtedly be nothing more than brutally real and painfully honest.

To preface coverage of the trip, the Collegian will feature a special sports section tomorrow dedicated to the road trip, including various staff members' own stories of life behind the wheel, an online reader poll to predict when you think the pair will arrive in Dayton, as well as in-depth profiles and statistics detailing Mike & Bob's illustrious careers and the intense season they've spent together covering Steve Lappas' Minutemen.

Following the game, Mike & Bob's blog, photos from the trip and account of the game will be filed directly from Ohio, and will appear in full color in the Collegian on Wednesday.

Be sure to check out Collegian Sports over the next two days for coverage of what will certainly be a unique and interesting journey.

UMass falls at Temple

BY BOB MCGOVERN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

PHILADELPHIA - Even without their legendary head coach, John Chaney, on the sidelines, the Temple Owls (14-11 10-4 Atlantic 10) were able to shut down the Massachusetts men's basketball team with the very zone that their missing mentor created.

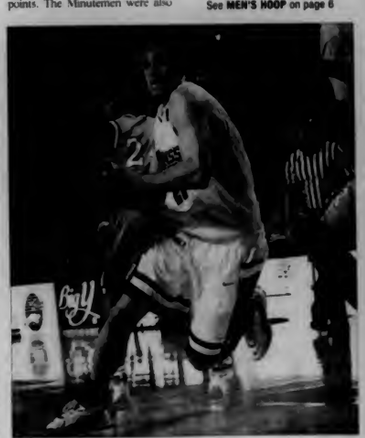
UMass	48

The Owls were able to survive an early offensive barrage from the Minutemen (15-10 8-6 A-10) and left the Liacouras Center with a 61-48 victory and sole possession of second place in the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division. The Minutemen have been swept by both Saint Joseph's and Temple this season, who are in first and second in the division, respectively.

The Maroon and White return to action tomorrow at 7 p.m. as it travels west to Dayton, Ohio to take on the Dayton Flyers.

The Minutemen were unable to contain the constant offensive attack from Temple's Mardy Collins, who had a game-high 25 points. Collins also had nine rebounds, three assists, and five steals on the evening.



Seven of Collins' nine rebounds were on offense, a facet of the game that the Owls dominated throughout the contest. Temple out rebounded the Minutemen 45-27, including a lopsided 28-7 effort on the offensive glass.

"Pretty easy game to decipher what happened, you don't even have to look at the stat sheet." UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "Obviously the offensive rebounding was ridiculous and that's what happens."

The discrepancy in the rebounding column led to a lopsided 21-4 differential in second-chance points. The Minutemen were also outscored 18-5 on turnovers.

The Owls led 29-25 at the break, but UMass' star power forward, Rashaun Freeman, came cruising out of the gates. He scored the first points of the half on a lay-

Rams close out UM

BY BRENDAN HALL

KINGSTON, R.I. - Coming into yesterday's season finale, the Massachusetts women's basketball team had thoughts of vengeance on its mind and hopes of crashing the Rhode Island Rams' party. After all, it was senior day, as well as the 30th anniversary of the URI program's birth.

While they did their best in the early on to contain freshman Safi Mojidi, the guard that torched them two weeks ago, it was the stellar play of forward Tanya Rhodes that ultimately sank the Minutewomen (13-14, 6-10 Atlantic 10), as the Rams (18-9, 6-10 A-10) cruised to a 59-53 defeat of the Maroon and White before a crowd of 2,013.

"Mojidi was a tough one to handle, but ultimately Rhodes did us in," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "They [the Rams] just physically manhandled us today."

Brooke Campbell nearly matched her career high with 13 rebounds yesterday at Rhode Island.

Rhodes had the game-high 18 points to go with seven rebounds. Aussie forward Peta Kneen also chipped in with 11, complemented by five assists and two steals.

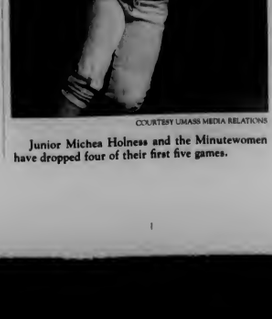
Tamara Tatham led UMass in scoring with 17, while freshman Pam Rosanio racked up a career-high nine rebounds to go along with an 11-point day. Brooke Campbell almost matched career-high in the final regular season game of her college career, taking down 13 boards — just one shy of her career high.

With the loss, the Minutewomen will endure their sixth straight losing season, with their last winning season coming in the 1998-99 campaign. They also lose the number two seed in the A-10 East and instead drop to the No. 3 seed in the division. They will face A-10 West No. 6 seed Duquesne this Friday at 2:00 PM in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Although it out rebounded the Rams and were physically bigger, the Maroon and White had trouble standing tall against Tom Garrick's press defense. Even though the Rams are notorious for their press, URI made several switches in their zone defense to confuse UMass, yielding some easy baskets.

The Minutewomen had the upper hand early on and throughout a good chunk of the first half, leading by as much as five with 7:27 remaining in the half, courtesy of a handful of foul shots and some inside presence from Kate Mills and Patrycja Gulak, who made her first start at center since she was pulled from the lineup against St. Bonaventure on Feb. 6.

URI then proceeded to go on a tear in the remaining seven minutes of the first half, blazing out a 17-2 run to take the lead for good. Fan favorite Katie Stailings, noted for her selflessness on defense, pleased the crowd with an over-the-table dive and then immediately drawing a charge.



On 3-pointers by Katie Nelson and Rosanio, the Minutewomen closed the gap to four with four minutes to go. A questionable charge call minutes later on Mills, however, gave the ball back to the Rams, and the Maroon and White were again forced to dig deep.

Rosanio and Kneen were both given technical fouls with one minute to go after Kneen dealt a harsh elbow to Rosanio at center court, reeling her backwards. Nelson hit a long 2-point shot to make a two-possession game again with 30 seconds to go, but the Minutewomen were forced into a late-game fouling strategy.

Last weekend, the Massachusetts softball team (1-4) faced four teams at the NFCA Leadoff Classic, but managed only one win. The Minutewomen, who faced two nationally ranked teams (No. 16 Georgia and No. 17 Nebraska), traveled to Columbus, Georgia in a tournament that was cut short by rain.

Junior Michea Holness and the Minutewomen have dropped four of their first five games.

The Maroon and White return to action this weekend at the FAU Worth Invitational in Boca Raton, Florida.

"I thought we did real well. I was real pleased with how they played," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said.

The weekend began on Friday against host and nationally recognized Georgia. Against the No. 16 team in the nation, UMass played the game back-and-forth, keeping the game close and losing by one run. At one point during the contest, UMass led 3-1 thanks to the offensive efforts of junior KJ Kelley and senior Hillary Puglia, who both had RBI's.

The second inning featured freshman Lauren Proctor, who locked up her very first hit and RBI for the Minutewomen, driving in junior Lesley Ferrara to tie it up. Sortino was impressed with the play of the newcomers, with Proctor and fellow rookie Sarah Hurd getting their feet wet.

"Without a doubt they both had great weekends," Sortino said. "They're gonna have great futures here."

Coming off its second loss of the season, UMass delivered in the second half of the double-header on Friday, facing Cal State Northridge. Senior pitcher Barb LaFogg had a career day, striking out 14 batters and posting the Minutewomen's first victory of the season. This marks the most batters that LaFogg has ever struck out in a single game, she also allowed four hits and two walks. Offensively, Kelly and Puglia had another big game, both hitting doubles that led to scoring.

"Barb had a tremendous weekend, striking out 14 batters," Sortino said. "I thought our defense

Food scares may mean poor risk management

By KIM SEYMOUR
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Julie A. Caswell, a University of Massachusetts professor of resource economics, spoke last night at the Mullins Center for the third of four Distinguished Faculty Lectures focusing on food scares and risk assessment in the United States.

Caswell spent the majority of the lecture, titled "A Food-Scare a Day: Why Aren't We Better at Managing Dietary Risks" focusing on the federal government's poor handling of risk management.

"Does the fact that we have food-scares indicate bad risk management?" Caswell asked. "Not necessarily, but in some cases the risk management has been inadequate."

Caswell took the three main components of risk assessment and compared them to different types of vehicles to explain what each one is lacking. The first part is the risk assessment itself, which according to Caswell, is comparable to a Hummer.

"Expensive," she said. "It has a very narrow, very bright light on the risks. We can't manage risks well across the board without knowing about the other risks that aren't being focused on."

The next part is risk management. Caswell emphasized this area needs much improvement, comparing it to a small car from the 1980's that is no longer on the market.

"Under built," she said. "Cheap, could break down at any time. This is questionable protection. It's not up to Hummer standards."

The last component is risk communication, which she compared to a tricycle.

"You would not want to take this on the highway," said Caswell. "There is an imbalance of effort in the three areas."

Caswell spent the majority of the lecture focusing on the 2003 Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy (BSE) or Mad Cow disease scare in the U.S. She said the government made a "do nothing" decision when it came to the problem.

"They used the do no-thing decision, hoping against hope that those mad cows would not show up," she joked.

It was not until a case of the disease appeared in Canada in 2003 that the U.S. government took any preventative action by closing its borders and by that time, it was basically too late, Caswell said. Within the year, the first case of Mad Cow had made its way into the U.S.

"The entire North American trade closed," she said. "NAFTA (North American Free Trade Agreement) disintegrated. No one did anything to manage the trade risk if mad cow showed up."

Chris Hedges speaks to packed crowd

By ANDY PARADIES
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Christopher Hedges, war correspondent and award winning author of "War Is a Force That Gives Us Meaning" spoke at the Fine Arts Center on Thursday evening.

A veteran speaker of the college scene, Hedges has spoken at many universities such as Harvard, Yale, Columbia, and NYU. His speech lasted for a little over the course of an hour, and was followed by a question and answer session with the audience. The topic of his speech, as one may have figured from the title of his book, was war.

As many in the audience may have felt, perhaps from all of his time surrounding death, Hedges was somewhat subdued in the delivery of his speech at UMass. His speech, much like his book focused primarily on his personal experiences from his fifteen years covering conflicts ranging from Central America, to the Balkans, and the Middle East. Additionally, he was a part of the team on The New York Times that won the Pulitzer Prize in 2002 for Explanatory Reporting on global terrorism.

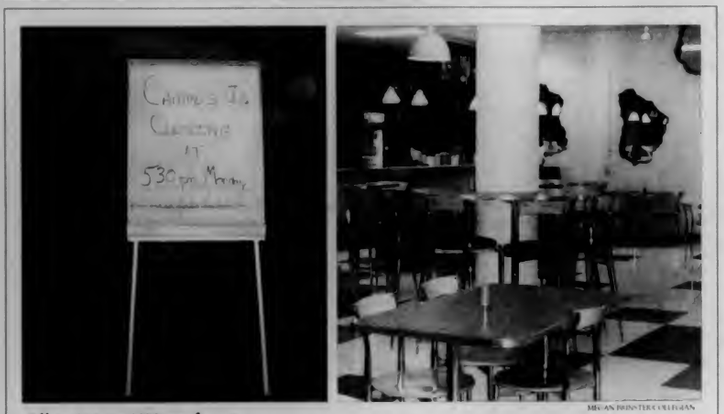
Hedges said, "I have spent most of my adult life in war." From his knowledge of literature and personal experience, Hedges discussed both personal and literary examples to describe his theory on the "myths" of war.

According to Hedges, those who wage war have to first create a story of them and us. War can only be fought once the enemy has been dehumanized and "objectified." For this reason, Hedges advocates journalist objectivity, citing that both sides of each conflict need to be reported fairly. He admits that that his own profession propagates war, and said, "In war, the press is always part of the problem."

In his speech, he explained that to an outside audience, war is somewhat incomprehensible. Wars are not fought for the cause, but for the comradeship that develops between the combatants who face death daily.

He spoke against the dichotomy between the reality of war and the perception civilians are given through the media. According to Hedges, the news, while purported to be unbiased, has often already taken sides.

One example he gave was that a reporter being kept safe by the US military is likely to have a pro-US military stance in reporting. The reality of such a statement, while difficult to evaluate, may be true. He also spent a large portion of his speech discussing the role of media in public perception of war. Hedges substantiated that war is not the heroics familiar from film and television, but much more horrific, and much more grotesque.



From his use of literary references, one might have guessed, Hedges is a scholar himself. He received his bachelors of arts in English literature from Colgate University, and his master of divinity from Harvard University where he was a Nieman Fellow.

His speech referenced the literature of combat from the obscure such as Catullus, the Roman lyric poet, to the well known Shakespeare and Erich Maria Remarque, author of "All Quiet On The Western Front." In each case, he chose works that exemplified the role of myths of war within literature dating back to ancient times.

Winter storm to blast East Coast

By WAYNE PARRY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEWARK, N.J. — Highway crews spread salt on roads and schools gave students an unplanned holiday Monday as a storm plowed along the East Coast with a threat of more than a foot of blowing snow.

Storm watches and warnings were posted as far north as Maine and snow coated roads as far south as North Carolina and eastern Kentucky.

"No! No, no, no! I'm ready for it to be hot out. I'm tired of the cold already," said Shajuan Carter of Irvington as she waited at Newark's Penn Station for a train into New York City.

Six to 10 inches of snow was likely in the New York City area by the time the storm lets up Tuesday morning, with 14 inches possible in northwestern New Jersey and the Poconos of northeastern Pennsylvania, and up to 2 feet in the mountains of West Virginia, the National Weather Service said. Eight inches was possible in Boston.

Ten inches had fallen by afternoon at North Carolina's Mount Mitchell, and more than 8 inches was on the ground in western Virginia, where police blamed the weather for 100 traffic accidents. "By far, for us, this is the biggest snowstorm we've had," said Chuck Lionberger, a spokesman for the Virginia Department of Transportation.

Afternoon arrivals at Newark Liberty International Airport were delayed up to three hours, although planes were still taking off on time.

Schools were also closed from Kentucky to Pennsylvania because of slippery roads or in anticipation of worsening weather, and others decided to send students home early.

For New Jersey, the storm arrived just five days after one that

Calogero emphasizes healthy exercising

By JOHN O'NEILL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Rachel Calogero, an exercise psychologist from Syracuse University, held a presentation entitled "Developing a Sane Approach to Exercise" last Thursday in the Campus Center. Her primary focus was the exercise abuse and eating disorders that stem from people's dissatisfactions with themselves and their bodies.

"Abusive mindsets begin with who we take as our role models," said Calogero. "They could be celebrities, models, peers, parents, coaches, or even people at the gym."

The "abusive mindset" she speaks of refers to the fabrications instilled in people through such media outlets as television and magazines. Viewers are immersed in countless depictions of beautiful men and women, hired to sell a product at the expense of its customers' self-esteem. This causes people to set impossibly high standards for themselves.

Suddenly, these celebrities, models, or people at the gym become their goals; they are brainwashed to believe that a person cannot be happy unless they look like these "role models". These misconceptions are the primary causes of unhealthy exercise and eating disorders.

According to Calogero, exercise abuse is defined as "the excessive, rigid, and obsessive use of exercise as a means for weight loss" People suffering from exercise abuse are often malnourished and dehydrated, ignore signs of fatigue, pain, or sickness during their workout, and allow exercising to take precedence over all other experiences in their lives.

Other symptoms include using exercise as a primary method for regulating emotions and stress, and having feelings of guilt, anxiety, or depression if the person misses a workout. Most importantly, they use exercise as a means for losing weight rather than using it the way it is intended: to become fit.

The most common danger of exercise abuse is the development of eating disorders such as anorexia, bulimia, or binge eating. Other noted hazards include stress fractures, permanent injuries, and osteoporosis. They become obsessed with exercising to the point when they put themselves in isolation from their friends, family, or other pleasurable activities because they foster shame or guilt if they cannot work out. However, as Calogero notes, the

Ex-police commissioner found guilty

By ADAM GORLICK
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SPRINGFIELD — A former Springfield police commissioner was found guilty Monday of stealing thousands of dollars from a city-run job training school he once directed.

Gerald Phillips, 50, was acquitted of threatening a witness who testified against him.

The verdicts in U.S. District Court came five weeks after prosecutors put Phillips and three other public officials from the Massachusetts Career Development Institute on trial for charges they schemed to steal money from the agency and then sought to cover their tracks.

The jury had deliberated for about 17 hours over three days before reaching the verdict.

The trial's testimony touched on some lurid allegations that Phillips set up no-show jobs for some MCDI students in exchange for sex. But Phillips was never charged with any sex crimes, and the basis of the case was that he and the other defendants conspired to defraud the government of money, largely by submitting phony time sheets.

Three other former MCDI employees — Giuseppe Polimeni, Luisa Cardaropoli and Jamie Dwyer — on trial with Phillips were convicted of pulling off the scam and planning a cover up.

The four defendants faced maximum prison sentences ranging from 50 to 100 years, but federal sentences could be adjusted by a judge who must weigh a variety of factors.

Lawyers for all four defendants said their clients never stole any money from MCDI, which offers job training classes to mostly low-income students.

But prosecutors painted a different picture of four cronies who bilked the agency out of nearly $50,000 and lied about doing anything wrong.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Welch said Phillips took a shine to Gretchen Ortiz, a young MCDI student with two children and no apartment in 2000. Phillips gave Ortiz a $500 loan from MCDI — which prosecutors say was never fully paid back — and she used that money to rent an apartment in a building owned by Phillips' brother.

Prosecutors say Phillips then gave Ortiz a job as a muffin wrapper in MCDI's bakery division, which sold food through a federally funded program to the Springfield school department. Welch said Phillips soon told Ortiz she didn't have to show up at work, but made sure paychecks were being issued in her name.

However, Phillips intercepted those paychecks and cashed them so he could use the money to pay her rent, utility and grocery bills, Welch said.

In return, Welch said, Phillips received sex from Ortiz.

"Her payroll checks financed his desire for sex at no cost to him," Welch said during his closing arguments.

But Phillips' lawyer, David Hoose, said his client was managing Ortiz's money because she couldn't do it herself. He said the two developed a relationship because Phillips wanted to help Ortiz take care of her children. He said the two only had sex twice.

most overlooked problem is the mental anguish from which these people suffer. They are constantly comparing themselves to everybody, whether they are movie stars, classmates, or co-workers, and these comparisons take a toll on the person's self-esteem and identity. Overall, it reduces the quality of life and limits healthy productivity.

Calogero then drew her focus on athletes with the same problems. "Many athletes assume their identity as an athlete and face direct pressures to change their body type," she said. Many athletes suffer from exercise abuse and eating disorders, but they are most common in sports that require its athletes to maintain a certain weight, such as gymnastics, swimming, wrestling, or lightweight crew. Calogero asserted that since many athletes define themselves by their sports, they attempt to fit its body stereotype. And whether intentional or not, these behaviors are most often encouraged by peers, parents, and coaches.

"Unhealthy behavior can be encouraged by a simple statement as 'You look good. Have you lost weight?'" informs Calogero. "Try to compliment people without referring to their physical qualities."

"Healthy exercise should rejuvenate the body and enrich the mind," said Calogero, "as well as increase mind-body coordination and connection." She advocated the use of weights and strength training as a part of the workout regimen. After specifying that weights will not make a person huge, contrary to popular belief, Calogero recommended using a variety of exercises to become fit, including walking, jumping rope, and yoga.

"Yoga is wonderful," she said. "Stretching, balance, and flexibility are all equally as important as strength in a workout regimen." Before opening up to questions, Calogero encouraged the audience to challenge the "abusive mindset". She reiterated that healthy exercise has nothing to do with weight loss and suggested that people reframe their goals and identify healthier role models. "Perhaps even become your own role model," proposed Calogero, "and in doing so, become the healthy role models of others."

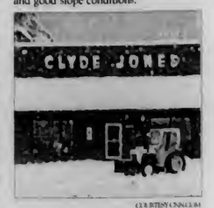
dumped nearly 8 inches on parts of the state.

The Taylor Rental Center in Mount Laurel had been getting calls since Saturday checking the availability of backhoes and other snow-removal equipment at a rate of $263 for eight hours, manager Chuck Hudson said.

"Everything else stops when it snows and whenever there's snow on the ground," he said.



The storm was expected to drop 8 to 12 inches on parts of Vermont, which could be enough to hamper Tuesday's annual town meetings, the staple of local government in the region.

If only a few people are able to show up to conduct a town's business, the moderator and town officials can specify a date to reconvene and then adjourn, said Vermont Secretary of State Deb Markowitz.

The snow was wet and heavy in parts of North Carolina, causing power line breaks that blacked out more than 11,000 customers, utilities said.

But in North Carolina's western mountains, the snowy weather was welcomed.

"This is sort of the winter we haven't been having," said Brad Moretz, general manager of Appalachian Ski Mountain. "March will exceed our expectations. This weekend we'll have good weather and good slope conditions."

U.S. to better assess the situation on three main factors: risk communication being inadequate; fear of a national food-scare; and with the closing of the U.S. borders, the federal government had a false sense of doing something rather than ignoring the problem altogether.

She also touched on Dioxin, a man-made product placed into animal feed. Caswell said there is a concentration of Dioxin in animal fat and the long term risks and effects on humans who consume fatty meat have yet to be discovered.

"How do we offset the risks?" she asked.

Caswell said researchers need to use science to do predictive modeling to find out how the risk is being created and how it's transmitted but also use economists and social scientists to look at the cost.

The last portion of her lecture focused on answering the question of how to be better at managing dietary risks.

"We need to do a better job with risk management so we don't hit a tipping point where regulations are placed on an emergency basis," said Caswell. "There are also everyday risks, like food-borne pathogens and over nutrition (overeating)."

Caswell said one of the ways consumers can lower their own personal risks is to pay attention to dietary and food safety guidelines.

"We do have a pretty safe food supply," Caswell said in closing. "But for us to really feel confident about our food supply in the U.S. we would really require better risk management so we don't have a food scare a day."

Michael Jackson trial begins

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. — Michael Jackson's child molestation trial began Monday with a prosecutor saying the pop star repeatedly groped a young cancer patient, and one of his associates threatened to kill the boy's mother if he told anyone.

District Attorney Thomas Sneddon said the 15-year-old accuser will testify about how Jackson showed him sexually explicit material and molested him.

"[He] will describe to you his sexual experiences with Michael Jackson. He will do it here in open court and he will do it with the whole world watching," Sneddon said.

Jackson sat still as a statue with one hand pressed against his cheek as Sneddon outlined a complicated and sometimes bizarre story of a conspiracy in which he claimed several of Jackson's associates participated.

In the front row of the courtroom, Jackson's mother, Katharine, sat beside her son Jermaine. They were the only Jackson family members present.

Jackson, 46, is charged with molesting the then-13-year-old cancer patient at his Neverland ranch in 2003, plying him with alcohol and conspiring to hold him and his family captive.

The defense opening statement was to follow the prosecution's presentation.

The defense has cast Jackson as the target of a money-hungry mother who coached her son to spin stories when it looked like their celebrity benefactor would cut them off. The defense will present evidence that the mother has sued others in the past claiming abuse.

Sneddon told the jury that Jackson had intended to use the boy as part of a comeback attempt by discussing in a television documentary how the singer helped him through his cancer.

Before the interview with documentary maker Martin Bashir in 2002, Jackson privately told the boy what to say when he was in front of the camera, Sneddon said.

But when the February 2003 TV documentary "Living With Michael Jackson," aired, showing the pop star holding hands with the boy and saying he allows children to sleep in his bed, "Jackson's world was rocked," Sneddon said.

He said one of co-conspirators described the airing as "a train wreck" and Jackson's associates began a bid to keep the family from seeing the video and to get their help in a public relations campaign to rebut it.

But the prosecutor said Jackson began molesting the boy a short time later.

Sneddon said Jackson told the boy that masturbation was normal, then reached into the boy's underpants and masturbated the boy and himself. The second event occurred the same way, Sneddon said, but Jackson tried to move the boy's arm toward his own genitals and the boy resisted.

Pop sensation Michael Jackson waves to fans as he enters a California courthouse. Jackson is accused of child molestation.

Silenced screams of relativity

Yousef Munayyer

Last week a suicide bomber outside of a nightclub in Tel Aviv killed five people and injured many others. There was no shortage of reporting devoted to this event. In fact in many of the news stories printed in the mainstream papers in the United States we can read about the victims, their families, their lives. The victims are shown in a very human light just as innocents who are killed should be portrayed.

We also here about how this "shocking" event "shattered" a cease fire and broke months of "relative calm" since the last suicide bomb in November. This is the politics meeting print. You see, I was not shocked by this event; I had already considered the cease-fire shattered, and I found no calm at all. What you do not read about, what is not presented by the mainstream media is that during this period, which one newspaper called a "lull," 170 Palestinians were killed. Of these Palestinians there were men, women and children. It is sickening that the death of 170 Palestinians constitutes relative calm but the death of 4 Israelis is shocking. How on Earth is this relative and where is the calm?

For every child that dies, for every unheard scream, we must scream louder and speak out about the atrocities which are not being covered and are consciously ignored as "relative calm."

Perhaps the media looked at the death of Alaa Samara, 14, who was shot last November for throwing stones, and saw calm as the Israeli bullet which hit him in the head left his brains oozing out onto the ground.

Perhaps the media looked at the death of little Burham al-Himouni, 3 years old, and saw calm when a missile fired from and Israeli apache helicopter ended the child's life. Too helpless to scream the child must have died silently, but how can this be calm? For every child that dies, for every unheard scream, we must scream louder and speak out about the atrocities that are not being covered and are consciously being ignored as "relative calm." These theories of relativity are sickening.

Maybe they saw calm in the killing of Salah-id-din Abu Iqab, 13, who was shot in the back while playing in the street. As the blood poured out of his back there could have been a calm look in his eyes, a sign of relief that he had finally escaped the prison of his life. The crime is we will never know because no one wants to write about him, no one cares for the wretched of the earth, they are left to fight alone, they are left to die alone.

I could go on and on with name after name, victim after victim, and I doubt that would even get the point across. The bias in the media is so prevalent that telling the truth becomes and uphill battle.

The deaths are just the beginning. Aside from those who die there are the injured. Many of these civilians will be maimed for life. Could we ever perceive calm being in the heart of a now legless child as he watches his former teammates playing a soccer game in a Gazan street? Does this sound like a lull to anyone? Or is it relatively calm because it has been a while since Israelis have been killed?

The New York Times, The Chicago Sun Times and the Los Angles Times all share the same disease. The all value one peoples' humanity over the other. When four Israelis die it's the shocking end to a relative calm. Yet that period which they call calm brought the death of 170 Palestinians all of which were discarded in the same papers as nameless individuals reported on in blurbs somewhere on the 15th page of the section.

This is not a rare occurrence either, in fact it's a common trend. There was other periods designated by the American press as "relative clam" or "lulls" which in fact where just the opposite. In the fall of 2003 another one of these periods where declared in the papers to be periods of "relative calm". During this times 120 Palestinians where killed.

Omar Muhammad al-Kernawi, 11 years old, may have been calm. On his way to the hospital, suffering from an Israeli bullet, he may have thought the end is near, he may have stopped crying. I wonder sometimes if Palestinians shot by Israeli bullets knew that there screams would not be heard would they scream at all? The pain does not cease and a bullet never fails to shatter calm. Yet if a Palestinian screams, and there are no western ears to hear it, does it really make a sound?

Author Chris Hedges on war

Mike Sances

I had hoped that Chris Hedges, when he spoke at the Fine Arts Center last Thursday night, would be giving a talk about recent developments in Iraq or American jingoism since his book, "War Is a Force that Gives Us Meaning", was first published two years ago. Instead, he essentially (re)read the book to the audience, at times reciting entire passages word for word.

This fact was easily forgiven, however, if only because of the veteran war correspondent's pathetic, death-haunted demeanor: Hedges gave his talk with all the sincerity of a preacher delivering his own eulogy. Yet the repetition was even more understandable when considering that Mr. Hedges's book is an entirely self-contained, inward looking piece of literature that tells us virtually nothing about our own lives. In fact, I'd argue that even the little that it does tell us is either useless or, worse, counterproductive.

No, I speak not of the allegedly "anti-American" and "anti-Israel" passages that have inspired most of the book's criticism. Indeed, that these are the only controversies the book has touched off speaks I think to War's major weakness, that is its ultimate failure to challenge us to take responsibility for our own actions. Readings Hedges, one can only be left with the impression that all the evils of war are carried out not by individuals, armies, or even states, but are instead the consequence of some ethereal three-letter concept that answers to no one and under which we as human beings are utterly powerless.

We are, according to the fatalistic worldview contained in War Is a Force, forever at the mercy of our nature, from which springs the historically inevitable act of warfare. Coming from a book that sets itself up in opposition to war, the inherent sense of surrender in this attitude is more than a little confusing. It also, once again, implies nothing. Let us assume that war is inevitable — perhaps, even, in our very DNA. Have we then freed ourselves from speaking out against or working to terminate those wars that we oppose?

The question has no bearing on reality; on the contrary, it is like much of the book a kind of propaganda, serving only to entangle our minds in poetic sophistries while immobilizing us from taking action in the real world. This is the same world in which our country has murdered tens of thousands of innocent Iraqis over the past two years, has doubled the numbers of starving children in that country since we invaded, is systematically engaged in the torture and indefinite detention of persons in the name of "fighting terror," and long ago ceased even making the slightest reference to pursuing those actually responsible for the attacks of September 11, 2001. Yes, that world. You remember, don't you?

That we would honestly need someone to remind us that, in essence, "war is bad" is a very ominous sign of the times...

But even granting all of the premises necessary for these criticisms is going too far; the simple act of opening Hedges's book, of engaging in a discussion with the author on "why war is bad," is in itself a sort of crime against humanity. For that war is horrible beyond words should already be a truism for all of us. And so I'm not quite sure who the author could possibly be arguing against — except, perhaps, his own war-ravaged soul.

As an autobiographical account of one man's personal experiences covering war, Hedges's book might then have some value. The problem is that it's widely being read as a definitive psychological diagnosis of the human race as a whole — or even worse, as a form of protest against the war in Iraq.

That we would honestly need someone to remind us that, in essence, "war is bad" is a very ominous sign of the times: but the utter sense of moral irresponsibility carried throughout War's pages, if heeded, will serve only to heighten your sense of foreboding. But if you are so depraved that you need this sort of wakeup call, be advised that little of this book is concerned actually with killings on the battlefield—in fact a sizeable chunk of it deals with social corollaries like drug use, pornography, alienation, and, yes, even the dreaded scourge of lesbianism.

Personally, I would have preferred it were Ward Churchill standing at that podium Thursday night denouncing us all as the moral equivalents of Adolph Eichmann — at least then we might be stirred into thinking critically about our roles in the world. But that's just me.

A worthy snub on Oscar night

Zach Oelschlegel

Oscar night always has its snubs, losers, and deserving winners. As seemingly the entire "Million Dollar Baby" cast walked away with an award of some kind, many would argue there was one big snub not on hand for the night. The most rabid and obnoxious George Bush hating American, Michael Moore, wasn't nominated for an Oscar despite producing the most successful documentary of all time, "Fahrenheit 9/11."

A lot of people are pretty ticked off at how Moore wasn't nominated for Best Picture, even though he was virtually guaranteed an Oscar if he had entered Fahrenheit 9/11 under a documentary. Moore has had wide acclaim for his movie, as 9/11 won Best Film at the Cannes Film Festival back in May, and last month was the People's Choice for Best Picture.

Michael Moore didn't really swing as many people to his side, as much as solidifying the ones already there.

I finally saw the movie two months ago, and had a blast watching it. There is no doubt Michael Moore is an excellent filmmaker, entertaining audiences for a while now. The Academy was completely correct, however, to deny Moore the opportunity to win the Best Picture award, largely due to the blatantly wrong facts and misleading insinuations characterizing Fahrenheit 9/11. It's difficult to call a film great when its purpose is to "inform" the American people, and fails miserably at giving real evidence for its thesis.

Yet, despite how many Web sites like factcheck.org or spinsanity.com shed light on the real truth of what Michael Moore claims in his films, people are still quick to say Fahrenheit 9/11 was a factual film, almost looking at it like it was straight out of an encyclopedia. Even after giving her some reservations about how I felt towards the film when I first saw it, my aunt said to me, "Zach, Moore only uses facts in his film. You can see for yourself." Really now?

It would be effortless to write a column on how poor Michael Moore has been in his fact checking or journalistic integrity, considering how he doctored film to make Charlton Heston look like an insensitive bastard in "Bowling for Columbine," or how Moore once wrote that the Pentagon had invested $250 billion (yes, billion) on the development of a single airplane. I could go on about the inaccuracies in Fahrenheit 9/11, pointing out how Moore misled the viewer into thinking the bin Laden family flew out of the country before anyone else could, or that none of the bin Ladens were interviewed before they left. Unfortunately, most Michael Moore supporters don't know how awful Moore is at getting at the truth, and the real reason is because they don't want to know.

If you've paid any attention to politics lately, a lot of Americans hate our President, George W. Bush, and the reason they believe what Michael Moore says is because Moore tells them everything they want to hear: Bush sucks, he is evil, he will stop at nothing to stay in power, and was it mentioned that he is evil? It's no coincidence that the Cannes Film Festival, held in a country that could be termed as a bastion for Bush haters, selected 9/11 as the years best film.

Fans of Michael Moore aren't the only ones guilty of this. Conservatives watch Fox News because it's more likely to present pundits with a conservative point of view, and are less likely to show a clip of President Bush embarrassing himself at the podium during a press conference. The media and Moore are both guilty of often giving people what they want to hear and neglecting to mention other important facts. This phenomenon is nothing new, as even the Apostle Paul warned his protégé Timothy 2,000 years ago that "to satisfy their own desires, [some men] will gather around them a great number of teachers to say what their itching ears want to hear."

This is why the vast majority of those who have seen Fahrenheit 9/11 despise George Bush. Liberals thought they would be presented with material that made it even more fashionable to hate George W. Bush, and conservatives knew their opinions would be highly questioned, and thus opted not to go. Michael Moore didn't really swing as many people to his side, as much as solidifying the ones already there.

So when the Academy Awards ended two nights ago, it was deserving that Moore didn't have the chance to sniff the glory that comes with winning an Oscar. Moore provided an extremely entertaining movie, all the while making points and insinuations either going against the facts, or providing no facts at all. That's what you can get away with when the people watching your movie are only there to hear what they want to hear.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

INCREASING DISMAY

I am a graduate student in the School of Education and a former GEO member. I am increasingly dismayed by the rhetoric this union is employing to rally support for its retroactive pay raise. Specifically, I take exception to the union's referring, in a recent email message to members, to full-time graduate students with teaching, research, or project assistantships as "public higher education employees" and "working people who are in many cases living below the poverty line."

A graduate education is a privilege not enjoyed by most "working people" and anyone in the real world, living and raising a family "below the poverty line," should fume at the impudence of GEO's self-serving socio-economic sanctimony. Full-time graduate students are, first and foremost, students, and graduate assistantships are a benefit not available to all grad students — not all programs assign them and not all qualified students find them.

Many of us work off campus at some point and can tell you that it's a rare 10 or 20-hour a week position in the Valley that pays $16 dollars per hour plus full health insurance, not to mention a full tuition and curriculum fee waiver.

When I decided to apply to graduate school, I made a decision to temporarily leave the work-a-day world and I planned on living lean for a couple of years. I did not expect to be in competition with a unionized, yet non-professional, workforce for the University's limited fund of graduate tuition aid.

I say give the University's faculty and professional staff what's in their contracts. But the state should not pass a supplemental spending bill to pay retroactive graduate student aid—which is what graduate assistantships really are—to a limited number of privileged students at the same time that it increases fees for the rest of us.

REQUIEM FOR 'FEAR AND LOATHING'

When Doctor Hunter S. Thomson died last week, I, like many others, was saddened by the loss of such a talented and insightful individual. I have spent the last week trying to ascertain how to express my thoughts so they might be distinct among the bazillion obituaries in the days that followed. Then this weekend, as I was reading Thompson's obituary in Sports Illustrated, the epiphany hit me.

The obituary ends with the phrase "Cigarette smoking in the press box is now officially retired." This statement epitomizes why I appreciated Thompson so much, and why his death is so much of a loss for our world. He didn't give a f if people didn't want him to do or say something, he would do it anyway. His affinity for a good smoke when and wherever he felt like one is just a single example. Others include his passion for firearms, free speech, and how he took an assignment from Sports Illustrated and turned it into one of the most well known drug binges in history.

In today's age of stringent political correctness and emphasized "values," not nearly enough people have the cajones to speak and act as Hunter Thompson did. He spoke out against what he thought needed to be addressed, and he wouldn't be afraid to tell society it may be acting stupidly. This past fall, Rolling Stone published a short piece by him titled "Fear and Loathing 2004", and it was the most critical, hilarious, and disturbingly real assessment of George Bush I saw throughout the campaign.

Among several other commentaries by contemporary scholars and authors, Thompson's stood out because he wasn't afraid to say things a lot of people didn't want to hear.

The boldness of spirit Thompson possessed no doubt helped lead him into some of his most noteworthy works, such as the above-mentioned Fear and Loathing, and Hell's Angels. He seemed to stick out so much in modern society only because he wasn't held back by fear of criticism or retaliation for his views. Maybe if our world wasn't so afraid to examine itself and address its most sensitive problems, Hunter Thompson would have only been another creative author and not one of the most insightful voices of his generation. Then again, maybe that would have been an even bigger loss for society than Thompson's passing last week.

As a side note, I think the most flattering portrayal of Hunter S. Thompson isn't by Brad Pitt in Fear and Loathing. It is by Gary Trudeau in Doonesbury. Uncle Duke would never have wasted his time with Ocean's 12.

A Mammoth Good Time

By Terry Hillig
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

ST.LOUIS — Students at Principia College in Elsah, MO, don't have to trek hundreds or thousands of miles to participate in one of the country's most significant paleontological digs.

In fact, they don't even have to leave campus. The 17,500-year-olu bones of a woolly mammoth known affectionately as "Benny" (after the man who found him) are being carefully excavated in the middle of the Principia campus, only yards from dormitories and academic buildings.

Principia employee Benny White thought he had found something significant one spring day in 1999 when his backhoe hit a piece of white material while he was excavating for a manhole between two dormitories, Rockham Court and Gehner House.

White was right. Faculty members quickly identified the object as the tooth of a mammoth. Another bone was visible in the pit. The professors knew they had something interesting but they were unsure just how interesting it might be _ whether the objects were an isolated find or part of a larger set of skeletal remains.

But they were sure of one thing. The excavation would be carried out carefully and in a way that involved and educated Principia students in the process. The pit was refilled to protect the remains until that could be arranged.

"We didn't go back to the site until the spring of 2002," said Janis Treworgy, who supervises the mammoth dig and teaches classes that are based on it. She joined the Principia faculty in 2000 after 25 years with the Illinois State Geological Survey.

"I was a new faculty member," she said. "I wasn't ready to start something so novel. I hadn't taught before."

As a geologist, Treworgy was familiar with soils and rock. She enlisted the help of experts in paleontology, the study of ancient plants and animals, and experts on loess (pronounced "luss"), the type of soil that covered Benny.

A course based on the mammoth was developed, and the first class was offered during the spring quarter of 2002.

Since then, students have carefully uncovered about 50 percent of the mammoth's skeleton, including two tusks, the left femur (thigh), the left and right humerus (upper arm), the shoulder blades, vertebrae, ribs, more teeth and several foot bones.

The tusks are still in the ground, attached to the skull. Treworgy doubts that the mandible, or lower jaw, will be found. It may have been inadvertently destroyed in some earlier campus excavation.

Benny seems to be lying on his left side. So far, there are no clues to the cause of his death. Animals that suffer a lingering death are typically found near a water source, but Benny is atop a bluff above the Mississippi River valley on one of the highest points in the immediate area.

The location suggests a sudden death, but Treworgy doubts Benny was killed by another animal or animals.

"If he was a healthy, full-grown male, he could have defended himself from any known predator," she said. Suggestions for the cause of death have included lightning or a prairie fire or even a dust storm.

The experts believe Benny was 39 to 43 years old when he died. Treworgy said Benny was on his sixth and final set of teeth, and the estimate of his age is based on a comparison to modern elephants. A woolly mammoth's normal lifespan was 60 to 70 years. Treworgy said the bones stayed together and were reasonably well-preserved, probably because they were quickly covered by loess, the windborne dust from the river valley below. The loess is 40 to 50 feet thick on the blufftops around Elsah.

Benny lived toward the end of the Pleistocene Epoch, which began about 1.65 million years ago and ended about 10,000 years ago. It was a time when ice sheets periodically covered northern portions of North America and Eurasia.

When Benny died, there were glaciers only about a hundred miles to the north but plenty of grass in the area that is now southern Jersey County. Mammoths consumed about 300 pounds of vegetable matter daily.

As the Ice Age neared its end, the melted water carried a tremendous amount of sediment from the glaciers. But in the winters, the flow decreased and the sediment was exposed to the wind.

"It had to have been a very dusty time," Treworgy said.

Benny almost certainly was not killed by humans. Treworgy said he died 17,500 years ago,. and humans probably did not arrive in this area of North America until about 11,500 years ago.

Woolly mammoths were among the largest land mammals that ever lived in North America. Benny's femur is 4 feet, 2 inches long. He is estimated to have stood nearly 11 feet tall at the shoulders and to have weighed 6 to 8 tons. On average, mammoths were slightly larger than modern African elephants.

The first mammoths originated in North Africa in the early Pleistocene period. From them, two separate mammoth lines evolved, the steppe mammoth and the Columbian mammoth.

Woolly mammoths evolved from steppe mammoths; they probably originated in Eurasia and came to North America via the land bridge that once connected the continent with Asia.

Discover Your Lover unites dates in unexpected ways

By Kierie Van Rooyen
Collegian Correspondent

The outcome of their date was inevitable. Two very ambitious characters had set out for one night on the town to endure one comically devastating evening.

Alexis, a 22-year-old pre-med student, left little room for disappointment. She is academically driven, takes part in various extra-curricular activities, portrays her success as highest priority, and exerts total determination and outstanding confidence in her daily life. Jarret, a 22-year-old chemical engineer, is similarly competent. He enjoys the competitive nature of his field and strives toward success. He is outgoing, bold, and intensely ambitious. Could this be a match made in heaven?

Their first impression was unexpected. They had already met a few times before, so no one felt awkward. They were pleased with their match-up and spoke comfortably with each other along the road toward their chosen destination. Alexis kept the conversation interesting, always asking Jarret new questions in order to avoid uncomfortable silences. Jarret responded respectably until her hometown became the topic of discussion.

"You are from Jersey? I am so sorry!" He laughed at his own sarcastic humor and she took a deep breath in response.

"Yes, I can understand why people always say that. I hear it all the time. But I live in a beautiful area far off from the highway."

She turned away in annoyance, but stayed strong in her attempt to remain oblivious to his hurtful statement. Jarret decided it was time to take initiative in a new discussion. A discussion with common ground: academics.

"So what classes have you taken?" He asked.

She smiled in relief and replied, "Well, I'm sure you know my major is filled with endless science requirements, but I actually like most of them. My favorite was organic chemistry. I just heard it was so hard that I made it a point to do well in it. All of my classes are challenging, so I basically call the library my second home."

He chuckled softly and said, "Yeah, well my classes are pretty demanding, too. I spend all of my time in the chemical engineer room. It's like a secret room only known to those in the major, but I can't believe you like organic! Who says that?" He laughed slightly louder, not failing to add one last remark, "Nerd!" to end a long and nervewracking car ride.

The car pulled up in front of a boxing studio in Northampton. Alexis seemed prepared to use her skills on Jarret, and Jarret seemed fully aware that she was ready.

"Alexis cannot wait to punch me in the face," he said half-jokingly, but he was probably right.

The coach explained the lesson, lightening the mood between the couple. Within moments, they were prepared to begin. Jarret adapted quickly to the idea of boxing. He threw punches perfectly and impressed Alexis with his innate aggression. Alexis seemed slightly more timid. She was new at boxing, but quickly learned upper-cuts and boxing techniques to catch up to Jarret. He was impressed.

"I like a woman who is strong, and who is fit, not muscular or anything, but just able to be active." At the end of the lesson, the couple was sent home for an hour break before dinner.

The Brasserie was the restaurant of choice for the evening. Alexis, who is not a heavy drinker, wanted a glass of wine with her meal.

"Well, why don't we get a bottle of wine?" Jarret exclaimed.

"A whole bottle! I won't be able to finish that!" She cried in astonishment. He shook his head and smiled at her reaction.

"It's really not that much. It's like four glasses! But I don't care, whatever you want." She took the wine list and made her choice.

"Fine, let's try the Shiraz. It's a great wine." He nodded in approval and they ordered.

Dinner lasted three full hours. Alexis felt as though Jarret dominated most of the conversation.

"All he did was talk about himself. Apparently, he has a killer resume, a killer internship, amazing abilities, and people think he is a lot smarter than he really is," She added.

"His arrogance was the only thing that was a killer. The only thing I could do was enjoy the delicious food, regardless of his company."

Jarret, however, felt quite differently. "She was really boring in the car, and okay at the lesson, but dinner was the best part of the night. We both spoke about so many different things. We got along so well. The food wasn't that great, but her company was."

After dinner the couple left to Seven-O's for karaoke night. While Jarret pounded Maduri Sours and Alexis sipped seltzer and lime, the two got into their first argument.

"Jarret, come sing a song with me!" Alexis asked hopefully. Jarret refused because "he doesn't like being told what to do."

Alexis asked again, only to be denied repeatedly.

"Fine, then I'll go up to sing." She walked on stage to choose a song. Suddenly, Jarret noticed his friends arriving at the bar.

"Yo, guys, wouldn't it be funny if we left her here?! She wouldn't notice. She's too drunk and busy with other guys."

They laughed and quickly ran out on Alexis. Meanwhile, Alexis sang her part onstage with the company of other guys who wanted to join in on the fun. The lights turned on and the night was over.

Alexis looked around in search of Jarret and suddenly realized what happened.

"He didn't even have the decency to tell me he was leaving! If he was so against singing karaoke, then he should have told me. There is no excuse for his behavior, who leaves a date at a bar?"

One of the guys from the stage overheard her upset.

"Hey, I'll be your date for the rest of the night."

He smiled sweetly and she shrugged without care. "Sure, you can catch a ride with me. We'll drop you off."

He entered the car ecstatically and they were off for a new adventure.

Reality TV: underage girls and modeling

Reality Craze

Mike Busack

The Bravo Television Network, televisions ultimate little guy, raked in record viewer results for the final episode of their hit reality show, "Project Runway." 2.5 million people tuned in to the show. Jay McCarroll became the first ever winner of the program.

On the flipside of modeling-based television, claims are being made against "America's Next Top Model" diva, Tyra Banks. Adrianne Curry, the first winner of the show, and a star of this seasons "The Surreal Life", says that Banks did not hold her end of the bargain. She claims the executive-producer promised a modeling contract, yet she did not deliver.

"Tyra really didn't help us out and the show didn't put any money into us," Adrianne said in an interview with Steppin' Out Magazine.

Now, to me, Adrianne's first wakeup call should have been when she decided to sign up for this show. If you have what it takes to truly be "America's Top Model," you won't have to find your success through a television show that is hosted by a supermodel. (They aren't exactly known for their educated business sense).

In other reality news, the seemingly never-ending dramafest that is "The Bachelorette" is coming to an end for a third season. Last night the show came to a screeching halt with a three hour finale (not sarcasm).

In all honesty, the star of the show, Jen Schefft, would not have much of a career if it were not for this whole reality television craze. However, the third season will be the last for her Schefft said. Thank God. Maybe with her spare time she can sign up to do "Survivor" on an island with Brigitte Nielsen, Flavor Flav, and the cast of "The Real Gilligan's Island."

The Philadelphia Daily News reported last week that Landon Lueck, the curly haired joke that starred on the Real World Philadelphia, had a relationship with a 17-year-old girl while on the show.

While an episode of the Philadelphia season showed Landon being scolded for making out with a girl that he worked with at the offices of the Philadelphia Soul, the Daily News has said that their sources tell them otherwise. According to the Daily News, the real controversy was over Landon's relationship with the teenage girl. For everyone that says Britney Spears is a bad role-model for children, but religiously watches the Real World with no issues, do me a favor and shut up.

It is shows like the "Real World" and "The Bachelorette," and "America's Next Top Model" that gives young kids a false reality that claims to be true. Kids shouldn't be shown that it is okay to get drunk every night and hit on underage girls. Neither should they be shown that a modeling contract means any more than a big paycheck. These girls are born pretty, that is not a talent. It doesn't make you a better human being (Adrianne Curry can vouch for this).

As for "The Bachelorette," girls should not be taught that "So many men, so little time," is a phrase to live by, as the shows Web site advertises. Life doesn't hand you a line of 25 men waiting to receive a rose. If our goal is to teach people to lead lives as shallow and superficial as Schefft's is, our generation is in trouble. True love will never be found in front of millions of viewers.

Somebody had to say it. Don't be troubled though, there is still good reality T.V. out there. Stay tuned.

College Mammoth

Although similar in appearance, the smaller mastodon is not closely related to mammoths.

Jeffrey Saunders is curator and chairman of the geology section at the Illinois State Museum in Springfield. One of the world's leading experts on mammoths, he is a key consultant on the Principia dig.

"It ranks up there with the most significant discoveries of mammoths to date," Saunders said. "These discoveries are few and far between."

Saunders does not expect Benny's complete skeletal remains to be recovered, but he said the find was more extensive than most.

Mammoth remains and a few complete skeletons have been found at 56 sites in Illinois, 23 of them involving woolly mammoths, Saunders said. He said the only other current mammoth excavation in the United States is in South Dakota. There are about 13 mammoth sites in Missouri.

One of the good things about the Principia excavation, Saunders said, is its location on a college campus.

"This is unique in these occurrences," Saunders said. "The college is quite happy with it. It's a wonderful opportunity for education and outreach. The Principia students are fantastic."

Principia, a four-year college for Christian Scientists with an enrollment of about 600, has offered teachers workshops and hosted many school groups and organizations at the site. A large amount of information on the mammoth is available on the Internet at www.prin.edu/mammoth. Principia students can take the mammoth course during the college's fall or spring quarters.

Treworgy said that the excavation would continue for at least two or three more years but that the lab work on the bones might continue for much longer.

Treworgy said it was her "goal and dream" to display a recreation of Benny's skeleton in the space now occupied by a lab in the interpretive center that adjoins Principia's new science center. The display would be built from plaster casts of the bones, not the actual bones.

"It has been a great experience," she said. "I have to turn away students. They love the opportunity. It's a lot of dirty work."

Rascal Flatts comes to the Mullins Center, harmonizes and entertains

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

An audience full of cowboy hats, wranglers, and screaming women packed the Mullins Center Saturday night for a show by the country vocal group Rascal Flatts that could arguably be the best performance UMass will see this year.

A dynamic mix of high energy songs by the performers, blended with a healthy dose of sweet southern twang, gave the nearly sold-out center a night that was anything but flat.

The country pop stars were able to bring the entire stadium to their feet with the flawless harmonies of Jay DeMarcus and Joe Don Rooney, led by lead singer Gary LeVox with "Here's to You" and "Prayin' for Daylight."

Between the trio's infectious crowd interaction, armed with a fiddle player that could outplay the devil himself, Rascal Flatts never gave the audience a chance to use their seats — except to dance on.

LeVox's ability to hold incredible pitches while bending and crawling on the catwalk to shake the hands of ecstatic fans during the ballad "Feels like Today" was nothing short of miraculous.

Rascal Flatt's secret talent was their pure modesty. Despite several hit singles, being named country's top vocal group three years in a row, and selling over six million albums, the knights in shining buckles presented a demeanor that could easily come from the guy next door, making it clear that they are still part of the blue collar American spirit they originated from.

Heartthrob and lead guitarist Rooney even took the time to acknowledge fans' signs, asking at one point if there was a preacher in the house.

"I do believe I'm about to be married," he said, peering at a sign asking for his hand in marriage.

Rooney, who appeared naked from behind in the band's steamy music video for "Melt", took no shame in wiggling his well shaped behind at the crowd of overjoyed women.

"An energetic rendition of "Mayberry", one of the group's top singles, had the crowd nearly drowning out the performers with their sing-along, paired with the single "This Everyday Life".

The trio was able to achieve almost flawless harmony through out the entire night — a daunting feat for a live performance in a large venue. However, not all went according to plan.

Near the second third of the concert, LeVox dropped his microphone, and the band seemed lost and off beat. LeVox's choice of costume, a gaudy western shirt with tasseled cowboy pants and Rooney's face-burying bangs were detracting throughout the night.

The trio could have been mistaken for the Backstreet Boys when they made the mistake of pulling a female fan, complete with a cowboy hat on stage to serenade. Not only was it a major turn off to the hundreds of female fans in the audience, but the individual had to complete the gag-worthy scene with an Ashlee Simpson dance move, creating an eyesore out of the song that could have been the best of the night.

The boys made a forgivable recovery with their love song yet, "I Melt". However, the quality that saves Rascal Flatts from being accused of being a twangy version of N' Sync the fact that they actually have instrumental talent. DeMarcus could easily be his own solo act with his gospel call-and-answer cover of "Great Ball of Fire".

First opening act Shelly Fairchild is a little known artist from Mississippi with her first album to be released this spring. The petite Fairchild may be a newcomer on the country scene, but the voice on her new single "Tiny Town" and "Ready to Fall" is set to rival those of Faith Hill and Martina McBride. Blake Shelton gave an average, sometimes snooze-worthy run of the mill performance of sounds like "Good old Boy, Bad old Boyfriend" and "Goodbye Time".

For Rascal Flatts, their finest moment was their last, bursting back on stage with a cover of "Pour Some Sugar on Me" by Def Leppard, and Bon Jovi's "You Give Love A Bad Name".

Both songs had the potential to be a huge embarrassment, but Rascal Flatts transformed into, well, country n' roll stars.

True to their roots, the boys gave a show stopping finale of Bruce Springsteen's "Born in the USA" — ending the night on the motif that country music was raised on — American pride.

Country pop sensation Rascal Flatts serenaded the Mullins Center Saturday night. Winners of the CMA's "Best Vocal Group," they are best known for their good looks and strong harmonies.

The 2004-2005 Gerald F. Scanlon Student Employee of the Year committee is seeking nominations for outstanding student employees.

The intent of the award is to recognize and honor students who have demonstrated exceptional performance by contributing their time and/or skills to help the University achieve its goals and objectives.

Up to 10 awards will be presented at a celebration to be held in May.

Departmental supervisors may nominate any matriculated student who has been employed for six months, or who is a junior or senior. The selection committee comprised of supervisors representing each Vice Chancellor's division will be review the nominations and select award recipients. Selection criteria include: dependability, demonstrated initiative, and original contributions to the workplace. Nominations are due by March 18, 2005.

For more nomination information or to obtain a nomination form, please visit the Student Employment website at http://www.umass.edu/umfa/seo/Employer_Information/. For questions or extra information, please contact Anne Peramba in the Student Employment Office at peramba@finaid.umass.edu or 545-2886.

The bare necessities and all you need to know for this trip

While spontaneity is oftentimes a good thing, every good road trip takes some planning. So, first things first: what to bring. Other than the obvious necessities, like clothes and money, there are two things that every person planning a road trip must take with him: lots of music and a camera.

Music is the essential element needed to keep a road trip smooth sailing. Just imagine what it would be like if you were to run out of things to say after a five minute conversation about UMass men's basketball and you didn't have any music. Hence, this would be the perfect time to rock out.

The road trip music collection has to be diverse. After all, if you don't know where the road is going to take you, then why would you bring only one type of music? It might not feel right to be listening to Lil Jon while taking in an amazing view of fields and rolling hills as far as the eye can see. It's good to have some hits on hand for pure entertainment value, but remember to bring some "chill" music for when you want to just sit back and enjoy the scenery.

As mentioned, bringing a camera is a must. It's preferable to bring a digital camera so you can e-mail some crazy sites to your buddies back home, but any camera will do just fine. Bringing a camera is important not only to take pictures of the sites along the way, but also to take pictures of those unexpected occurrences that are bound to happen on any road trip. To put it bluntly, you never know when you're going to run across a crazy Jesus freak, an awesome mullet haircut, or memorable road signs that are going to make you chuckle (i.e. "Satan's Kingdom State Recreation Area," "Speed Limit 14 ? miles per hour," and now entering the town of "Spread Eagle.") Anyone from the northeastern U.S. knows that the signs will probably just get weirder as one travels west. (For a complete list of weird signs, check out hypocrites.com.)

Our sports writers are planning to travel through the cities of Albany, Columbus, Cleveland and Buffalo on their way to Dayton. There are many places in these cities to make stops and make the trip more worthwhile.

Believe it or not, Albany, NY has a number of popular nightspots, which feature live bands almost every night. Some of those clubs include Big House Brewing Company, Tess' Lark Tavern, Bleecker Café and Bayou Café Downtown. The Pepsi Arena is also a prime visitor's spot. Anyone suffering from NHL withdrawal might want to stop by and see an Albany River Rats AHL hockey game. The arena is also home to the Albany Conquest Arena Football team, the Siena College Saints basketball teams and the Division one ECAC Hockey League.

With its location in the vicinity of Niagara Falls, Buffalo, NY is a good picture-taking city. It is also the home of Ralph Wilson Stadium where the NFL's Buffalo Bills play. In addition, one could check out the Buffalo Destroyers arena football team, Buffalo Bandits indoor lacrosse, and major college sports teams from Buffalo State University, Canisus College, Daemen College and the University at Buffalo.

Cleveland, Ohio is most likely going to be the best tourist stop along the road trip route. It is the home to the Rock 'N Roll Hall of Fame, over 300 nightclubs, bars and lounges and a number of professional sports teams, including the NFL's Browns, the MLB's Indians and the NBA's Cavaliers. The House of Blues just opened its doors near downtown, and regularly sees a line of people out the door waiting to experience the relaxed atmosphere of the popular jazz and blues club.

Ohio's state capital of Columbus is a good spot to get acquainted with the material you forgot from U.S. History in high school. The town doesn't have a huge night scene, but it is the home to the state's political elite. It is also the home of Ohio State University and the Buckeyes basketball team.

After watching the Minutemen beat the Flyers, the sports writers might have enough time to take in the history of the town. Dayton is the "birthplace of aviation," according to the city's official Web site. The city was once home to the Wright brothers, Wilbur and Orville. At Carillon Historical Park, the brothers' 1905 "Wright Flyer III," the world's first practical airplane sits on the 65-acre property. Across town are the National Aviation Hall of Fame and the National Museum of the U.S. Air Force.

As the boys update us on their happenings from the road, it is only then that everyone back in Amherst will hear about their ups and downs of the open road. Perhaps they will get into a couple of adventures along the way. The only way to find out what happens to the Minutemen and the well being of the Collegian sports team is to keep reading. Marzelli and McGovern will be filing updates from the road starting today.

of the Western Mass. media making the journey - and our friends think we're just stupid.

We've been informed a million times over the last few weeks as to the dangers of the trip: sleep deprivation, monotony, boredom and a huge hit on the ol' budget. Now add to the mix the treachery of a powerful blizzard sweeping directly across our path, and people are telling us to prepare like we're about to cross Antarctica in a covered wagon.

Please, it's just Ohio. You're talking to the kids who made Olean look like a morning jaunt from Southwest to Thompson. We don't care how ridiculous this whole thing sounds, we're doing it anyways because it's just the type of guys are - check that - the type of journalists we are.

Call it crazy or irresponsible, it's the type of trip that could be deemed both of those things. But to those of us who call UMass basketball our job, it's just the next game on the schedule, and no matter where it is, there are two seats on press row that belong to us.

So where else would we rather be?

The Ultimate Road Trip

Follow the Collegian men's basketball beat writers as they travel 1,600 miles in the name of journalism

It seemed like we were laughing about this trip just yesterday.

We looked up and down the schedule before the first game of the season and figured we could make most of the road games. Miami would be tough, but flights were cheap. The rest of the games, well lets just say the two of us were born with a little interstate in our blood.

Then there was Dayton.

This was a beast far different than any of our other adventures. To fly would be more expensive than to drive and driving would be a monotonous affirmation dipping into the painful reality of the road. We decided to put it off, forget about it, and let the season make our decision for us.

UMass did well, at least well enough to make this trip worthwhile. We found ourselves in distant crevices of the Northeast; from the snowy canvas of St. Bonaventure in Olean, N.Y., to the thriving metropolis of Philadelphia. Both of our Jeeps had been thrown into the flames of the Atlantic 10 and we sat side-by-side, never sure of an outcome, yet positive that we would be courtside.

We were sitting in the car on the way back from the Bronx, N.Y. after a loss to Fordham when we decided that the Dayton trip needed to happen. It would be a necessity to find a rental car, as neither of our Jeeps could withstand a possible 30-hour trip with a three-hour hiatus. The plans were set and we found a photographer willing to make the horrible journey with us.

As time drew closer we began to realize that our professional life as reporters was beginning to overpower our responsibility as students. The three of us are missing a full day of classes and each have a slew of responsibilities once we return.

Between us we have four papers and two tests due on Wednesday afternoon, some within an hour of our arrival. We have two laptops, two reading lights, and enough interstate to maybe just pull this whole thing off. Ah yes, the pure essence of a mind-numbing roadtrip.

The more we sit and think about it, the more easily we come to the realization that there is just no excuse for this trip. None. Our colleagues on the UMass beat think we're crazy - we're the only members

Imagine yourself stepping into a Ford Taurusknowing you're going to travel into the unknown. You're feeling the same excitement you would have after jumping 20-feet off a bridge into the deep water of the lake below. There's no turning back now.

Despite your personal reservations about trekking through lands you haven't yet conquered, you're reassured by a Collegian sports editor that you're traveling to "the happiest place on Earth," Dayton, Ohio.

No doubt, two of the Collegian's top sports writers, Mike Marzelli and Bob McGovern want to make their road trip a memorable one, even if the Massachusetts Minutemen basketball team doesn't win their game against the University of Dayton's Flyers.

The trip itself is not about who wins or loses the game, it's about how to make the best of a 12-hour-long drive at a time when, as college students, we're young and ready to experience whatever life throws our way.

Diversity Commission unveils points and ideas

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

On it's Web site yesterday, the Commission on Campus Diversity issued a report in which is outlines problems and makes recommendations to the University of Massachusetts.

The report was titled "Diversity and Inclusion at UMass Amherst: A Blueprint for Change."

"Although there is much to digest in this report, the key thrust is that everyone on campus must engage these issues if we are to succeed," Chancellor John Lombardi wrote in an e-mail sent to The Associated Press.

"It is very likely that we will need additional leadership in various places on campus, but until we've had a chance to fully review the report, we won't be able to articulate those changes."

One of the main points of the report was that the University needs an administrator to be in charge of diversity issues on campus.

"[The University should] appoint a senior level administrator with adequate staffing, budget and resources to report directly to the Chancellor to review and coordinate all diversity and inclusion activities at the Amherst campus," the report said.

Lombardi appointed the members of the Commission after various incidents on campus, including the now-infamous "KKK-9" last semester, in which photographs of members of the Student Government Association were leaked, revealing various SGA members drinking in front of Ku Klux Klan caricatures.

Because of these incidents, the Commission has held various public forums to get the student's reactions to campus problems.

"The University of Massachusetts Amherst gratefully thanks Chair Orlando Taylor and the other members of the Commission for their exceptional dedication and commitment that has led to the presentation of their executive summary and report today," Chancellor Lombardi said in a statement.

Lombardi also said in his statement that he just received the report, and he has yet to study it thoroughly. Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano also said that he can't comment further until he's read the report more thoroughly.

The report also discussed the recent budget cuts that the University has endured, but it said that these cuts are no excuse to cut back on diversity-

Missing drugs raise suspicions

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON — The withdrawal of a new multiple sclerosis drug has focused scrutiny on millions of dollars in insider stock sales at Biogen Idec Inc. and executive bonuses approved in the days before the company disclosed a death and illness that led to the drug's removal from the market.

The transactions came before Monday's withdrawal of Tysabri wiped out a total $17.8 billion in shareholder equity in a single day for Biogen and Elan Corp., biotechnology partners that had enjoyed surging share prices the past year on high expectations for their jointly developed drug.

Cambridge-based Biogen and Ireland-based Elan are left for now to rely on other medications in their portfolios, including Biogen's Avonex, a nine-year-old MS treatment that accounted for nearly two-thirds of the $2.2 billion in revenue last year at the world's third-largest biotech company.

While Avonex will likely pick up some of the sales lost from Tysabri's withdrawal, the newer drug "was Biogen's growth engine," said Jason Kantor, an analyst with WR Hambrecht & Co. "Now, the prospects for it are zero until we hear otherwise."

The gloomy outlook comes amid scrutiny of stock sales by three Biogen officials within a four-day span before the drug's makers notified the Food and Drug Administration Feb. 18 of illnesses involving two patients who had received intravenous infusions of

Minors spared from death penalty sentence

By Hope Yen
Associated Press

Lee Boyd Malvo, co-conspirator in the D.C. Sniper shootings, was spared from the death penalty. He was only 17 years old at the time of the terrorism attacks.

WASHINGTON — A closely divided Supreme Court outlawed the death penalty for juvenile criminals on Tuesday, declaring there was a national consensus such executions were unconstitutionally cruel and ending a practice that had brought international condemnation.

The 5-4 decision, which overturns a 1989 high court ruling, throws out the death sentences of 72 murderers who committed their crimes as juveniles and bars states from seeking to execute others. Nineteen states had allowed death sentences for killers who committed their crimes when they were under 18.

The ruling was greeted with enthusiasm by numerous death penalty opponents, here and abroad.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for the majority, said many juveniles lack maturity and intellectual development to understand the ramifications of their actions.

"The age of 18 is the point where society draws the line for many purposes between childhood and adulthood. It is, we conclude, the age at which the line for death eligibility ought to rest," Kennedy said.

The United States has stood almost alone in the world in officially sanctioning juvenile executions, a "stark reality" that can't be ignored, Kennedy wrote.

Juvenile offenders have been put to death in recent years in only a few other countries, including Iran, Pakistan, China and Saudi Arabia.

"It is proper that we acknowledge the overwhelming weight of international opinion against the juvenile death penalty, resting in large part on the understanding that the instability and emotional imbalance of young people may often be a factor in the crime," Kennedy wrote.

In an angry dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia disputed that a "national consensus" exists and said the majority opinion was based on the "flimsiest of grounds." The appropriateness of capital punishment should be determined by individual states, not "the subjective views of five members of this court and like-minded foreigners," he wrote.

The ruling continues the court's practice of narrowing the scope of the death penalty, which it reinstated in 1976. Executions for those 15 and younger when they committed their crimes were outlawed in 1988. Three years ago, justices banned executions of the mentally retarded, citing a "national consensus" against executing a killer who may lack the intelligence to fully understand his crime.

In finding a similar consensus against juvenile executions, the court noted that most states bar them and those that allow them do so infrequently. Only three states — Oklahoma, Texas and Virginia — have executed juveniles in the past 10 years.

Legal experts said the ruling could have widespread ramifications for the future of capital punishment, with courts empowered to strike down the practice on evolving notions of decency.

"The lasting significance of this case is that it opens the door to the abolition of the death penalty judicially," said Jordan Steiker, a death penalty expert at the University of Texas law school. "If a national consensus can emerge without a majority of the death penalty states moving toward abolition, then it suggests that judicial abolition is a genuine prospect."

The impact was immediate. In Prince William County, Va., officials said Tuesday they will not prosecute a murder case against teen sniper Lee Boyd Malvo, who is already serving life

Mystery Shoppers examine DC food

By Matthew Belliveau
Collegian Staff

As students, we like to get what we want. Unfortunately, we rarely get what we ask for.

Who's listening to us anyway?

Well, Ken Toong is.

Ken Toong, director of Dining Services at the University of Massachusetts, wants his students to get exactly what they ask for. But in order to gain a full understanding of what we want to see on the menu, and maybe more importantly, what we want to see taken off, he needed some help.

"We recognized that there was a need for us to continue to monitor our quality and services at an on-going basis," said Toong. "In the food service as in many businesses, it is important to attain details, and it is the small things that really matter, such as missing cranberry sauce during roast turkey dinner or food that is too cold during a particular meal. And although we conduct a comprehensive survey with 30 questions twice a year with comment cards at each dining commons, we felt that it was not enough. We wanted quick feedback."

MEGAN BRINSTER/COLLEGIAN

The stir-fry station, found in the Oakroom at the Worcester DC, is one of the many items examined and scrutinized by the mystery shoppers.

That's where the "Mystery Shoppers" come in.

These mystery shoppers are actually 12 student ambassadors hired by Dining Services to properly assess the quality of the food and service at their local dining commons once a week.

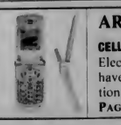
"This Mystery shoppers program actually started about three years ago and we were using faculty and staff," said Toong.

"But last semester we extended the program, called the Student Ambassador program, by hiring the students that are actually on the meal plan to assist us."

After each visit, the student ambassador fills out a form with 12 questions to access nearly every aspect of the dining process. The forms are then submitted weekly to the head of the program, Martha Monaghan. Monaghan then reviews the comments, leaving a copy on Mr.Toong's desk and another copy to the DC managers.

"Our managers address any issues through the comment cards posted at each DC," said Toong. "I personally review each comment card and discuss with the managers any reoccurring issues."

Sean Mahan, one of the student ambassadors, was excited at the idea of basically being paid to eat.



"When I was first asked to join, I was kind of confused. I didn't know what 'student ambassador' meant. I received an email from Martha asking me if I wanted to be an ambassador. And I said 'OK'," said Mahan. "I came in and was filled in on what I would be doing. I was given a schedule of what is supposed to be on the menu each week, a comment sheet, and a

In total, the report outlines 12 problems and offered 15 recommendations to the Chancellor.

The first "serious problem" that the report discussed, was the University's lack of dedication to diversity-related problems on the campus.

"Lack of consistent and unequivocal commitment to diversity, inclusion and social justice in the mission statement, practices and structures [is a problem]," the report said. The report went on to say that there is a lack of consistency in the campus when it comes to diversity issues.

The report went on to list other problems, including the members of ALANA (African, Latino, Asian and Native American) being isolated from the rest of the campus. The Commission added that the campus needs to focus its attention on support groups, like ALANA.

"Our minority support systems are pretty splintered," Brian Long, a SGA Senator, told the Associated Press. "They don't work together and they need to have a governing body above them to put them in the right direction."

Included in the report were graphs showing the percentage of students, by race, that attend the University. Five year's ago, 17.8 percent of the undergraduate student population was a minority. This year, the number dropped to 16.5.

Comparatively, 18 percent of the University of Connecticut's undergraduate students are a minority, and 11 percent of the University of Rhode Island's undergraduates are a minority.

A press conference was supposed to be held yesterday, but the severe weather forced the Commission to post it's 86-page summary in it's website. Next, Lombardi will review the report and develop a draft plan, with a budget, that will be published on the website on March 12.

Everyday, three times a day, the student ambassadors are asked to eat at the dining common of his or her choice. They assess every aspect of the dining atmosphere, from the serving and the quality of the food, to the friendliness of the staff. Mahan claims that he has yet to meet an "unfriendly" staff member.

"It seems as though they tend to put the more-friendly people out front as greeters," said Mahan. "And I think the less-friendly people become dishwashers."

While the majority of Mahan's assessments have been positive there have been occasions where the services at the dining common were not up to UMass standards.

"There was one particular dining hall that I went to that had a number of problems. So I made a note of all the issues that I came across of and passed it along to Martha," said Mahan.

"The manager of the DC then responded in a letter asking me to explain in further detail some of the problems I ran into. Most of the issues were taken care of within a few days."

"One of the problems that I tend to run into now and then is the lack of silverware. The first thing normally goes is forks, which is understandable," said Mahan.

Another one of the details the ambassadors are keeping especially aware of is the refilling of the drink stations.

"Because Sprite looks like soda water, its difficult for the workers to tell when it needs to be refilled. So there are times when we're left with a glass full of soda water," said Mahan.

"And then there is just a number of little things that we look for, like the cleanliness of the tables and chairs"

While the assessments of Mahan and the other ambassadors influence the general atmosphere of the dining halls, they do not directly influence the menu. That is left to student surveys.

During winter break, 4,000 students were sent surveys to find out what Dining Services could do better and which meals were in demand. And in response to the students' requests the menu has been filled with a number of new dishes: chicken tenders, roasted turkey, chicken Caesar salad, and sushi.

The menu has also been relieved of some of the more unpopular dishes: tuna-noodle casserole, catfish, and chicken a la king.

But the changes go far beyond just introducing new dishes; it's the adjustments of when the dishes are served, and how the meals are cooked.

"I was told that the menu on the weekend is usually weak, so we passed the info onto the menu committee to revise it before the next menu cycle occurred," said Toong.

The meals are healthier now that canola oil has replaced vegetable oil, omelets are made with less oil, an increase in vegetarian dishes, and olive oil is now available as a substitute for butter.

"I think the program works well for all parties involved. Student ambassadors receive a stipend for assisting us and they help us identify outstanding employees and shine a light on some of the things that are most popular with the students," said Toong.

"And not only do they keep us on our toes but they also provide us with insight into some issues that we might not be aware of."

The program even went as far as to consider videotaping some of the student ambassador's visits.

"We tried to provide portable cameras," said Toong, "but this idea did not work because the student ambassador preferred to remain anonymous."

Hidden cameras aside, students can remain certain that the student ambassadors are always watching, and Ken Toong is always listening.

Excessive snowfall raises concerns in Boston

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON —When Michael Fedorouk and Darkeem Kelow found out they had a snow day on Tuesday, they couldn't have been happier. In the afternoon, they pulled on their boots, zipped up their parkas, and ran down to the Boston Common, dragging a purple inflatable sled.

But before they plopped the sled onto a snowy hillside, they acknowledged that there's a downside to having had five snow days this year: any more, and they might have to sharpen their pencils for Saturday classes, cut short their April vacation, or go to school into July.

As the snow piles up around the state, so too have the snow days. And as districts reach or approach the maximum number of days they can cancel due to snow, some are looking at whether they must shorten vacations, send students to school on Saturdays, or cancel planned days off.

In Boston, where more than 78 inches of snow has fallen since the start of winter, the district has used up all its allotted snow days with Tuesday's cancellation. As pleased as Michael, 11, and Darkeem, 13, were by prospects of an afternoon spent sledding and skating, neither wanted to have to make it up.

"On Saturdays, we always have games. I don't want to go to school on a Saturday. I might miss my games, and (Darkeem) might miss his football games," said Michael, a 5th grader at the Eliot Elementary School.

Under state law, schools are required to hold 180 days of classes. Schools customarily build three to five extra days for snow or other emergencies. They generally must end school by June 30, under the union contracts between schools and teachers. To hold fewer than 180 days of school, they must get permission from state Commissioner of Education David Driscoll, and to go past June 30, they have to negotiate with the teachers.

But the massive blizzard in January that dumped up to three feet of snow used up many or all of those five days in Eastern Massachusetts cities and towns. Some schools like Boston now face the unsavory task of deciding how to add school days to offset any future cancellations.

Driscoll's spokeswoman, Heidi Perlman, said many school superintendents have discussed seeking waivers for school years shorter than 180 days, but said Driscoll probably wouldn't decide until later in the winter, or in spring.

"His preference would really be that the districts find a way to make up the time, because from his perspective, students really should be in school, and there's a 180-day rule for a reason," she said.

Boston school spokesman Jonathan Palumbo said the school year will now go right up to June 30 — the last day that districts can hold classes. Any more snow days, he said, and the district will have to find ways to make them up, such as holding Saturday classes or asking the state to have fewer than 180 school days.

"I'm sure when the meteorologists tell us the next weather pattern comes into place, we'll convene a meeting at that point," he said.

Tom Scott, executive director of the Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents, said that only a few districts have reached their maximum snow days, though he didn't have an exact number.

The 2004-2005 Gerald F. Scanlon Student Employee of the Year committee is seeking nominations for outstanding student employees.

The intent of the award is to recognize and honor students who have demonstrated exceptional performance by contributing their time and/or skills to help the University achieve its goals and objectives.

Up to 10 awards will be presented at a celebration to be held in May.

Departmental supervisors may nominate any matriculated student who has been employed for six months, or who is a junior or senior. The selection committee comprised of supervisors representing each Vice Chancellor's division will be review the nominations and select award recipients. Selection criteria include: dependability, demonstrated initiative, and original contributions to the workplace. Nominations are due by March 18, 2005.

Biogen's actions seen as questionable by many

Tysabri in combination with Avonex.

One patient later died from a rare and frequently fatal disease of the central nervous system. The other, with a suspected case of the same illness, survived. Monday's withdrawal of Tysabri and suspension of clinical tests came 10 days after the companies notified the FDA.

Biogen's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission show Thomas Bucknum, a Biogen executive vice president and the company's general counsel, sold 89,700 shares on Feb. 18 for a profit of $1.9 million. The gain reflected the rise in the value of company shares since the options were granted starting in 1998.

Bucknum also was awarded new options on 55,000 shares on Feb. 17, the day the company's board approved a committee recommendation granting Biogen executives cash bonuses totaling $4.6 million based on its performance last year.

Biogen's executive chairman, William Rastetter, sold more than 120,000 shares On Feb. 15, yielding a $7.45 million profit, the filings show. The day before that, Biogen director Robert Pangia sold 15,570 shares for a profit of $954,844.

Walter Ricciardi, head of the SEC's Boston office, declined to comment Tuesday, citing agency policy not to discuss what his office may or may not investigate.

Biogen spokesman Jose Juves said the stock transactions were planned before the company learned of the problems that led to Tysabri's withdrawal.

"The company moved very quickly once there was a hint of a potential safety issue with Tysabri," Juves said. "All these trades preceded that quick and decisive action, which was guided exclusively by concern for patient safety and our commitment to the MS community."

When Tysabri was withdrawn Monday, Biogen shares lost more than 42 percent of their value while Elan's stock fell 70 percent.

On Tuesday, both stocks recovered slightly, with Biogen shares rising $2.22, or 5.7 percent, to $40.87 in afternoon trading on Nasdaq Stock Market, and Elan rising 10 cents to $8.10 on the New York Stock Exchange.

BTK serial killer sentenced to life

By David Twiddy
Associated Press

WICHITA, Kan. — Dennis Rader, the churchgoing family man and Cub Scout leader accused of leading a double life as the BTK serial killer, was charged Tuesday with 10 counts of first-degree murder.

Rader made his first court appearance by videoconference from his jail cell. During the brief hearing, Rader stood behind a podium, his hands folded at times, at others leafing through a copy of the charges against him. He told the judge he is married and was employed with the city of Park City, and said "Thank you, sir" at the end of the hearing.

About a dozen family members of victims were in the courtroom, but they did not speak to reporters. Rader was accompanied by a temporary attorney, and the judge appointed the state's public defender office to represent him.

The BTK killer, whose nickname stands for "Bind, Torture, Kill," was suspected of eight deaths beginning in 1974, but authorities said they had linked two additional victims to the serial killer.

It appears unlikely Rader will face the death penalty. He has yet to be charged with a slaying that occurred after 1994, when Kansas passed its capital punishment law. Additionally, the Kansas Supreme Court ruled that law unconstitutional in December over a provision on how juries weigh evidence for and against execution.

Authorities have declined to say what led them to the 59-year-old Rader, a married father of two, scout leader and active member of a Lutheran church.

However, there were indications a computer disk BTK sent to the television station KSAS provided a key piece of evidence that led police to Rader.

Scott Robertson, an assignment editor for the station that produces KSAS' news broadcast, told The Associated Press a package the station received Feb. 16 contained the disk as well jewelry that may have been from one of the victims.

Pastor Michael Clark of Christ Lutheran Church — Rader's church — also said police asked him for a list of people who had access to the church computer. On Friday, he provided 10 or 15 names, including Rader's, he said.

Syria rejoices as its troops withdraw from Lebanon

By Hussein Dakroub
Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Elated at forcing out Lebanon's pro-Damascus government, flag-waving, singing protesters crowded downtown Beirut on Tuesday, as Syrian President Bashar Assad indicated he would withdraw Syria's 15,000 troops from Lebanon "maybe in the next few months."

Russia joined Egypt and Saudi Arabia in trying to persuade Syria to withdraw all its troops, and Assad told Time magazine that the troops would be out "maybe in the next few months. Not after that." The troops were originally deployed during Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war — ostensibly as peacekeepers — and Syria has held sway over Lebanese politics ever since.

The Lebanese opposition called for nightly protests to demand an end to Syrian control and the capture of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri's assassins.

As politicians began searching for a replacement for ousted Prime Minister Omar Karami, opposition leaders planned to meet Wednesday to discuss how far to push their people power campaign and to ensure Damascus does not dominate Lebanon's new Cabinet.

Egypt and Saudi Arabia are trying to persuade Syria to accept a timetable for a complete withdrawal by April, Arab diplomats said on condition of anonymity. Russia, a traditional ally of Syria's, also called for a withdrawal on Tuesday, saying Damascus must respect the U.N. resolution demanding the troops leave.

A withdrawal is a key demand of the Lebanese opposition, the United States and United Nations.

About 2,000 protesters were in Beirut's central Martyrs' Square Tuesday evening, their numbers growing from a few hundred in the morning. With many Lebanese awaiting political developments, protesters numbered far fewer than the 25,000 who demanded — and obtained — Karami's resignation.

"We will continue the sit-in every day until the Syrian army leaves Lebanon and until the truth is determined in Hariri's assassination," said Sami Makhlouf, an 18-year-old student waving Lebanon's red and white flag with the green cedar tree in the middle.

In reaction to the Time report, Syria appeared to back off the comments. A Syrian official, speaking on condition of anonymity in Damascus, questioned whether it could occur within months, saying the Taif Accord was the basis for this matter.

The 1989 accord does not necessarily rule out a full withdrawal within months. It calls for a redeployment to eastern Lebanon near the border, with a full pullout subject to negotiation.

Syria last week said it was committed to withdrawing according to the Taif agreement and Lebanon's defense minister said then a pullback to the border area would come soon. Both governments indicated there would not a full withdrawal for now, but that was before the government buckled in Beirut under popular pressure.

An opposition follow-up committee called on Lebanese to continue their "independence uprising" with peaceful nightly sit-ins at Martyrs' Square. But an opposition meeting Wednesday is to decide whether to continue larger protests or pursue political means.

Troops lifted the cordon they had imposed around the city center Monday and Lebanon reopened after a one-day strike to protest Hariri's Feb. 14 assassination.

In London, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and French Foreign Minister Michel Barnier renewed calls for Syrian troops and intelligence agents to leave Lebanon.

"The Lebanese people have very courageously expressed their aspiration for freedom, their aspiration for a sovereign Lebanon. The Lebanese want to be masters of their own state," Barnier said.

Mixed reactions to Court's rule

in prison in two of the 10 sniper killings that terrorized the Washington area in 2002.

Prince William County Commonwealth's Attorney Paul Ebert had hoped to get the death penalty for Malvo, who was 17 at the time of the killings, but he said another trial would now be an unnecessary expense.

"Today, the court repudiated the misguided idea that the United States can pledge to kane no child behind while simultaneously killing children to the death chamber," said William F. Schulz, executive director of Amnesty International USA.

Former President Carter, along with several other Nobel Prize winners, filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case last year. In a statement he said the ruling "acknowledges the profound inconsistency in prohibiting those under 18 years of age from voting, serving in the military or buying cigarettes, while allowing them to be sentenced to the ultimate punishment."

Dianne Clements, president of the Houston-based Justice for All victims advocacy group, criticized the decision and said she hopes that when there is a Supreme Court vacancy a strong death penalty supporter is nominated.

"The Supreme Court has opened the door for more innocent people to suffer by 16- and 17-year-olds," she said. "I can't wait for the Supreme Court to have judges more concerned with American values. American States can pledge to leave no child behind while simultaneously killing children to the death chamber," said William F. Schulz, executive director of Amnesty International USA.

Justices were called on to draw an age line for executions after Missouri's highest court overturned the death sentence given to Christopher Simmons, who was 17 when he kidnapped a neighbor, bogtied her and threw her off a bridge in 1993. Prosecutors say he planned the burglary and killing of Shirley Crook and bragged that he could get away with it because of his age.

The four most liberal Supreme Court justices — John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer — had gone on record in 2002 opposing the death penalty for juveniles, calling it "shameful." Those four, joined by Kennedy, formed Tuesday's decision.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Clarence Thomas joined Scalia in seeking to uphold the executions.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor filed a separate dissent, arguing that a blanket rule against juvenile executions was misguided. Case-by-case determinations of a young offenders' maturity is the better approach, she wrote.

"The court's analysis is premised on differences in the aggregate between juveniles and adults, which frequently do not hold true when comparing individuals," she said. "Chronological age is not an unfailing measure of psychological development, and common experience suggests that many 17-year-olds are more mature than the average young adult."

Juvenile executions smartly ruled unconstitutional

Juveniles now convicted of murder will no longer have to deal with the threat of the death penalty weighing over their heads. The Supreme Court ruled yesterday that the execution for those who were under the age of 18 is unconstitutional. For the majority of the nation, this is already a state law. However, states such as Texas, Virginia and Oklahoma, that have performed juvenile executions in the past, things will now have to change.

In a 5-4 vote, the decision is one that can finally unite the nation in an effort to properly punish criminals, not just kill them. In a New York Times article, the Supreme Court stated that executing juvenile killers violates "the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." If we are to move forward as a world super power and international sheriff, we need to first portray to the world that we can handle our own criminals in a constitutional manner.

For citizens of the United States that are under the age of 18, different standards are held: they are very limited in their actions and for anything concerning issues of legality, they need parental consent. They cannot legally buy cigarettes, alcohol or vote. For them to be executed for committing a murder when they don't even have a legal say in electing who is sentencing them is absurd.

The logic behind the reasoning follows the lines that, if juveniles cannot be held responsible for their actions when it comes to legal issues, how can they be expected to be punished in that same regard?

The issue raised by the Supreme Court was centered on the terms "cruel and unusual punishment." The issue lies with proper legal representation, and who can speak for the juveniles and their actions. In terms of maturity, a person who commits murder who is 17 and a half years old may not be much different from someone who just turned 18. However, it is not the maturity that is the issue, but the rights and stance that that person maintains in a court of law. The person's maturity level is not in question if they are convicted of murder, but rather their mental health and well-being.

Following that line of reasoning, juveniles are also not the most frequent committers of murder. They make up a very minimal portion of those convicted felons, prior to today's court decision, being found on Death Row. And, at a being at an impressionable age, by both peers and the law, proper punishment would be a better sentence than death. Because of their youth, it is more likely that they will learn from their actions and understand the reasoning behind them, rather than just being killed for committing those murders.

The Supreme Court, having wisely made their decision yesterday, has begun an effort to show the international arena that the United States is capable of reasoning and understanding. This decision will hopefully be one that will take a step toward uniting the nation behind the law.

In the name of freedom

Todd Hanaburgh

It is important at this point in United States history that we begin to actually be accountable for the things that we have done in the name of freedom.

The actions of our government during the Cold War hurt millions upon millions of innocent people needlessly, by shortsighted action to contain and suppress communism. In fact, I challenge anyone to conclusively show that our covert operations and underhanded meddling in global affairs during the Cold War did not actually cause most of the problems we as a nation are facing today.

For example, the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in 1979. The CIA responded by arming many militants within Afghanistan and Pakistan, or basically anyone who was willing to fight the Soviet army. In doing so, they supplied sensitive weapons technology and tactical training to randomly hired guns — pay attention here, because this is par for course for the CIA — often times groups and individuals who were already considered dangerous militant fanatics and terrorists. Two notable recruits/trainees of the Reagan Administration's Afghanistan project include Sheik Abdel Rahman, now world famous for his involvement in the first World Trade Center bombing, and our other favorite fall-guy, Osama bin Laden.

The U.S. achieved victory in Afghanistan when the U.S.S.R. withdrew its troops, over one million people were dead, the Taliban regime was gaining vast power and influence controlling most of the country and Afghanistan became the world's largest producer of heroin and other opiates.

The hunt for WMDs in Iraq was not fully unfounded in my mind, as the Reagan Administration provided Iraq with weapons, technology and training during the bloody Iran-Iraq War. In essence, the current Bush Administration was betting that Saddam had some of these weapons and programs left over from when we bestowed them upon him. Much to (not) everyone's surprise, the sanctions were actually working and Saddam Hussein was actually disarming. All other things aside, our government helped to award the Ba'athist Party control of Iraq in a 1963 coup, which led to a subsequent in-party coup that put Saddam Hussein in power.

If it weren't so tragic, it would almost be funny. Think about it:

... Instead of preventing the spread of tyranny and human suffering, we continuously perpetuate it by our inability to leave well enough alone.

we frantically manipulate forces in environments that we don't understand, in attempts to promote the greatest good. Here's the punch line: instead of preventing the spread of tyranny and human suffering, we continuously perpetuate it by our inability to leave well enough alone.

Chile, 1970s: a left leaning presidential candidate named Salvadore Allende gained widespread support and was ultimately elected president. Unfortunately, his policies scared the Nixon Administration, who wanted to avoid the creation of "another Cuba" in the Western Hemisphere. Naturally, the creation of any new communist or Marxist government was a threat to U.S. national security and was to be avoided at all costs. Nixon committed millions of dollars to CIA operations including massive propaganda campaigns as well as training and arming those who would carry out a coup or assassination attempt against this Socialist Allende.

In the CIA report on operations in Chile found at www.cia.gov/cia/reports/chile/index.html, Nixon and his National Security Advisor Henry Kissenger are described as being "... not concerned [about the] risks involved." This of course led to some of the darkest days of post-colonial Chilean history, the Pinochet Era. This dictator, who rose to power due to the U.S. sponsored coup, is easily the most despicable human rights abuser since Suharto of Indonesia (another CIA manipulation gone awry). Nixon said on Pinochet, "He may be a son of a bitch, but he's our son of a bitch."

It is exactly this reckless attitude that has landed the U.S. in innumerable sticky situations. What I am saying is that a step toward the right direction for our nation would be to globally proclaim our natural human fallibility, not arrogantly flaunting our political and economic influence or by employing a military enforcement of some "Pax Americana."

In the July/August 2004 issue of Foreign Affairs Magazine, Eliot Cohen wrote of "The Burdens of Empire" in which he explored our responsibility to police and shape the world. With this great power in our hands, the question is continually, "how and when shall we exercise this power?" Sadly missing from the debate is the question of whether or not we should.

The United States of America is indeed a nation of great power, often deluded or drunken on its own influence or so-called superiority. But perhaps it would be wise, for once, to admit that we don't know what the answers are, that we cannot know the best course of action, that the world may have to grow and develop without our interference. Yes, and to apologize for the horrors that our ignorance and carelessness have caused in the past.

Religion and politics don't mix

Amelia Sabadini

Ever hear a person likening the existence of reproductive health care clinics to the fulfillment of Adolf Hitler's dreams? You probably have if you've been reading this paper. Ever want to ask them how they can be so monumentally inconsiderate and selfishly intent on pushing their own agenda that they'll just blithely invoke the name of a man who instigated the deaths of millions of people for the sake of dramatically embellishing their argument?

Or why, incidentally, the anti-choice Catholic Church never did get around to excommunicating Hitler? Or maybe I would ask if the real reason that anti-choice proponents seem so eager to say they see Hitler's ghost is because they're trying to divert attention from the actual totalitarian bogeymen that are alive here and now, driving the assault on women's reproductive rights, the Christian Reconstructionists.

Christian Reconstructionists, also called Dominionists, firmly believe that there should be global implementation of biblical law. Such law would entail public executions for homosexuality, adultery, contraception, abortion and juvenile delinquency (just have that unwanted child, wait till they disobey you and then you can actually watch as they're burned alive at the stake, now that's fun for the whole family).

Wait, there's more. You can also face the death penalty for premarital sex if you're a woman, heresy, blasphemy (yes that means saying "God damn") and apostasy (refusal to believe in God — that of course being the God of the Christian Reconstructionists, not Allah or Buddah or whoever or whatever you thought you had a good spiritually fortifying relationship with). They sound pretty scary don't they? No way people with such extreme views could ever get into power right? Wrong.

Reconstructionist Rev. Timothy LaHaye is pals with Bush Jr. and has been credited with playing a major part in getting Bush into office, as has Reconstructionist, millionaire Howard Ahmanson. Bush has been basing his appointments and nominees to various positions and boards on spiritual and political affiliations rather than actual expertise. Rep. Joe Pitts (R - PA), Sen. Sam Brownback (R - KA) and majority leader Tom Delay (R - TX) are all supporters of the Reconstructist movement.

Some claim Bush is a Reconstructionist himself; he makes no secret of his belief in the rapture. There are also the senators and congressmen (including Sen. Zell flip-out-on-The-Daily-Show-live-clip Miller) who are co-sponsors and supporters of the Constitution Restoration Act of 2004, A.K.A. the you-can't-be-judged-if-you-were-acting-in-the-name-of-God act. Nearly every move made by the Bush Administration has been in accord with the ideals of the Reconstructionists and the unmitigated oppression of women isn't the only thing on their agenda.

Misogyny and homophobia provided the Reconstructionists with the opportunities they needed to infect our country's government. These people have gained power in leaps and bounds primarily by exploiting intolerance.

Reconstructionists are also all about global domination, the abolition of all social programs (like welfare and social security) and wanton waste and abuse of the environment and all natural resources. Apparently they figure that God gave humans — excuse me, men — the earth so it doesn't matter if the planet gets trashed. God will fix it as long as the new chosen people (as they like to call themselves) are in control and killing all the gays, misfits and disobedient women and children.

To me, expecting that God should drop everything and clean up after the most technologically advanced species on the planet sounds like a 31-year-old expecting that their mother should tie their shoes for them. Then again, Reconstructionists do believe that women should have the status of slaves. The Bible says a man can sell his daughters into slavery, although apparently there's some debate in Reconstructionist circles about slavery but, by verbatim interpretation of the bible, there's nothing wrong with enslaving people, particularly females you're related to. I guess the whole shoe tying bit would be par for the course.

Misogyny and homophobia provided the Reconstructionists with the opportunities they needed to infect our country's government. These people have gained power in leaps and bounds primarily by exploiting intolerance. Every vote someone casts in spite against their neighbor helps these agents of a vengeful God to further their agenda of absolute tyranny. The Reconstructionists might have started as a shadow in the conservative party but now they've metastasized and their malignancy knows no bounds.

Sure, not all Republicans are Reconstructionists, at least not in name but in deed, most elected Republicans vote for and propose legislation that concurs with Reconstructionist thinking.

Given how easy it would be to get yourself killed in a Reconstructionist/Dominionist theocracy, I would think most anti-choicers and homophobes have to stop and wonder if it's really worth it. Can anyone in their right minds be so hell bent (literally) on having their say in how complete strangers live their lives that they'd be willing to live under religious totalitarianism?

Is doing something like forcing a 42-year-old waitress who just accidentally got pregnant and already has two teenage kids, no husband, no health care and osteoarthritis to carry to term worth sacrificing the safety and freedom of yourself and everyone you know? Do you really have such a need to stop two consenting adults from getting married just because you don't consider their relationship to be legitimate, proper or anything other than something you watch on cable after dark, that you're willing to risk a biblical execution (stoning, burning or hanging) over it? There's just no way to oppress someone without ultimately oppressing yourself as well. You can't have your self-righteous cake and the freedom to eat it in a relatively safe, sane democratic society too.

Rethinking 'democracy' in Iraq

Ethan Burke

We are told the war in Iraq was not about Weapons of Mass Destruction. After all, it was about bringing "democracy" to Iraq. Mainstream debate has adopted the Bush Administration's new pretext for the war in Iraq: "Should the United States be bringing democracy to Iraq?" Even the so-called "liberal" news columnists like Thomas Friedman, Robert Kuttner, even "liberal" Hollywood actor Tim Robbins, ponder the efficacy of bringing "democracy" to Iraq.

We now know the Bush Administration lied to Congress and the American public. The Bush Administration was not misled, as many supporters of the President would like to believe. True, George Tenet and the CIA did take the fall, but it was Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld who created the Office of Special Plans designed to circumvent the CIA to come of up with new evidence in order to sell the Iraqi threat. It was George Bush who spoke those 16 words in the State of the Union Address after being told they were unfounded by George Tenet.

Condeleeza Rice assured us on the Sunday morning talk show "Meet the Press" that the administration was not lying explaining, "We forgot." The administration "forgot" that the only piece of evidence that Iraq was seeking nuclear weapons was based on poorly forged documents. Apparently they didn't talk to Dick Cheney, who had sent former Ambassador Joseph Wilson to check on the claim. Realizing the documents were fraudulent, Wilson submitted his report to the Vice President long before the State of the Union Address.

Why are we so quick to believe the Bush Administration is concerned about democracy in Iraq? The press seems to take at face value the Bush Administration's commitment to "freedom," "liberty," "democracy" and "human rights" simply because they say so.

We are now in the fifth term of the Reagan Administration with a new figurehead. The historical record during the first 12 years of the Reagan-Bush Administrations show absolute abhorrence for democracy when it conflicts with "US interests."

Paul Wolfowitz, the supposed "idealist," demonstrated his commitment to democracy by supporting the genocidal mass murdering Suharto regime in Indonesia serving as U.S. Ambassador to Indonesia. John Negroponte is now being rewarded with various promotions for his involvement in the massacres in Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador and Nicaragua. Dick Cheney and the Reagan Administration called Nelson Mandela and the African National Congress "terrorists" for opposing the racist apartheid regime and U.S. ally in South Africa.

We must ask how long the Bush Administration has had this vision of "democracy" in Iraq. When Saddam Hussein came to power, he found a U.S. ally eager to supply him with chemical and biological weapons materials in his wars against Iran, and Iraqis who opposed his regime.

In the early 1980's Donald Rumsfeld assured Hussein that the U.S. support would continue despite the use of chemical weapons against Iranian troops and U.S. sales of WMD actually increased after Saddam gassed the Kurds in Halabja in 1988, an event often cited today in denouncing the crimes of Hussein. In 1991, after the first Gulf War, when Iraqis rose up to overthrow the brutal dictator, the U.S. lifted the flight ban in order to allow Hussein to crush the rebellion.

Apparently U.S. support for a coup against democratically elected Haitian President Aristide, two coup attempts against Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez in recent years and the continual support for undemocratic brutal regimes in Colombia, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Egypt, to name a few, cast no doubt upon the "vision."

The Wall Street Journal is quite honest in explaining what is really meant by bringing "democracy" to Iraq. In an article titled, "Iraqis Wrestle with How to Exploit Oil," Chip Cummins tells us that "nationalist feelings about oil are still strong" among Iraqis who see their "national identity closely linked to Iraqi oil might." This would "make the idea of foreign investment harder to sell to the public than expected by some leading politicians."

Cummins assures the business community that the prospects for oil corporations are good, due to "high profile candidates" who are looking to "shake Iraq's state-controlled oil industry" continuing the "moves toward oil industry liberalization over the past two years introduced by the U.S. occupation government."

The Iraqis recently voted for the United Iraqi Alliance on a platform that calls for a "timetable for U.S. withdrawal," and the "use of Iraqi oil wealth for economic development projects." Iraqis must not understand; in a "democracy" these choices are not allowed.

If history is any indication, and the U.S. wins the war in Iraq, "democracy" will be restricted by economic liberalization. This will place Iraqi wealth in the hands of foreign corporations with collaborating Iraqi elite and government officials, who will own the newspapers, own the news stations, run the factories and monopolize the political system. As a result, Iraqis will be given no meaningful role as they vote every few years from a list of candidates who differentiate themselves with issues such as interpreting Islamic law and who is tougher on terrorism. At least there will be elections and we can all cheer for the Bush Administration's "vision of democracy" in Iraq.

Loving thy neighbors

Thomas Naughton

I am a senior still living on-campus, largely because if I am not directly on school premises I will never go to class and my days will spiral down into a debacle of "Golden Girls" reruns, a slew of Susan Lucci infomercials and hours of shouting back at the idiots on Fox News. Because I have an illustrious relationship with Housing Services which I cherish, I have been able to live alone for all but one of my eight-semester dance in the concrete jungle of UMass.

Without a roommate to love or hate, I have had quite a career of dealing with neighbors of all kinds, providing me with an amazing amalgamation of stories detailing the love, hate, fear, violence, fun, drugs, sex and ultimate insanity that transpires in the halls of our dorms.

Tales from the crypt: Sylvan

As a first year student, my very first dwelling place was Brown Hall, in the Sylvan area. Sylvan is like "The Shining"; you open the door to the hallway outside of your suite and you see ... nothing. Turn the corner, and some chopped up twins will offer you a sip of their Bud Light, but perhaps that was only a figment of your lonely imagination. I was lucky; I lived in the loudest suite in all of Sylvan. My suite included two sophomore engineering majors, two first-year frat pledges, some nice senior and his pretty girlfriend (they had sleepover parties, like, constantly) and two guys who smoked everything but their shoes.

Without a roommate to love or hate, I have had quite a career of dealing with neighbors of all kinds, providing me with an amazing amalgamation of stories detailing the love, hate, fear, violence, fun, drugs, sex and ultimate insanity that transpires in the halls of our dorms.

We were quite a family. The two engineering majors had a lot to prove and tried to escape the fact that they were complete nerds and idiots by drinking themselves into oblivion, trashing the bathroom and puking all over the place. In addition, they set fire to our lounge weekly, threw beer bottles out the window and played their nerdy video games with their sound blaring out of subwoofers — what a pair.

Then there were the two frat pledges: one named Jay and one named Frank, or something, who was the Engineering Twins tagalong. Jay was a princess, and would look around at the trashed suite and rancid bathroom with big eyes and shout at the door of the comatose engineers that he was glad he wasn't going to have to deal with this crap at the frat house next year (ha ha).

The last pair was Justin and his criminal sidekick, Brian. I think Justin's entire body is made of marijuana; a quick handshake could give you a real clean high and a new sense of direction. I love Justin and I still see him on campus today. I love Justin now because I wanted to kill him when we lived together for constantly making me sick with the pungent odor of nasty weed and his competing subwoofers that blasted me into mega-bass overload.

And his roommate, Brian, used to sell drugs and had a gun (I'm not sure if it was a Beebe gun), which I thought was funny. I'd always smile at him while he was doing business in the lounge, or beating someone up in the lounge, or being drunk and high out of his mind in the lounge. I think he got kicked out of school, or dissolved when the wrong chemicals mixed together.

Shaggletooth, the Republicans, a hammer and me: Baker.

Year two found me in Baker among the "chill" residents of Central. I lived in a double single that year, after I threw my most famous fit to date in the midst of a one Mr. Jones at Housing Assignments, who was not impressed in the least by my bratty pyrotechnics. Out of the goodness of their hearts and the fact that they didn't need the space, Mr. Jones and his team overlooked my crazy display and allowed me to stay in my cavernous room.

My hall was populated by a crew of first-year Republican boys who love their George W. Bush and their War on Terror like nobody's business. My neighbor to the left, however, is an entity known today as 'Shaggletooth': the young man suspended in the grunge era of the 90s. He would play terrible music, which should be forgotten, on the highest volume setting and then pluck his bass along with it. That was just the daytime.

At night, he would invite his unwashed masses of friends over for some Brew and Bass, a loud regular affair that would stretch into the wee hours of the morning. To combat the climbing noise when I was trying to sleep, I would simply pull out the hammer that was left by last year's occupants and hammer the wall until they were subdued. It was like the circus, and I was a lion tamer.

Last dance with the ladies who "Fonda": Central as a senior

I have left out my third year where I lived in Sylvan for one more round because it was uneventful in favor of writing about my final hall-mates, the ones who broke through and forced me to love them. When I go back to my room, I'm not a social person. I am usually exhausted when I return home and don't want to talk to anyone. This was easy with my former neighbors whom hated me and whom I wanted to hit with the left-behind hammer, but with my present neighbors, it has become quite a labor.

They were persistent, however, and after I felt guilty about waking them up at all hours of the morning with my broken alarm clock, something changed in my cold disposition and one night we actually hung out. They exercise to Jane Fonda videos and have "white trash" parties. As we got to know each other I kept thinking "if I didn't live next to these girls, we would totally be friends" — and then it hit me. Why am I afraid to have friends where I live?

They were the first neighbors I have ever hung out with and taking this chance has only given me more happiness where I live. Good neighbors are hard to find, and if you stop fighting it for a second, if you let people in, you too can be the belle of the ball at your first "white trash" party.

Social Security plan faulty

Andrew Freeman

Of all the things you may be planning ahead for — jobs, graduate school, marriage — I doubt that retirement is anywhere near the top of that list. If so, you may view the current firestorm over Social Security with confusion. However, a substantial portion of the population — the so-called "baby boomer" generation of the 50's and '60's — is set to retire within the next several decades, and they are intimately concerned with the fate of Social Security. Most of our parents are part of this generation.

Social Security, created in 1935, was part of the New Deal that Franklin Delano Roosevelt passed during the Great Depression. The system distributes checks to retired workers over the age of 65, as well as providing benefits such as payments to their spouses or minor children. At the time, the program did not affect many, since the average life expectancy was around 60 years, and the amounts paid out were small.

Today, the average life expectancy is 77 years and Social Security is paid to over 40 million people, almost a third of which are not retired. The estimated outlays for Social Security in fiscal year 2004 were in excess of $530 billion, and for 2005 they are more than $555 billion, according to the Social Security Administration.

Social Security is paid for through federal payroll taxes of current workers, deducted from your paycheck automatically. This money does not go into a trust fund and later withdrawn for you, but is spent immediately for Social Security benefits of current retirees. This system — taxing young and middle-aged to pay for the aging — is solvent and will be for the next several decades.

However, the Bush Administration, as part of its "ownership society" drive, has been pushing the creation of private Social Security accounts as a solution to a 'crisis.' There is no crisis. Bush has been pushing the Social Security Administration's estimate that the system will stop running at a surplus in 2042, but that date assumes the worst economic growth rate in the U.S. since the Great Depression — 1.8 percent per year from 2015-2080. Even if that were the case, the program will still be solvent for 30 years, and tax increases could easily be passed around the by time it stumbles.

The idea of a massive borrowing spree to handle a future financial crisis is insane, like running up thousands of dollars in credit card debt because you're worried about paying off a future mortgage.

Worse, the proposed solution of private accounts would do nothing for the finances of Social Security, and it might create fiscal insecurity.

The Administration's proposal calls for massive borrowing of over $1 trillion to create private accounts, which would allow individuals to invest some of their payroll taxes in the stock market, theoretically resulting in higher returns. The idea of a massive borrowing spree to handle a future financial crisis is insane, like running up thousands of dollars in credit card debt because you're worried about paying off a future mortgage.

Moreover, most people do not have the skills, time or knowledge to manage an account full of stocks, meaning many would turn their money over to a mutual fund to invest for them. Unfortunately, the returns one makes from a mutual fund would be reduced by the brokerage fees the fund pays on each transaction it makes — because you're paying a business to invest for you, they take a substantial amount off the top. Even if you invest entirely on your own, the market could crash, or your stocks could fall, and you would lose most of your money.

Like many Bush proposals, the true intent of private accounts is to benefit corporations and the financial elite. Individuals who invest professionally and have significant assets can gamble with their social security accounts, and stand to gain substantially more than those who invest conservatively and lack funds or knowledge. Moreover, the investment banks stand to gain enormous revenue, if millions more people place funds into the market and trade stocks, or buy mutual funds.

Meanwhile, ordinary workers would see their retirement funds crest and fall, or evaporate altogether, and the government would risk even larger deficits. Private accounts would not create fiscal security in society, they would eliminate it, by exposing everyone to the vagaries of the market, which caused the Great Depression and led to Social Security in the first place.

Shakespeare and synchronicity

Colin Jones

Maybe I seem like a one-trick pony at this point. My columns have been about life and its lessons for some time now, and I can understand why, in this time and place, such subjects might be seen as too deep or heavy. If you happened to meet me randomly, you probably would never think of me as someone who is deeply philosophical. I wear a lot of metal band t-shirts, and frequently utter the words "dude," "man," "cool" and "awesome." I habitually toe the line between being introverted and extroverted.

Writing these columns has given me an opportunity to express myself in a meaningful way, and a chance to try and use such expressions for a greater purpose. The reason why I've been writing about things like taking chances and finding spirituality is largely because I have discovered these things recently for myself, and believe they could be rewarding for everyone. It may seem overly idealistic or cliché, but the truth is that to this day I am still fascinated by life and I like to share that fascination.

Did you ever get the sense that there is an importance and meaning to your actions? That when you look back at the sum total of your collective experiences, every occurrence happened for a reason, and that your actions can have purpose beyond your understanding? There is actually a term for this feeling, coined by the psychologist and philosopher Carl Jung. Synchronicity.

Put simply, synchronicity is finding personal significance in seemingly random events. For example, maybe a song you've heard reminded you of an old friend and prompted you to call them. Or you had a class early in your college career that you took for easy credit, only to find that it fascinated you, leading you to change your major and follow a new dream. These situations do invariably present themselves from time to time, and once in a while the measure of coincidence can be so large that it can cause you to believe that there really are forces at work, acting in ways unknown and unseen.

To quote one of my favorite films, Paul Thomas Anderson's "Magnolia," "There are stories of coincidence and chance, of intersections and strange things told, and which is which and nobody knows, and we generally say that if that was in a movie, we'd never believe it." But the fact is that these things do happen.

In my life, the frequency with which I have encountered such situations has caused me to undergo a fundamental transformation, from being an unquestioning atheist to becoming highly philosophical and spiritual. It's not to say that I have found religion exactly, but rather that I believe intersections and experiences work to weave a tapestry with a design beyond our understanding.

... If you can view everything as happening for one reason or another, it can remind you that what you put in is what you'll get out, and it's not what you've got, but it's what you give.

While there is no way to prove whether or not there is meaning or importance to the nature of existence, if you view things in this way, you'll find that it allows you to see every day as unique and different, filled with opportunities to learn. And if you can view everything as happening for one reason or another, it can remind you that what you put in is what you'll get out, and it's not what you've got, but it's what you give.

Lately the situations that have presented themselves to me in a "synchronized" way have been positive. I have already written about how a day prior to my own arrival in Ireland, a friend of mine on exchange at the same school bummed a cigarette off a fellow American outside the steps to his apartment building. Subsequently, I met the kid, learned that he had an empty room in his apartment, moved in, and developed some of the best friendships I ever have. One of my buddies, a Frenchman from Lyon, actually came to stay with me over the intersession and said that he would return the favor anytime.

I have also experienced a great deal of adversity in my life, and it made me into someone I didn't like being. For a number of years, I felt at a loss about my life. I was miserable and self-defeating. I couldn't understand what was right or what was precious. But gradually I opened my eyes, and realized that coming across such difficulties and overcoming them has allowed me to develop talents and ideas I might not have achieved otherwise.

And though I wish that a number of things had gone differently, the way that I have come to understand creation of personal character is directly related to how well we can overcome the obstacles we face. Da Vinci's Mona Lisa is just a bunch of smears of paint. Michalangelo's David is just thousands of bits with a hammer. All of us are thousands of bits and pieces put together in just the right way. And like these timeless works of art, we too have the ability to touch people, with our strength, our courage and our compassion.

Shakespeare may have had it right when he said that all the world was a stage and that we're all merely players. We all play roles in each others lives; even our smallest interactions can impact the world in ways we can't even imagine. To quote Mr. Jung himself, "As far as we can discern, the sole purpose of human existence is to kindle a light in the darkness of mere being."

A Red Sox rioter reformed

Brian J. Leibinger

"Stop struggling or you'll make it worse! You're under arrest."

That was the last thing I heard before pepper spray burned and blinded me and I felt the cold, pinching metal on my wrists that could only be handcuffs. Soon after, I found myself squeezed into the back of a paddy wagon with the rest of the would-be rioters. Sitting there, with tears, drool and snot pouring out of my burning face, I probably should have resolved not to go to any more riots. That, however, was not in my thoughts, nor was it my last night that week in jail.

I'm sure I'm not the only person who has done something so stupid that it becomes a landmark in your life. It's the kind of thing you replay in your head over and over and wonder, "My God, what was I thinking?" I'd like to describe one of those things to you, with hopes that it may deter even one person from making my mistake.

What we as students need to try to do is move beyond the juvenile and destructive impulses that drive us to behave this way. Damaging property, lighting fires and hurting each other is not just dismissed as asinine "ZooMass" behavior anymore.

I can't imagine that anyone has forgotten the Red Sox ALCS and World Series victories this past fall. I'm also sure that many of you remember the riots that followed them. You may have been there or heard about them afterwards. Some of you may have even had friends that were arrested or been arrested yourselves. I have the distinguishing characteristic of having been arrested at both riots.

I ask myself, as you may be, "how can anyone be so stupid?" Well, there are a lot of factors, but not very many excuses. I won't bore you with them, because I'm sure everyone who attended the riots had their reasons. The truth is that there is no reason and no circumstance to excuse this kind of behavior.

You may tell yourself, as I did, that you won't do anything stupid, or get in any trouble — you just want to celebrate. I thought that, but the truth is that people who just want to celebrate don't go to riots. Even if your intentions are innocent, you know what they say about the road to hell. I didn't do anything violent to get myself arrested. I didn't overturn cars, light fires or start fights. I was just there, on the front line, shouting and cheering with the best of them. The point is that you can and will get in trouble, and you don't have to do anything extreme for it to happen.

I have witnessed firsthand the consequences resulting from this adolescent and dangerous behavior, and I assure you, it isn't worth it. I have over $600 in court fees and fines. I have over 100 hours of community service. I have one year of probation, random drug screenings and monthly progress reports. I have missed classes to spend the day in court and lost sleep worrying about it. Most of us were suspended for at least one semester. What's more, my penalties are far from the most severe. My roommate spent 10 days in counts jail and another friend is facing very serious felony charges.

You may tell yourself, as I did, that you won't do anything stupid, or get in any trouble — you just want to celebrate. I thought that, but the truth is that people who just want to celebrate don't go to riots. Even if your intentions are innocent, you know what

What we as students need to try to do is move beyond the juvenile and destructive impulses that drive us to behave this way. Damaging property, lighting fires and hurting each other is not just dismissed as asinine "ZooMass" behavior anymore.

The cost of the actions to our school, our families and each other for one night of alcohol and adrenalin-driven rebellion is much higher than we imagine. The cost to our reputations, not as scholars, but as savages; the cost to the university to control us, translating into higher fees and stricter rules for us; the cost to human life, we all know a story or two.

In conclusion, I would like to take this opportunity to apologize to the UMass and Amherst Police, for the long hours and dangerous situations we forced on them. All I can say is that I hope my actions and the consequences thereof are something a few of you will consider before next time.

Cell phone buyers may have to wait for the next big thing

But the consumer has just one question: what's left?

By Terry Maxon
The Dallas Morning News

This year, consumers will be able to buy cell phones that snap photos, shoot videos, play music, send and receive messages, keep track of appointments and people, play games, browse the Internet and display live television.

So what do most Americans do with their cell phones? They talk.

Industry analysts are predicting that the rate of growth in cell phone sales will slow down in 2005. A primary reason: Most consumers won't feel compelled to replace their phones with ones offering new bells and improved whistles, at least not yet.

Put another way, nearly everyone who had to have a camera and color screen has bought one, and the Next Big Thing isn't here yet.

A consensus among analysts is that 2004 sales finished with around 630 million to 650 million units worldwide, up more than 20 percent from 2003's sales of about 510 million.

The guess is that 2005 sales will climb over 700 million. Research firm Gartner Inc. pegs 2005 sales at around 720 million phones, while another research firm, IDC, is predicting 703 million.

"We're looking for the market to take a deep breath in 2005," IDC analyst Alex Slawsby said. "Now, growth is still going to occur. I mean, 10 percent growth is still something, but it's nothing like we saw last year with growth of over 130 million units, a real significant change."

Lance Wilson, director of wireless research at ABI Research, said 2005's sales growth globally will depend to a great extent on the speed at which India and China expand their population of potential cell phone users.

"Every year more and more of those people move up into the context of what defines their middle class, and those people will be buying phones," Wilson said.

In much of the industrialized world, growth will be slower because "almost everybody has phones. The penetration rate is very, very high. What you have are people replacing phones with newer phones," Wilson said.

Gartner analyst Hugues de la Vergne agreed. "Mature replacement markets like North America are starting to slow as most consumers have purchased a new mobile device in the past 18 months, and there isn't as much a compelling need to upgrade to newer devices," he said.

Several manufacturers have also warned of slowing growth. Major cell phone maker Motorola Inc. said in January it expects its first-quarter revenue to run $7.5 billion to $7.9 billion, only slightly higher than last year's $7.4 billion in first-quarter revenue. By contrast, Motorola's revenue jumped $1.9 billion, or 27 percent, to $8.8 billion in fourth quarter 2004 compared to a year earlier.

Qualcomm Inc., which provides the technology for a number of wireless phone companies, also gave a discouraging forecast for first-quarter sales.

As the cell phone industry matures in many markets, the number of new customers shrinks. Therefore, it takes something new, a "killer application," to bring in new customers and get existing customers to change phones and pay for added services.

Fred Cohen, a senior director at Texas Instruments Inc., traced the evolution of cell phone design and the introduction of improvements.

"Initially, the market concentrated on size and power, increasing the battery life. Then we moved into basically innovative industrial design," he said.

That was when the cell phone makers introduced "clamshells," the phones that folded closed; "swivels," in which one section of the phone could be turned; and "sliders," where panels would slide out to reveal new functions.

Next, manufacturers put color liquid crystal displays on their phones, and then dual displays, then made the displays bigger.

"The next wave of innovation, which has already started, is multimedia," Cohen said.

To use multi-media to its full advantage, the cell phone industry is rolling out third generation networks and technology, known as 3G. The 3G technology will allow much faster transmission of data than the existing second generation (2G) or 2.5G networks.

At its simplest, it could mean that users wouldn't have to wait long to download a song to their cell phone or send a photo or video to a friend. But it also makes possible a more natural-looking television picture — not the jerky, marginal-quality videolike the images sent by satellite phones from war zones.

While 3G networks are common in Asia and Europe, they are still being deployed in the United States. It probably will be 2006 before all the major cellular phone companies have finished rolling out their 3G versions, some sooner than others.

Verizon Wireless, which has been marketing 3G services aimed more at business customers, launches its consumer-oriented VCAST service Feb. 1, offering downloadable video, games, music and other services.

AT&T Wireless had rolled out a 3G network in six cities before Cingular Wireless closed its purchase of AT&T last October. Cingular, which plans to expand its 3G capabilities in 2005, launched its MobiTV service to customers in January.

Updating its earlier, slower version of 3G, Sprint Corp. is launching a new 3G network this year based on the EV-DO technology also used by Verizon. Nextel

Magic lacking in latest 'Discover Your Lover'

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

It seems like they were destined to be together, or at least be really good friends. The two fun loving people paired on this date we both geared up to have a great time.

Silk, a football player with 14 cats and an original personality climbed into the Escalade a little worried about who he would be going on the date with. Jenny, a girl who loves to be goofy and have fun had already been trying to hunt down the identity of her date and did not seem very surprised to see Silk.

The two were a little cautious around one another but eventually loosened up. Silk brought along pictures of his cats to show Jenny, who seemed to simply love them. After a scenic drive though South Hadley and a quick call to On-Star the couple arrived at Ochoa Day Spa. The beautiful spa gave Silk and Jenny a chance to relax and escape the rigors of college for little while.

Jenny got the Sidda Body Detox treatment along with the hydrotherapy tub treatment and massage. Silk received a self-heating marine mud wrap, the hydrotherapy tub treatment and an aromatherapy steam.

"It smelt like sushi," Silk said. "I felt like a burrito."

Silk either had food or something else on his mind; after there treatment Jenny and Silk met to have tea in their robes. "I guess its porn time," was Silk's first comment. "I feel very relaxed" Jenny said. After the two changed it was back to the car, but Jenny was lucky to have such a nice guy with here because not only did she get a ride home, but also a piggy back ride to the car.

After showering and changing the two were back together heading to Spoleto's in North Hampton for some fine dining. After much deliberation as to what to order the two spent their time talking and getting to know one another. They shared a bottle of wine with a toast to "many more fun times together."

There was much talk about taking the bottle of wine with them but then found out it was against the law. This however did not dampen their spirits as Silk and Jenny headed for The Pub to see The Free Radicals.

In the car Silk decided to call his mother who "voted for [Jenny] like 30 times." This abnormal event did not seem to faze Jenny who "likes talking to parents." Jenny and Silk's mom hit it off just as much as Jenny and Silk did. Some interesting information also came to light; it seems that silk got his name "because he came out smooth as silk."

At The Pub Jenny was not put off by the fact that Silk did not drink. She actually respected him for it very much, and thought it was one of his most admirable traits. "I think it is pretty cool," Jenny said, "how he could have a good time without drinking."

At the pool table things did not worked out in Silk's favor. Even though he claimed that he "let her win," he knows the truth: "she kicked my [butt]." Jenny said there was no way that he let her win "I beat him! I'm actual good at pool."

Even though at dinner Silk vehemently denied that he was a good dancer, he proved himself wrong on the dance floor. Jenny thought Silk was a good dancer and Silk felt that they were "very comfortable" with one another, both on and off the dance floor.

Unlike past dates this couple went home in the same car. After trying to get Jenny home she realized she forgot her keys, so it was on to Silk's dorm. After a very sweet goodnight kiss Silk went into his room and Jenny went in search of her roommates.

Silk was unsure as to where he thought the relationship may go. He did not regret a bit of the "amazing date," thinking that Jenny is "very sweet." Silk did not seem too confident that an intimate relationship would develop but he was a hundred percent sure that "she could ultimately be a good friend" which he would love to hang out with again.

Even though Jenny's memory of the last part of the date is a little hazy, she is on the same page as Silk, "I don't see a relationship, but I definitely had fun." Jenny would love to hang out with Silk again thinking he was really funny and goofy.

The success of a date does not necessarily lie in whether someone got lucky or even if a relationship ensues. This date was successful because two people went out and had a great time together and want to do it again.

Recent studies show eating disorders rising in males

By Howard Cohen
Knight Ridder Newspapers

MIAMI — Max Turner realized he had a problem when his weight topped out at 95 pounds. The 19-year-old is 5 feet, 11 inches.

"So skewed was my view of myself, that I did not even realize that I had lost any weight until I went to the campus health center for a regular check-up and saw my weight," the University of Southern California student said via e-mail.

For Buck Winthrop, a writer/publicist in Miami Beach, the challenge is fighting his food obsession. "I eat one M&M and have to call 1-800-Jenny, literally. You think about every morsel you put in your mouth and how it will translate. My whole life revolves around that."

Eating disorders they're not just for women anymore.

With six-pack abs and toned triceps plastered across magazine covers and ads, a growing number of men and boys are contending with anorexia, binge-and-purge eating and obsessive workouts.

"Men have a long way to go to catch up (to women) but they are closing the gap," says Dr. Leigh Cohn, coauthor of "Making Weight: Men's Conflicts With Food, Weight, Shape & Appearance" (Gurze Books, $14.95).

PRETEENS, TOO.

Ten years ago, one out of 10 males had an eating disorder; today, it's two in 10 and spiraling down to the preteen set, research shows.

"Ten years ago it was unheard of for a guy to have bulimia," said Dan Montesi, a counselor at Belen Preparatory School, the Jesuit private school in West Miami-Dade for boys in grades six to 12. "I'm seeing more and more of it, and not just at Belen but across the board."

An April 2001 report in the Journal of the American Psychiatric Association said one male suffered from anorexia for every four females; for bulimia it's one male for every eight to 11 females.

Communications Inc., which had been weighing which 3G technology to buy, has agreed to merge with Sprint and is expected to use the same 3G technology. T-Mobile USA Inc. has not yet chosen a third-generation technology.

With demand not as strong, the fight for market share among major cell phone makers will be even fiercer in 2005. In 2004, market leader Nokia Oyj saw its market share drop early in the year, but gained some share back with an aggressive low-price strategy.

Nokia's market share was just under 31 percent in third quarter 2004, Gartner said. That was down more than 3 percentage points from a year earlier, but up from the upper 20s earlier in the year.

Even with the slippage in market share, "Nokia still has shipped double the volume of its nearest competitor," IDC's Slawsby said.

The Gartner report showed that Samsung Electronics Co. had slipped past Motorola for the No. 2 position worldwide in the third quarter, but Motorola claims to have regained second place in the fourth quarter.

Its RAZR phone, an ultra-slim clamshell phone, sold well despite its $599.99 list price ($499.99 with a two-year contract with Cingular). In all, Motorola said it shipped 31.8 million phones in the fourth quarter and gained 3 percentage points of market share, going from 13.4 percent in third quarter 2004 to 16.6 percent last quarter.

"I think it's kind of accepted that there has been some positive momentum for Motorola for the fourth quarter of the year," Slawsby said.

Wilson of ABI said Nokia vigorously defended the low-cost segment in 2004, forcing other manufacturers to focus more on the mid-range and high-end handsets. He said he expects Nokia to continue that focus, while also trying to raise its average selling price per phone.

"Motorola has a more focused goal. It's to really go after Nokia in the U.S. And I think you want to watch Samsung. Samsung and Motorola are in a protracted battle. I don't think that's going to change," he said.

LG Electronics Inc., which ranked fifth in Gartner's list behind the top three and No. 4 Siemens AG, isn't content with 10 percent growth. It said in January its goal in 2005 is ship 62 million cell phones, up 41 percent from 2004's 44 million.

Although carriers are touting their high-speed networks already, Slawsby said widespread availability of 3G networks and handsets is still a ways off.

"For the next several years, the vast majority of phones that are going to be sold are going to be 2.5G cell phones, even though there's all kinds of talk about 3G, third generation," he said.

Until then, there'll be as much hype and promise as reality. He expects 3G technology and phones to become a lot more available in 2006, with growing availability of digital TV sent live to handsets.

"We think that's going to be a catalyst which is going to help propel the market toward some renewed growth in 2006 or 2007," he said. "But none of those technologies are mass-market technologies today. They're only high-end, early adopter technologies. We kind of feel like we're in a lull right now. We're in between the major catalysts."

'Oddworld' returns

It has been years since Abe last went on an adventure to save his alien r a c e , Mudokons, from the evil Glukkon aliens of "Oddworld." This year the developers at "Oddworld Inhabitants" created forth episode of the popular "Oddworld" series with "Oddworld: Stranger's Wrath."

Unlike the puzzle platforms of the last three "Oddworld" games, "Stranger's Wrath" is a third and first person shooter. It gets players involved in a whole new and strange, no pun intended, side of Oddworld. You will run into a few familiar faces from past games, but Abe and the Mudokons have been left out.

"Oddworld: Stranger's Wrath"
X-Box
Publisher: Electronic Arts
Developer: Oddworld Inhabitants
Rated T for Teen

Gamers will take control of a mysterious bounty hunter who is apparently in dire need of a surgery to survive. With each bounty job you will have the option to take the prisoner in dead or alive. Alive being the better option because it pays more.

The stranger does not use any ordinary bullets or bombs. He uses live Oddworld critters to deal with the thugs. One of them being the Chippunk: a big mouthed chipmunk that will harass nearby thugs to try and stomp it out. While the thugs are trying to stomp out the little trash-talking rodent, nail them with a Bolamite to tie them up and bag them for a decent reward. Other items such as Thud Slugs and Bomb Bats deal damage, along with making boss fights much easier.

As you move on to tougher bounties you will learn a little more about the stranger and you will pick up some weapon, defensive, and melee upgrades. You can increase your endurance to shake off and recover your health, plus you will be able to run greater distances. Just remember that it is not necessary to buy ammo since you can easily find most of the critters for free in Oddworld.

One of the great features of "Stranger's Wrath" is the game speak. By pressing the X button, the stranger will give you a hint as to what your next move should be. You can always talk to the locals to get directions, but do not always expect a polite answer. The developers have created over 5,000 different responses for the town's people to say in response to your questions. There is even a moment that will make fans of the "Chappelle Show" laugh.

The ability to move between first-person and third-person views is very smooth. There are situations where you will favor one sight over the other. It makes the game more fresh compared to past "Oddworld" games and adds to the game's storyline. While you will have moments of confusion in first-person as you are bombarded by enemy lire, simply switch back to third-person and bolt out of the area. Otherwise you may find yourself strung up by some alien thugs.

What really makes "Oddworld: Stranger's Wrath" very solid is the storyline accompanied by sleek graphics. The developers did their jobs superbly by creating a whole new look for a world that's used to being 2D. As you progress you learn more and more, until you slowly go towards a semi-shocking ending. Each character has their own personality when it comes to reacting to your character. The animation for the full-motion video sequences makes you feel like you are watching a motion picture and not a video game. The stranger has a lot more depth than the Abe character had. It would not be surprising to see a sequel involving Abe and the stranger to be made.

"Stranger's Wrath" is a must have for any X-Box owner that appreciates a quality game. The replay value for it is not very high, but you can retry the game after beating it to try different tactics in areas or seeking out hidden areas you missed the first time around. If anything, gamers can go back to listen to all 5,000 phrases the town's people have for you.

"Oddworld: Stranger's Wrath" is currently available only on X-Box.

'Cursed' will make you yelp, howl in agony

By Kevin Dugan
The Greyhound

BALTIMORE — "What doesn't kill you makes you stronger."

If this tagline from "Cursed" holds true, then I must be one strong mother after having seen it. Yet while I made it out of the movie alive, my hope for another good Wes Craven horror movie or frightening film in general has definitely been shot dead.

Wes Craven is the guy who brought you many horror movies, most notably the "Scream" trilogy. While the "Scream" movies are incredibly fun to watch (at least the first one anyway), Craven and the rest of horror movie directors seem to have lost whatever touch they once had. Recent abominations like "Hide and Seek," "Darkness" and "The Boogeyman" are now brown stains on the previously clean record of the scare genre. Nowadays, people need to bring over Japanese creations like "The Ring" or "The Grudge" even to get a mild fright out of audiences, let alone entertain them for a couple of hours.

"The Cursed" plot does a good job of remaining relatively simple. A brother and sister (Jesse Eisenberg and Christina Ricci) are on a drive home in Hollywood one lovely evening when they get into a crash. In the mess of the wreck, they get bitten by a huge wolf-like creature (I'll ruin the movie and tell you It's a werewolf). After that, the siblings realize they are cursed and have to face retribution from the monster that could not finish the job off the first time ... with sexy results.

It is pretty tough to gauge the acting talent in the movie. Lord knows, Christina Ricci is cut out for creepy parts. The way she dealt with ghouls and ghosts in "Casper" and "Sleepy Hollow," as well as being the most demented child imaginable as Wednesday of "The Addams Family," show that she knows how to handle her horror. Having seen Cursed it seems as if now that Ricci is doomed to have only been successful in this kind of role as a child or teen and not an adult.

Jesse Eisenberg, Ricci's little brother in the film, does surprisingly well. He has been in only a few films so far, but for having such little acting support in 'Cursed' he does a great job of holding his own.

Having people like Joshua Jackson and Scott Baio showing you the acting ropes in your biggest movies to date is not exactly the ideal scenario for a young actor. Yes, you heard correctly, Scott-freaking-Baio. Eisenberg, though, gives a good performance in spite of the laughable acts given by Pacey and "Charles in Charge" himself.

The movie is really not what you'd expect it to be. The trailer makes it seem like you will be scared at every turn when really the movie aims more to be lighthearted humor with a simple backdrop of terror.

Astoundingly, I did laugh a few times during the movie. The problem here, though, is that only half of my laughter was after a punch line. The other half I was questioning whether or not I had just seen the utterly ridiculous things I thought I had seen. A werewolf giving the middle finger to someone is pushing it just a little bit, at least in my eyes.

If you're a true fan of horror, stay home and wait for something better to come along. Fine, if you refuse to listen to me, then think of it this way: when was the last time you saw a Scott Baio movie that you liked? That's what I thought.

Wes Kraven's latest horror film project "Cursed," co-starring Jesse Eisenberg and Christina Ricci, is being considered his worst effort in the genre to date.

Eating disorders not exclusive to women in pro athletics exacerbates the problem, Montesi says. "I'm seeing a lot of guys chomping at the bit to get into the weight room to get big. When I was in school there were a couple sports teams in there.

Now a whole slew of kids are going in there to fit an image."

It's not just teens.

"I went crazy on every diet in the world," said the 42-year-old Winthrop.

Recently, he underwent liposuction to get rid of the extra layer around his midsection.

"It made me happier. If I binge and gain weight in other places and look strange it's back to the drawing board," says Winthrop, who goes to the gym twice a day, sometimes six days a week.

A slip-and-fall accident in September caused Winthrop to curtail his workouts. He has gained 12 pounds, carrying 200 pounds on a six-foot, one-inch frame. He admits to binging but never purging. "I can't imagine doing something like that."

But, increasingly, men are, although many are hesitant to get help, experts say.

"The stigma of being a man with a woman's disorder is huge and prevents men from seeking treatment," says Dr. Paula Levine, the director of the Anorexia & Bulimia Resource Center in Coral Gables, Fla.

"Eating disorders are off the radar as far as most doctors are concerned. They don't even conceive of male eating disorders. It must be something else wrong if that person is losing weight."

Additionally, many men believe eating disorders are a woman's disease, despite the proliferation of chiseled men in magazines, ads and TV shows. (Just look at Desperate Housewives and Jesse Metcalfe, the perpetually shirtless, hunky hedge-clipper who's having an affair with the gorgeous Gabrielle (Eva Longoria) on the Sunday night show.)

Magazine motivation

"Have you been to the airport lately? There are almost as many male magazines as female magazines," Levine says.

Such images, coupled with diet advertisements pitched to men, are fueling the increase in male eating disorders.

"Media images do motivate me, even though as a former talent agent ... I know that what we see is often digitally enhanced so no one could attain that. Nonetheless, it is a motivating factor," Winthrop acknowledges.

To counter this, Levine, Cohn and the National Eating Disorders Association recently presented a multimedia discussion with the topic poor body images and unhealthy attitudes toward food.

"The pressures on men have changed over the years. We have a growing number of advertisers who realize they have sold diets to every woman, so they have targeted them to men," Cohn says.

"Watch TV. You've seen more men with their shirts off," Cohn notes. "You can show a male nipple. You do that with even one nipple on a woman and it changes our culture as you saw on the Super Bowl. But frontal nudity on a man above the waist is thought to be sexy."

Over the past few years, though, more men have learned about the disorder and are beginning to act.

In the past decade, the number of males seeking treatment at the Bella Vita Programs, an eating disorder center in Pasadena, Calif., rose 50 percent, said clinical psychologist Dr. Patricia Pitts, the center's executive director.

Fifteen percent of her patients are now men, compared with seven percent 10 years ago.

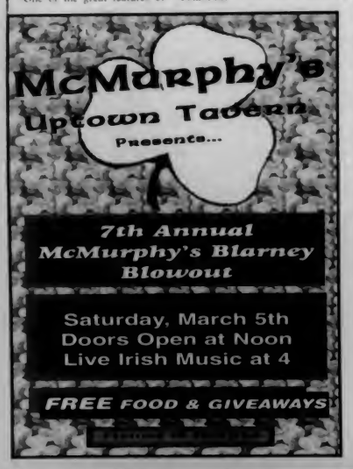
Turner, the USC college student, turned for help there. He says his eating disorder began around age 14, prompted by a move to a new state.

"The stress of moving at such a pivotal age and having to make all new friends in a new environment no doubt contributed a feeling of unmanageability to my life," he said.

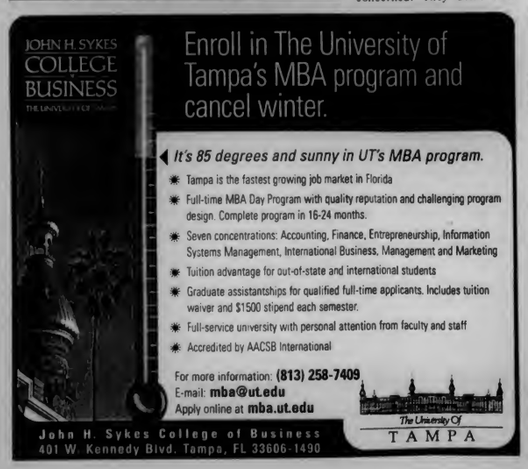
"Food was the one thing that remained controllable and manageable. Hence, I began to control my food intake, not necessarily with the intent of losing weight, but merely to have something to control," he says.

Mother's vision

His mother started to push him to gain weight, he said. "She worked at a gym, and it seemed to me that she always had a vision of me fitting some masculine ideal."



Leaving home for college exacerbated the problem.



"Once again I found my life in a state of flux, and once again I turned to food to get a sense of control," he says. "I now did not have my mother covertly countering my disordered eating habits. My weight plummeted from around 125 pounds in high school to 95 pounds."

Turner spent five months at Bella Vita as both an inpatient and outpatient, conferring with psychologists, psychiatrists and a dietitian. In November he was discharged at a healthier 140 pounds — "and a whole new outlook on life."

A new study has found a direct link between excessive work out and eating disorders such as anorexia, especially in men.

A hazy recollection of some long road trips

Jeff Howe

It was as if we were leaving on a U.S. Naval ship heading for war.

As the Ford Taurus wagon was being packed full of bags, pillows, boxes of magazines and tons of food and soda, there was a gathering of supporters waiting by, wishing us well and giving us some last-second advice.

We were about to embark on a journey of epic proportions, a hiatus from reality, as we would leave everything we knew to head west.

No, we weren't driving to the unknowns of California to figure our lives out by hanging in the Hollywood hills and hobnobbing with the bearers of unfulfilled dreams.

Instead, the five of us were leaving the fast-paced and lively east coast to head to the middle of nowhere: South Bend, Ind.

Five Lowell boys — well, three from Lowell and two University of Massachusetts Lowell students — would spend the next 15 hours of our lives in a station wagon heading to the college football Mecca of the universe.

We would reunite with our Irish-blooded friend, a Lowellian himself who was living his dream as a Notre Dame student, and we would watch ND host Navy on Saturday afternoon.

The stage was set.

Thursday, Nov. 6, 2003, sometime around midnight. Lowell, Mass.

The Internet wasn't going to help us on this trip.

A line from "Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back" could tell you why.

We would use the five — arguably — full brains in the car in addition to a handy road map to bring us to our destination.

Fifteen hours really isn't that long of a time — when you're doing anything that doesn't involve driving to Indiana, which has all of one or two useful square miles within its borders — so it turned out that we would have a lot of time to kill.

No one would listen to headphones or segregate themselves from the crowd during this trip. The only way to steer clear of ready conversation would be to sacrifice oneself to "the pod."

At first glance, the pod looked unsafe at best, for it was the back portion of the station wagon that was filled with everyone's necessities, but with some creativity and proper landscaping, the pod became somewhat of a royalty.

No normally sized human being could comfortably make a home in the pod, but our smallest companion, who by our estimations may not top out at more than five feet tall, best-fit the situation.

He was smart, too. He put his graduate student status at ULowell to use and made the pod into the most desirable seat in the wagon, even more so than shotgun.

But if it weren't for his creative genius, we would still look at the pod as a clustered dumpster rather than as a king's chair.

So we let him keep it throughout the trip, for he deserved it, not because of his physical makeup but for his mental toughness in handling what first seemed to be a roadblock on our journey to meet Touchdown Jesus.

Time was moving along for the most part. A rest stop here and there would wake anyone up momentarily, but there was something difficult about being in the same state for hours on end.

Upstate New York can be tough on anyone, but it was once in upstate New York that showed us the true value of a road map.

Saturday, Aug. 16, 2003, late afternoon, somewhere in upstate New York.

We had long since left Cooperstown and were driving back home.

It was a similar crew to the one that would travel to Notre Dame — the three Lowell boys plus our Irish-blooded friend — in a classic Oldsmobile that was big enough to take the four of us to the Baseball Hall of Fame with enough extra room to carry the asterisk that will reside next to Barry Bonds' name in Cooperstown's record books in the back seat.

I took everything in, as it was my first experience in Cooperstown. We did the rah-rah touristy stuff, minus the fanny packs, gray tube socks and brown sandals.

We even went to a presentation about the Curse of the Bambino, figuring we would learn something new.

We were wrong.

It was put on by an intern who was on his last day on the job. In short, he opened by telling the audience of his allegiance to the Yankees, and then went on to summarize Dan Shaughnessy's book with major embellishments here and minor embellishments there.

I took out my anger appropriately, as any Sox fan would. I ridiculed Yankee fans for the rest of the afternoon. Even the host of the next show — a trivia contest I wasn't smart enough to qualify for — made public of his profound love for the Yanks despite being married to a Red Sox fan.

Pridefully, I shouted, in the midst of a completely silent crowd, "You were still a Mets fan in the '80s!" I drew laughter and pats on the back from complete strangers who honored my courage.

It was the quote of the trip.

We had just seen the immortalized versions of Walter Johnson, Rogers Hornsby, Ted Williams and Willie Mays so we were doing well, but just like any road trip, we weren't looking forward to the ride home.

We wandered around the developed portion of Cooperstown, leaving no baseball unturned before we drove back to Lowell.

Already nostalgic, we packed into the car, ready to roll.

About an hour later, it hit us.

We recognized things we shouldn't have been recognizing for at least an hour. At some point when we were following this road map, we hit a time warp, or something of the sort.

We were done with the back roads and dusty trails of New York's farmlands and had finally reached the highway, but without any reason and with no real evidence to let us know what actually happened, we skipped an hour of roadways.

With no explanation, we thanked the road map. That's all we could do.

Friday, Nov. 7, 2003, 10 a.m., somewhere in Ohio

There is something to be said about watching the sunrise.

(Please notice that I said "sunrise," not "sunset." This isn't about to turn into some sentimental garbage that ruins the whole story, so keep reading.)

A few hours back, during a brief respite in Pennsylvania, something very disturbing happened: the darkness disappeared to make way for a sunny morning.

It wasn't fun. Adjusting your eyes for something like this after spending about seven hours in a dark car certainly isn't easy. You begin to realize where you are, how long you have been on the road and try to estimate how much time you have left.

Needless to say, none of those answers are inspiring.

At this point, most of us had hit the wall. It was my decision not to drive during the trip so I was sitting shotgun, wide awake while everyone, even probably the driver, was asleep.

On a side note, Ohio isn't a friendly state. I'm not trying to say that Ohio is unfriendly, but Ohio is definitely the kid you know who just sits there and doesn't say anything to anyone while the rest of the party shows its pulse.

I still have a picture on my camera phone from this trip, and that says something because I only have 20 available spots to save pictures on this ancient piece of machinery.

It's of a dead-and-gutted dear lying on the back of a pickup truck that was driving next to us.

It's disturbing, I know. The rest of those pictures on my phone are sports related: mostly Red Sox pictures.

But that's Ohio. That dead-and-gutted dear plus the same cornfields over and over again represent Ohio to me. Normally, I'd say that isn't fair to do to Ohio, I shouldn't generalize one state after one road trip.

But you need to understand.

It took six hours to drive through these flat, monotonous cornfields. Think about what you can do in six hours. You can spend a whole day in high school. You can drive from Amherst to Hofstra and back. You can watch "Goodfellas," make yourself a hamburger on the grill and watch "Goodfellas" again.

Or you can drive through Ohio.

The highlight of the worst United State of America should have been Cleveland.

Well, it wasn't.

Cleveland took all of 15 minutes to drive through, which means we spent roughly four percent of our time in Ohio driving through the most illustrious sports city in the state.

I feel like we should have left our mark on Cleveland the way Michael Jordan did during Game 5 in the first round of the NBA playoffs in 1989. Remember when Jordan hit that buzzer beater over Craig Ehlo to knock the Cavs out of the playoffs?

Well, Ehlo's defense was more inspiring than Cleveland's hospitality so we quickly breezed through the city on our way to Notre Dame.

And just a few hours later, sometime around 2 p.m., we reached the pinnacle of "our we there yet's?" and loudly strolled onto the Irish campus.

Skip ahead to the next day.

Clad in Notre Dame apparel from a shopping experience at the school bookstore only my mother and aunts would be proud of, we took in the whole football atmosphere. Still inspired from our visit to the Grotto, our intimate socializations with Notre Dame students and alumni during the morning tailgating session and the sea of green in the stands doing the Irish jig, we watched Irish kicker D.J. Fitzpatrick boot the game-winner through the uprights to beat Navy 27-24 as time expired.

It was only Notre Dame's third win in nine games on the season, and we already watched hated rival Boston College beat the Irish at Alumni Stadium on a last-minute field goal just a couple weeks prior. So this school, with its obvious storied history, celebrated just calmly.

The 80,795 fans in attendance that day had seen better performances from their beloved Irish. There would be no rushing the field or taunting of the Navy fans after. There were just wry smiles to lead the students into another Saturday night on campus.

Teams with championship tradition typically only see it that way.

Wednesday, Oct. 20, 2004, 11:50 p.m., Yankee Stadium

The Boston Red Sox are a team with tradition: early championship tradition before, traditionally, nothing else but losing since.

When you're young, you think you're invincible, but that force field somewhat wears off through time as kinks in the armor prove your vulnerability.

That summed up our lives as Red Sox fans before this date.

There was talk the previous night — about 27 hours ago — that we would drive to the Bronx the next day if the Sox forced a Game 7.

We thought we knew what we were getting ourselves into. This time around, a solid group of us, four friends hailing from UMass, would head to New York.

We paid a ridiculous amount of money for these tickets, though in hindsight, we didn't spend enough to watch the single most important game in Red Sox franchise history.

If the Sox lost, which I saw as the safe, and pretty much only, bet before the game, the hole in my wallet and the hole in my soul would have competed with Alex Rodriguez's head for the largest object in the stadium.

But you know the story.

The group of Sox fans in the stadium celebrated behind Boston's dugout until security kicked us out. Then we celebrated outside the stadium for another hour, once again, until security and the horrifying locals kicked us out.

I'd say there were about five, maybe 10,000 fans at the game supporting the good guys. But I may be wrong, and in 20 years, the stories told will have turned Yankee Stadium into a park full of Sox fans anyway.

And this party almost never happened for the four of us.

The ticket agency we went through reneged its promise the next day. We had to spend almost two hours locking up four more seats to get us into the ballpark that night.

From a fan's standpoint, you know what they say about karma, and karma has never been a friend of the Boston Red Sox.

But we made it, and we withstood treatment that no human being should ever have to endure. From the personal threats from Yankees' fans, parking attendants, store clerks, the homeless and cops — yes, officers of the law — we went through a lot.

The party in the streets after the game let out 86 years of miserable, pent-up, gut-wrenching frustration. We let New Yorkers know that on this night, the baseball world, and their city, belonged to the city of Boston.

Because when you go so long without something to smile about, you deserve it.

Sunday, Nov. 9, 2003, early morning, Ohio rest stop

I've never wanted to not do something more than make this drive back across the country to get home.

It had nothing to do with going home or even getting out of Ohio, which you understand my apathy for by now; it was just the amount of hours we were about to spend in this station wagon together that really forced a state of depression over the crew.

We spent an hour at this rest area, mulling over whether or not we should continue the trip home or remain in a state of complete uselessness for the rest of our lives.

There were several more stops like this throughout the trip back east, none as long, but all full of the feelings of boredom and hatred towards states not named Massachusetts.

You know the feeling when you continue to stare at your computer screen just hoping that five-page paper due the next day in class will just magically appear on Microsoft Word for you? Eventually, you need to start typing.

Well, we needed to start driving. There would be no time warp this time or any supernatural powers around to help us get back to Lowell.

We were on our own.

Needless to say, these rest stops added an extra two hours to our trip back. It took 16 hours to drive from South Bend to the Mill City.

By the time we made it back, we pretty much hated each other; there was no way around that.

Every annoying little nuance about a person will definitely show when you spend 30 hours in a car with someone over a three-day stretch.

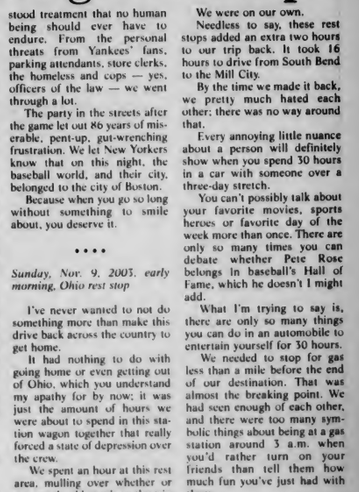
You can't possibly talk about your favorite movies, sports heroes or favorite day of the week more than once. There are only so many times you can debate whether Pete Rose belongs in baseball's Hall of Fame, which he doesn't I might add.

What I'm trying to say is, there are only so many things you can do in an automobile to entertain yourself for 30 hours.

We needed to stop for gas less than a mile before the end of our destination. That was almost the breaking point. We had seen enough of each other, and there were too many symbolic things about being at a gas station around 3 a.m. when you'd rather turn on your friends than tell them how much fun you've just had with them.

But we did have fun.

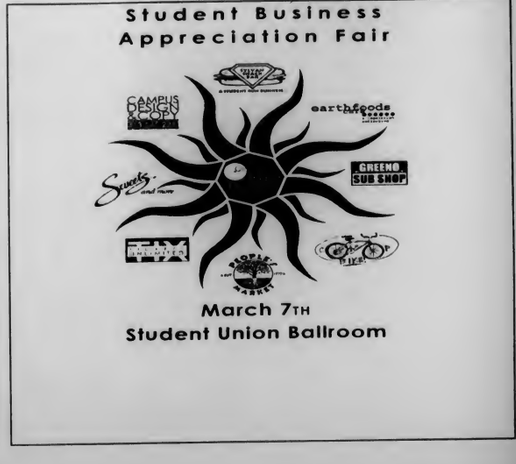
There was nothing anyone could do to destroy the bond that was just created between five friends over a 75-hour period.



And we knew that.

We arrived to Notre Dame a loud bunch of college kids ready for a great time at one of the most unique and special campuses in the country, and we dispersed quietly into the Lowell night as a tired group of friends returning back to reality.

This hiatus had ended.



Until next time...

Snow, police and Montreal dreams can't keep them from Ohio

– exactly what the kids with no rental car insurance want to avoid, ya know?

2:15 a.m. If there is one thing that makes a road trip that much more manageable, it's EZPass. No taking tickets, no fumbling for loose money and no stopping at tolls. All you do is stick the pass on the windshield and cruise on through. But why would we want things easy on this road trip, when we could do things the hard way – the Collegian way.

Thus, cue Bob forgetting the EZPass … waaait for it … aaand there it is, he forgot it. As the shotgun rider and the resident idiot in the car at the moment, it now becomes Bob's duty to handle and guard the toll ticket. He loses it, he pays.

2:20 a.m. We're cruising along, minding our own scattered business when out of the sky falls a fluttering, prancing rectangle of white, followed by immediate panic. Did Bob lose the ticket? Oh, yes he did! "Is this a real situation, or what?" he asks. It's real, Bob, very real you dumbass. Find the ticket.

2:22 a.m. Our photographer bails Bob out and finds the ticket, much to Mike's chagrin.

2:31 a.m. Red Bull is a Bob McGovern staple, and sure enough it only takes an hour-and-a-half before a four-pack of the caffeine juice finds it's way into the car. That translates into 43 miles we were able to travel before requiring false assurance of the fact that staying awake is indeed a possibility.

We down the four Red Bulls, but in the end what does that do? Does Red Bull really work, or is it just a raunchy tasting, soda-like substance designed to produce false confidence in one's ability to "have wings?"

We personally have decided to believe in the power of the Bull just for the hell of it, but make no mistake, it's our fear of a snowy, miserable death wedged in between the axles of a jack-knifed tractor-trailer that is keeping us awake, not some drink.

3:10 a.m. It's unbelievable how bad the roads really are, but whose fault is that in the end? There are millions upon millions of people in the state of New York, and none of them are traveling tonight. We, on the other hand, are. Why?

Did we miss the memo? Why are we the ones who think we can do this, when clearly thinking we can do this is the last thing we should be thinking? We must have missed some memo – like maybe the "driving to Dayton is a really dumb idea" memo or the "did you expect operating a motor vehicle in a blizzard to be any more phenomenal?" memo.

Either way, what the hell were we doing here out in the middle of upstate New York? Well, going to Dayton of course! Yeah, right, say it like it still makes some sense.

3:42 a.m. Nothing can make light of this situation. The snow will not go away, the roads will not clear and we are making Andrew Merritt-like time to Dayton, which for those of you who know Mert means we're just not going to get there on time. It's now abundantly clear to us where those blizzard shots are filmed for the Weather Channel – right here.

4:31 a.m. We finally decide it's time to make our first pit stop, for no other reason than the face that a rest area happens to pop up in our favorite New York town of Schenectady. The home of UMass' own Rashaun Freeman has nothing more to offer than greasy breakfast sandwiches and overpriced vending machines, but it's a chance to pretend that it's not snowing, and that we're not driving in the snow, and that we don't have to keep driving in the snow for a stupefying amount of time. We've decided to put our photographer to use, and she records the first photo of the trip. There is little doubt anymore that the word "sucks" has moved to the forefront of those capable of describing this trip.

5:30 a.m. 34 miles later it's time to stop again. What's more alarming that we lasted only 34 miles before needing a second pit stop, or that it took a freakin' hour to cover those 34 miles? Montreal has become a very real possibility. Would anyone notice? Could we slip north on I-87 into oblivion, never show up in Dayton and get away with it? More than likely, but why? Is Dayton really that hideous of a place? Should we be looking for contingency plans by now?

The theme of this leg is, don't try your breaks.

6:21 a.m. It feels like only a matter of time before we should vanquish control of the Taurus and turn our insignificant lives over to God. Our photographer, on the other hand, has found it perfectly acceptable to sleep through our peril. Those photographers, they're all the same.

6:54 a.m. Pavement – it sticks out from the snow covered depths of the high-way like the morning sun over the horizon; a beautiful site! Pavement is quickly becoming a hot commodity on this trip, but as soon as it comes, there it goes.

7:05 a.m. We're doing what we do best now, snow be damned. We're talking sports, and we're talking sports incessantly. Who should be the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year this season? Mardy Collins for his overall offensive prowess? Pat Carroll for his leadership in turning the Hawks around? Steven Smith for scoring the most points? One of GW's studs just for being one of GW's studs? One thing we know: it will not be Rashaun Freeman. Too many sub par games when his team needed more. Not that it's his fault, it's just how the chips have fallen.

7:21 a.m. Mile 228 just east of Syracuse and Blue Oyster Cult comes on the radio. You know the song "Fear the Reaper" made popular by the SNL "cowbell" skit poking fun at Gene Frenkle? Well tell us this: does it really come complete with cowbell? This version? Well, this version is chalk full of cowbell, but what does that mean? Do they all come with cowbell? The cowbell guy can't bang the cowbell forever, so what happens then?

7:49 a.m. We're back talking sports again. A-10 Coach of the Year? Bob thinks Phil Martelli, Mike thinks Dereck Whittenburg. Both deserve it, and both suck. Go figure.

7:51 a.m. Four hours behind schedule now. Sports talk still rolling. Bob clarifies the face that he hates NO teams from the A-10 West except Richmond. Call it a soccer grudge, because it's later determined that Bob's hard feelings towards the Spiders spring from Sam Koch's group's inability to beat them.

8:05 a.m. Damn, It Feels Good to Be a Gangsta!

9:20 a.m. Our first gas fill-up comes after 319 miles. We only had 18 bucks between us, so 18 dollars worth of gas it is. However, for a Ford Taurus 18 dollars give you much more than one of our gas-hungry keeps. Both of whom are very jealous about not being invited.

9:52 a.m. Finally made it through Buffalo after 7 hours and 26 minutes of driving time. At this point, all involved have resorted to pure unadulterated apathy. Buffalo huh? Sweet, who cares? All we know is that we're not even close, and sanity is becoming a full-time job.

10:58 a.m. Just outside of Pennsylvania on I-90 and everything's going fine. We're moving along at a decent clip, the weather has finally cleared and Ohio is actually in sight. What started out as a horrendous night has finally turned better when…

10:40 a.m. BAM! Mike gets pulled over. Many people understand how to deal with this situation. Rental car, out of state plates, New York State trooper and the clear fact that your automobile was moving along at a speed close to 90 m.p.h. The formula is readily able to be applied. Soften the cop up with your stories of driving all night through the snow, act really tired and tell him you still need to make it all the way to Dayton in your best pouting voice.

Well, Mike did all that. The cop bought it too, saying "Hey, I'll go see what I can work out for you," before returning to his cruiser. And he worked something out for Mike all right. Something that he prefaced by saying "Just pay this, and it won't show up on your driving record." Pay what?? Oh, the ticket he just gave us. Sweet.

11:40 a.m. Five hundred miles. Sports talk runs hard with the top-five plays we've seen all year: 1.) Pops Mensah-Bonsu's alley-oop from half court 2.) Jose Juan Barea's 3-pointer from the Minutemen logo 3.) Vigg's rim-rocker at Fordham 4&5.) Rudy Gay's dunks against for UConn against UMass.

12:10 p.m. We hit the BP Travel Mart in Pennsylvania for their extensive selection of beef sticks and teryaki jerky. Not only that, but Bob buys a paper shamrock for a dollar, signs it with "UMass basketball" and sticks it on the wall. Perhaps it was the five-for-one jerky deal that they had, but something was putting Mr. McGovern in a good mood.

12:23 p.m. Entering Ohio, the sports talk rolls into the best UMass hoops moments of the year other than the UConn game. Clearly Ray's lay-up to beat GW tops the list, but it's a toss-up from there. Art Bowers' steal and three-point play to win the BU game is nominated, as is Deli's performance against Xavier. Then we realized that after these few memories there are more humorous situations than anything else. I guess that's what you get when you follow a team to the end of their schedule.

12:25 p.m. Damn, It Feels Good to Be a Gangsta, and we know that we can't run fast.

12:28 p.m. Continuing with the sports talk. We easily agree that Connecticut's Rudy Gay is the best player we've seen all season. Athleticism, youth, work-ethic and a tall, lanky body with long arms, not to mention the two monster dunks he threw down against UMass at Mullins. There's no doubt the kid will be a pro some day.

12:31 p.m. It was made clear before the trip that Tom Jones' "She's a Lady" will be reserved for Dayton, yet Bob steps out of line to demand that it's played immediately. He's shot down after a reference was made to his losing the ticket and forgetting the EZ Pass.

1:17 p.m. Southeast of Cleveland, the UMass fight song comes on. It starts like a dull familiar murmur, then kicks into full gear. We are so used to this song at this point in our careers, that it doesn't evoke the of State U. reverberations it once did. Now, it kind of just makes us sleepy.

2:41 p.m. It was always accepted that at some point a cigar would be introduced into the equation. Mike finally decides to light one up, but doesn't account for himself chewing through the butt and has to chuck it prematurely. Bob is reading Confucius at this point and is starting to question whether or not he can possible write three papers by Wednesday.

3:22 p.m. Just north of Columbus, the sun makes its first appearance. Bob was thinking about going to school at Ohio State four years ago. As he looks out the window, you can tell that he's happy that he went where he did.

Dayton was, and is, the essence of this UMass basketball season. It's been the underlying, driving force behind all the trips, all the interviews, all the games and all the ups and downs. Dayton was the pinnacle, the unreachable peak, and now that's changed.

Dayton is no longer a game, a trip or a goal. Dayton is now the past.

3:29 p.m. First Dayton sign, but we don't care. We want real Dayton, all of it… smeared right across our grubby little faces. Screw this place, we beat you Dayton! Show Yourself!!!

3:32 p.m. Budweiser plant, feeling a bit parched for some reason.

3:52 p.m. Final descent to Dayton.

4:46 p.m. There's something very fitting about having to cross the Great Miami River to enter Dayton. For us, this whole road trip phenomenon started in Miami, and just snowballed from there. Little did we know what we were getting into.

4:58 p.m. Seven hundred ninety miles, 13:52 driving time, Tom Jones is on, but Bob and Mike are too tired to give it their all. Bob mouths a few words, but is really looking for the University. The photographer looks mighty confused, but maybe it's the fact that she's been cramped in the back seat for 13 hours. Either way, we are here… only a freak of nature (wait, been there) could stop us now.

So now it's all said and done, right? This whole Dayton thing, the driving, the staying awake, the paying for gas and stomaching mounds of horrific junk food while neglecting the school work we really need to do is just a thing of the past? Well, not really. You see there's one glaring issue that needs to be rectified in this scenario, and it's the fact that we're stuck out here in middle of Southwest Ohio in the middle of the night, working on no sleep.

I guess that's the aspect of this whole ultimate road trip package that we forgot to consider: the going home, the doing it over again, the retracing of steps. All sorts of these horrible realities are just starting to dawn on us. Halfway there — we are only halfway there, and what waits on the other end of the return trip? Classes, schoolwork, reality … nothing we're interested in.

Nonetheless, there's never been anything quite like this trip. It's the type of trip you make in stages. You make it through one stage of the trip, then you erase it from your mind. You make it through the next stage, and you erase the last one from your mind. We went through stage after stage of this monster trip over the last 24 hours, and the only one we seem to remember is the last one; the Dayton one, and where it has taken us; here, now, needing to go home.

At some point during this morass of jumbled time and passing moments, we've subconsciously come to grips with what we've done. We realized that our bodies are running on empty and that it can't be any way possible to get enough juice to make it home, but we must push through it anyways, stage by stage.

Tomorrow upon our return, Amherst will look just as it always has, and will feel like home, just as it always has. But somewhere in our minds - the part of our minds that tell us where we are and why we're there - there's Dayton. The trip, the destination, the goal achieved and the essence of doing the damn thing we were idiots to consider undertaking in the first place.

Dayton was, and is, the essence of this UMass basketball season. It's been the underlying, driving force behind all the trips, all the interviews, all the games and all the ups and downs. Dayton was the pinnacle, the unreachable peak, and now that's changed.

Dayton is no longer a game, a trip or a goal. Dayton is now the past.

run last long as he hit a jumper after a Flyer timeout to give Dayton a 46-44 lead.

Roberts hit two threes, and Jones scored his only bucket of the game to put Dayton ahead 40-39 with nine minutes left in the half. Matters only got worse for the Minutemen as Freeman picked up his fourth foul 15 second later with an offensive foul.

Lawerence Carrier, who had 11 points and eight rebounds on the game, received his fourth only three possessions earlier.

UMass maintained a slim five-point lead through the first five minutes of the second half. Carrier started with the hot hand and scored four of the Minutmen's first nine points on long jumpers. Dayton's Scott soon broke the momentum. after throwing down a two-fisted dunk to set the score at 34-29.

Scott wasn't done as he came down the court on the ensuing possession and nailed his third three of the game, bringing he score within two points.

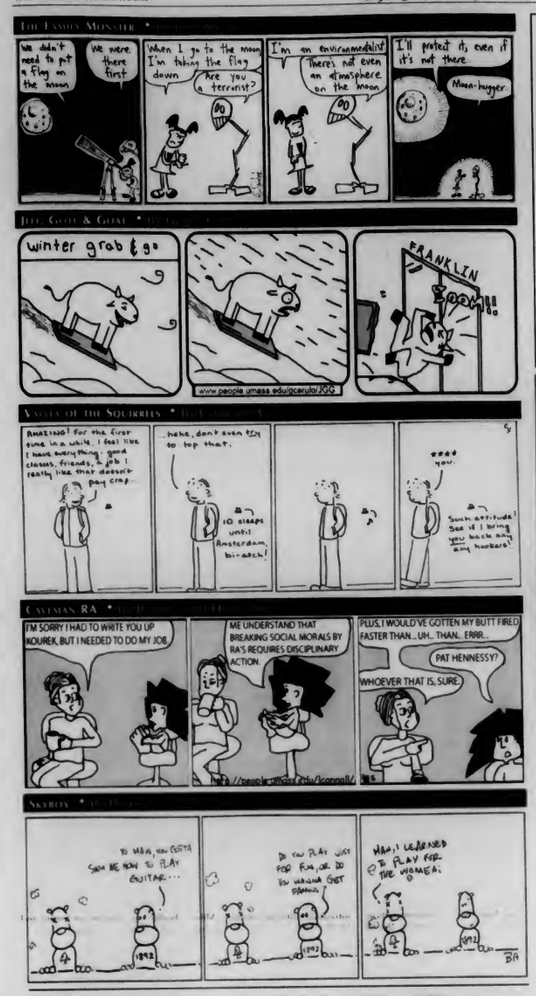
Hurting the Minutemen's offense was the lack of their senior captain, Anthony Anderson. Anderson did not make the trip as his back is still ailing him. Lappas is not confident in his return for the rest of the season and was quick to mention that he may be done.

"He's probably done for the season." Lappas said. "There's a good chance, but it's not 100 percent yet."

The Flyers jumped out to a 13-6 lead early in the first half off a three pointer from Roberts. Dayton hit four threes during the run, including Roberts' shot from the top-right corner of the arch.

The Minutemen would battle back and bring the game to within a basket with eight minutes left in the half, riding the three-point shooting of Maxwell and Carrier, who hit two in a row putting the score at 16-14. UMass tied the game at 18 a minute later off a Freeman lay-up.

The lead would change three times in the last five minutes and neither team could find a good rhythm going into the half. Both teams scored a combined six points in over the last five minutes.



The Maroon and White went into the locker room with a 25-22 lead after Chris Chadwick netted the final four points in the half with two free throws and a behind-the-head lay-up.

UMass had seven players on the board going into the break with Carrier leading the way, netting seven points while grabbing six rebounds. Sophomore forward Staphane Lasme was also big on the boards with five in the half, including two steals and three points.

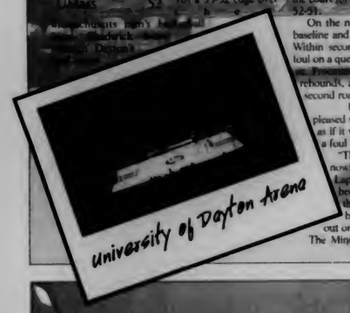
Fear and Loathing in Dayton, Ohio

A savage journey to the heart of UMass basketball



Dedicated in memory of

The Legendary Dr. Hunter S. Thompson

Dayton downs UMass in final seconds

Adjust on the next possession and put up an off-balance lay-up, which missed, but as time expired, giving the Flyers a win in their last home game of the year.

The Minutemen will travel to Boston Saturday night for their last regular season game of the year. UMass still faces A-10 rival Duquesne at the Mullins Center for a 7 p.m. tipoff.

UMass' (15-11 @ 7 A-10) forward Rashaun Freeman made the bid with 10 seconds left in the game and connected with Maurice Maxwell down the court for a dunk, putting the Minutemen ahead 52-50.

On the next possession, Williams cut into the baseline and got trapped a foot outside the paint. Within seconds, Freeman was called for his fifth foul on a questionable whistle by the baseline referee. Freeman took a seat with 11 points and five rebounds, and watched as his team dropped its second road game in a row.

UMass coach Steve Lappas was not pleased with the final call of the game, and felt as if it was a mistake by Williams rather than a foul on his star big man.

"The kid was stuck on the baseline with nowhere to go and they called a foul," Lappas said. "We're frustrated right now because there's no doubt in my mind that that kid (Williams) was stuck on the baseline. It was not a call, he got bailed out on that play."

The Minutemen forced five ties in the second half, with their most important coming with 1:33 left in the game. Freeman went to the line to shoot two, made the first, but knocked the second one off the side of the rim.

Dayton got the offensive rebound and passed the ball to Freeman who dropped in the layup, leaving the score tied at 48.

Lappas was pleased with his team's tenacity even in the losing effort.

"I thought we played very hard tonight," Lappas said. "I thought we played great and gave a tremendous effort, and I think that shows how far we have come."

It was Senior Day at Dayton, which is graduating only one player, guard Mark Jones. Jones had two points and two assists on the evening for the Flyers.

The Flyers were led by Monty Scott, who had 15 points and seven rebounds on the night. Second for Dayton was Jimmy Binnie who had 10 points, including a 3-pointer with 1:08 left in the game which put the Flyers up 61-54.

The Minutemen went on a 6-0 run to start the game and took a 6-2 lead with 16:41 left in the first half. Dayton then went on a 9-0 run and took a 11-6 lead with 13:30 left in the first half.

A running blog of a journey into Ohio

1:00 a.m. It's inevitable. When you have a trip of this magnitude, a journey of this significance and a time frame that seems easier than it is, you're going to be late. Obviously we were late; we take full responsibility for that. We were supposed to leave at midnight, and we left an hour later - par for the course. Blame it on the Collegian.

However, one thing that was not called for in any stretch of the imagination was the damn snow. Twenty-two miles into the trip, it's so white that we're blanking on where exactly we are at the moment. This isn't what we signed up for at all, that mainly we wanted back, was Paterno's, and with interest, the option of that night.

2:05 a.m. There is no more sense of anticipation, and the pretty scenic feeling. The sense of pushing onward and our "Kool Runnings" style outdoorsmanship is now just a handful of Dayton-area memories. It's just us and a long, dark, snowy road ahead. Our only hope is that the plow with a type of road conference that is hard to master when you are driving a Ford Taurus during one of the more hellish snowy evenings in recent memory.

The fear was very real, but we joked about it, there was no way we could let each other know how scared. This was a team effort, one that would require more grit and blind youthful naivete than anything the three of us had ever attempted on a semi-professional level.

There are all thoughts that course many writers run are asking at the point in the biggest game in the Atlantic 10. We finished this article, we [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

12:41 a.m. After the detection of an odor of marijuana by a police officer in Brett Hall, Elizabeth Johnson, 19, of Westford, was arrested for possession of a class D substance and being a minor in possession of alcohol.

1:18 a.m. Dennis O'Neil, 25, of Amherst, was arrested in Herter Hall after an officer acted on a trespass warrant.

2:30 a.m. A person reported a subject causing problems in Coolidge Hall. The subject, Kristen Hutchins, 18, of Hyannis, was found to have an active warrant and was subsequently arrested.

2:32 a.m. Following a traffic stop, Carson Cummings, 21, of Groton, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

2:36 a.m. A bag was reported stolen in John Quincy Adams Hall. The contents of the bag were valued at $200.00.

3:27 a.m. Following a traffic stop on Commonwealth Avenue, Noelle Winselaar, 19, of Canton, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol.

4:53 a.m. After a report that a subject had been struck in the face by another person, Jared Benham, 18, of Pittsfield, was arrested for Assault and Battery.

8:15 p.m. Eirik Draugsvold, 19, of Ashburnham, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot next to the Visitor's Center.

SundayFebruary 27

1:58 a.m. Following a traffic stop in the parking lot next to the Visitor's Center, Matthew Welch, 20, of Uxbridge, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol.

4:47 a.m. Two laptops were reported stolen from Kennedy Hall. Each laptop was valued at $1,500.

8:06 a.m. A dryer in Cashin Dorm reportedly had its door taken off.

MondayFebruary 28

5:30 a.m. An ice cream machine in Bartlett Hall was reported to be tipped over with the glass smashed.

7:08 p.m. $150.00 was reported stolen from a wallet in Washington Hall.

1:01 p.m. A person stated a truck slid down hill into several vehicles parked in the parking lot behind Sylvan. The damage to the vehicles was minor.

6:24 p.m. A person reported a streetlight was causing sparks near John Adams Hall. A police officer reported the reflection of snow flakes are what the person though were sparks.

Climate changes are discussed tropical storms.

To demonstrate what the climate changes have in-store for all of the U.S. in the years 2090 to 2100, Barron used two models, the Hadley model, which was developed in the U.K., having low sensitivity (2oC); and the Canadian model, having higher sensitivity (4oC).

He mapped the potential impacts of agriculture, vegetation, July heat index (hottest month), health factors, mortality rates and showed how it was linked to climate change.

As the U.S. gets warmer, Barron predicts that there will be no more insects around and hence more problems, but as a rich country, he says the solution is to have a robust health infrastructure.

He also highlighted how the U.S. Navy was interested in climate change.

As the arctic snow melts (predicted U.S. Navy model says 2020) the sea would appear, which leads to the ability to have ships there in those areas, which, in turn, also means having infrastructure.

So the government would have to act now, as it takes about 20 years to build a ship and the Russians and U.K. are already prepared for it.

Lastly, he added that all these models have large errors associated with them, and climate change has complicating physics underlying the theories.

One must look at global warming critically in terms of human health significance, water resources, and changing agricultural places for the future and the only way it can be done is to assign a money value for our ecosystem.

By putting a money value to the system we humans understand the changes better.

Change of value in terms of money makes everyone realize the importance of what different changes in climate are all about.

Stem cell research bill expected to pass

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Democratic leaders in the House and Senate said Wednesday they expect to pass a bill by the end of March legalizing embryonic stem cell research, and predicted they will have the votes to override an expected veto by Republican Gov. Mitt Romney.

"It's an absolute necessity that we do this," House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi, D-Boston, told supporters of the legislation. "By the end of this month I'd like to have this bill on the governor's desk."

The bill would clarify existing state law, making it legal to conduct research using embryonic stem cells in Massachusetts. It would also specifically ban any research aimed at reproductive cloning.

Senate President Robert Travaglini, D-Boston, predicted the two-thirds majority will be in place to override Romney's veto. The Senate easily passed a similar bill last year, but it was blocked from reaching a vote in the House by former Speaker Thomas Finneran.

"We're already at two-thirds," Travaglini said. "We're going to have to override a gubernatorial veto. He (Romney) has made it abundantly clear that he is going to veto the bill."

Romney supports embryonic stem cell research using discarded embryos from fertility clinics, but opposes the creation of new embryos for use in research.

Some lawmakers have expressed concern that the bill is moving too fast, saying more time is needed to understand the complicated scientific and moral issues involved.

Travaglini announced his intention to push for the bill at the beginning of January. If a bill comes up for a vote by the end of March, lawmakers will have had three months to study the issue, he said.

"I don't want to be viewed as accelerating the political process for personal political gain.

I want to make sure all objections are heard," Travaglini said. "I'm trying to have an opportunity for this to be vetted thoroughly."

Romney says his opposition is based on a fundamental moral opposition to the creation of new human life solely for the purpose of research - even if that human life consists of a microscopic cluster of a few hundred cells.

"I believe there have to be ethical boundaries set," Romney said when he announced his opposition to the bill.

"No one would say, 'let's create an embryo and then a fetus and then prior to birth kill it and take cells out of it for research.' It might have therapeutic benefits, but no one thinks we ought to do that."

Researchers, including those at the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, say Romney's push for a ban on the creation of new embryos would hamstring their work and slow progress on potential new treatments for a host of illnesses, from sickle cell anemia to juvenile diabetes.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., has also criticized the governor's position, saying a ban on the cloning of embryos for stem cell research would discourage scientists from working in Massachusetts.

Speaker wants to work with Gargano the passing of the housing budget.

"The housing budget got passed without our consent," Morrison said, "so we are partially responsible for a fee increase."

Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Jeff Napolitano criticized Morrison for working so explicitly with Gargano claiming that he should be following the rule of the Senate.

"As a member of the Student Government Association, you must follow the Student Government Association," Napolitano said. "This is a Senate issue."

Morrison's rebuttal included the fact that he needs to work with Gargano under Chancellor Lombardi's rule, and that everything the SGA signs, goes directly to Gargano's office.

"I talked to [Gargano] and he said that he is 'eager to work with us'," Morrison said. "...If you want to impeach me, go ahead and try."

In other orders of business, Senator and presidential candidate Sean Bliss invited John Pepi, the General Manager of the Office of Waste Management to speak to the Senate about upcoming plans to implement "reverse vending machines" to the UMass campus.

"These reverse vending machines are like automatic recycling machines," Bliss said, "and it would be supporting UMass."

These RVM's would be leased to the University and students could put any recyclable plastic bottles and cans inside to redeem the five cents on their UCard.

Pepi also talked about the Recycle Mania contest that is underway. He stressed the importance of students especially in the dormitories to recycle.

"The weakest part is what goes on in the dorms, the infrastructure is there," Pepi said, "now we need the motivation."

Currently UMass is in a contest among 50 other colleges to recycle and win the coveted trophy, made entirely out of recycled materials.

"We want to motivate students to work hard for something," Pepi said.

In other business, juniors Pavel Payano and Valerie Lewis announced their candidacy for President and Trustee respectively. Currently nominations for these positions are open.

President of the SGA Eduardo Bustamante has declined to comment on whether or not he is seeking another term, however, in an earlier interview, he told the Massachusetts Daily Collegian that there was a "fifty-fifty percent chance" that he would run.

Bliss and Attorney General Craig Goldschmidt also have announced their candidacy for President and Trustee for the upcoming elections. Elections are slated to be held the week after Spring Break.

Ten Commandments up for court debate

argue that they violate the First Amendment ban on any law "respecting an establishment of religion."

The question has sparked dozens of heated legal battles, including one in Alabama by Roy Moore.

He lost his job as chief justice a year ago after defying a federal order to remove a 5,300-pound Ten Commandments monument he had installed in the state courthouse.

More than 30 groups have filed "friend-of-the-court" briefs weighing in on the issue.

Outside, nearly a hundred demonstrators gathered in front of the Supreme Court in the icy cold for rallies following a candelight vigil by supporters of the displays.

Many shouted "Amen" and broke into refrains from "Amazing Grace," as in the form of a prayer meeting, as several kneeled before the court steps.

Opponents of the displays, meanwhile, waved signs reading "Keep Government and Religion Separate" and "My God Does Not Need Government Help."

"I don't think government should be in the business of morality," said David Condo, 40, of Beltsville, Md.

Husband, mother of judge murdered

By Mike Robinson
Associated Press

CHICAGO — A federal judge called for the government to provide more security to judges and their families Wednesday following the killings of a colleague's husband and elderly mother, who were shot in the head in the basement of the family home.

A possible fingerprint and a bloody shoe print had been found at the judge's home, a source said Wednesday.

U.S. District Judge Wayne Andersen, who was with U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow after she discovered the bodies of her relatives Monday, was the first federal judge in Chicago to publicly voice such concern since the deaths.

Police are investigating whether Lefkow or her lawyer husband were the targets of hate groups or others who may have been seeking revenge over the couple's professional decisions. The killings came a month before white supremacist Matthew Hale is scheduled to be sentenced for trying to have Lefkow killed over her handling of a trademark case involving the name of his group.

"This horrible tragedy has got to serve as the basis for a substantial increase of security for judges and their families," Andersen said in an interview with The Associated Press. "The Internet is plastered with information about every one of us and I fear and my family certainly fears that these kinds of incidents are going to be repeated unless there is a very high priority placed on the safety of judges and their families."

Lefkow and her family were placed under the protection of the U.S. Marshals Service after the killings.

The judge found the bodies of Michael Lefkow, 64, and Donna Humphrey, 89, when she returned from work Monday evening. Both had been shot multiple times, according to the Cook County Medical Examiner's office.

A federal source, who spoke Wednesday to The Associated Press on the condition of anonymity, said investigators had discovered what appeared to be a fingerprint on a shard of glass from a broken window at Lefkow's house. The glass was flown to Washington for analysis at the FBI laboratory, the federal source told the AP.

The source also said a bloody shoe print, possibly that of a suspect, was found at the home.

Investigators believe the two victims were forced to lie on the basement floor before being shot, the Chicago Tribune reported Wednesday, citing unidentified sources.

A source told the AP that police found two .22-caliber shell casings at the scene.

Police investigators search through trash cans behind the home of U.S. District Court Judge Joan Lefkowin in Chicago on Tuesday.

Despite the heavy presence of U.S. and Iraqi security forces in Baghdad, many parts of the city remain lawless and it can be difficult to distinguish between insurgent killings and common crimes. Iraqis perceived as collaborating with U.S. and the government are targeted relentlessly.

Judges and other legal staff working at the court have not even been identified in public because of concerns for their safety, and tribunal officials have kept a low-profile for the same reason, even refusing to say where the court is located.

The Iraqi Special Tribunal was set up in late 2003 after Saddam was toppled. After five potential candidates were killed, some judges declined calls to work at the court. At least half of the tribunal's budget has gone to security.

Tuesday's slayings were unlikely to have any impact on the trial process.

A court official, who declined to be identified, said the slain judge was one of more than 60 investigative, appellate and trial judges working at the court.

An official familiar with the court said al-Merwani was an investigative judge. It was not known what cases he was working on, and other court officials could not be reached for comment.

In Ramadi, located 70 miles west of Baghdad, clashes erupted between U.S. forces and gunmen after insurgents detonated roadside bomb as a U.S. convoy passed. The explosion missed the convoy but damaged two civilian cars that were in flames.

The first car bomb exploded outside an Iraqi army base in central Baghdad that occupies the former Muthanna airport, which has been targeted by insurgents several times over the last year.

An Interior Ministry security official, Asad Hadi al-Maliki, said six people were killed and 25 people were wounded in the blast (15 of them civilians).

In a statement posted on the Internet, al-Qaida in Iraq purportedly claimed responsibility for the Muthanna airport attack, saying it was a "martyrdom" operation. The authenticity of the statement could not be verified.

Intricacies of the Amherst bar circuit

Bar scenes and the wild

Ben Feder

Over the past weekend I played the part of half sociologist, half anthropologist, like the people shown on the National Geographic Channel. Instead of the African Savannah as my field of research, my location for observing natural wildlife and indigenous people was the Monkey Bar.

Now I know what you're thinking. "Isn't the Monkey Bar that place that charges me $2 entry so I can buy $8 watered-down drinks and listen to over-played, trite music?" And the answer is yes.

Now the Monkey Bar isn't your typical Amherst pub. For those of you youngsters unfortunate enough to not know that guy who hangs around the back of Bartlett selling fake ID's, allow me to first describe to you the downtown Amherst scene. You have Charlie's, Barcelletos, Delano's and McMurphy's for the UMass kids. The ABC upstairs provides Amherst College students considerable distance from our distasteful rabble. The Spoke is popular amongst townies. And then there is the proverbial black sheep, the Monkey Bar, which looks like it belongs in Boston or Northampton.

Being such an outcast, the bar attracts a certain type of crowd, and has its own culture unlike any of the other bars downtown. Also, with every society, there are certain cultural codes that must be followed. I was lucky enough to be in a group of Monkey Bar patrons and here is what I observed.

Men wear khakis, with nice shoes, and button-down shirts. To attract a female, men will un-button the top buttons of the shirt. The more open the shirt, the more brazen the male is trying to attract a mate

Rule #1: As a straight male, you can never suggest going to the bar, for this implies dancing. The straight male of the species is somewhat precarious when it comes to this physical endeavor. The key to deciding to go is if a woman in your group implies she is in the "dancing mood." At this point it is acceptable for a straight or gay man to offer the Monkey Bar as an appropriate outlet for her "booty shaking" needs.

Rule #2: To be an acceptable group entering the bar, an all-male party must have four or more guys in it. All-male groups are not suggested however, and you should at least have one to two girls for every guy in the group.

Rule #3: Clothing is a delicate balance of revealing, loose fitting clothes and tight fitting materials. As a woman, you must have a free-flowing shirt on that reveals three-fourths of your upper torso. Better yet, you can only wear a 6-inch wide sheet of cloth long enough to cover your chest that has a string tied behind your back.

Pants, surprisingly, are optional. This is so breeding on the dance floor by the male can be done with relative ease. Also to establish dominance over other ladies, the height and number of straps on your heels must be greater than the women around you. Men wear khakis, with nice shoes, and button-down shirts. To attract a female, men will un-button the top buttons of the shirt. The more open the shirt, the more brazen the male is trying to attract a mate.

Also, the confidence of a male is displayed in regards to if they have a tee shirt underneath or not.

So for you hairy-chested individuals who might be anxious about revealing their wild undergrowth, the remedy is easy. Shave a V in the middle of your chest to the appropriate size of how open you want your shirt to be. Also you have to be at least 6'5", if not, then be able to bench press 350 pounds.

Rule #4: Dancing is delicate and is tricky to decipher at first, but easy to master. First, if you are there with all guys, you must stand by the wall and not move. Just watch and wait for a woman to leave her group to rest. Intercepting her on the way to the bathroom seems to be the most widely used tactic.

In a coed group, the guys must stand in a tight circle facing inwards where the ladies will be dancing with each other. Their dance will resemble the mating of octopi with legs and arms flailing and their bodies intertwining. No matter how tempted, the males cannot join in. They must only sway with their arms locked at a 90-degree angle, elbows close to their sides and their hands in tight fists. Slight up and down motion is permitted in the shoulders.

The women will sometimes move out towards the men and dance with them. This is the only time the male is allowed to move. The girls will "grind" against them and move their hips and pelvises in provocative ways. They will then return back to the middle with the other girls, who can truly mimic their movements.

Every so often a boyfriend is allowed to pull his girl out of the throng to "hook-up" but he must quickly let her return. If you are dancing only as a couple, then you have free range to grope, kiss, grab, thrust or do anything else that the limitations of gravity permit you to do.

All in all, my observations at the Monkey Bar proved most entertaining and, from an anthropologist's perspective, portrayed the Monkey Bar as an atmosphere that is not one to be overlooked. Truly, all that I observed had made the watered-down drinks and trite music well worth the trip.

Raising the bar standards

Matt Brochu

My mom is obsessed with coupons. Every once in a while, during buy one, get three free weeks, she'd go a little overboard and our house would be stuck with 14 boxes of Cinnamon Toast Crunch and an only child responsible for eating all of it. After a while, I got really sick of the stuff. When all was said and done, I wouldn't touch cinnamon, toast, or anything crunchy for six months, and my mom would have enough boxes of cereal to put her home-room over the top in her school's annual food drive.

So what does this have to do with anything? It's exactly how I feel about Amherst's bar scene right now. I'm just fing sick of Cinnamon Toast Crunch, and I know a bunch of people who feel the same way.

Every Friday, my friends and I go through the same damn routine — pre-game at our house, spend a half hour deciding which bar will suck the least, then end up at the bar with the fewest people in it, but you know what the best part of my Friday is? It's the 10 seconds from when I pull up to the curb to when I get to McMurphy's door, because I think maybe I'll get up there and I'll look in the window and no one will be in there. No goodbye, no see you later, no nothing. I don't know much, but I know that.

But that, of course, will never happen. There are too many students, too many sketchy townies, and too few bars to get all of us drunk simultaneously. So what can be done about the situation? Not much; but here are my suggestions.

First and foremost, male student athletes need to be notified that it's safe to dance at The Pub. In the history of D1 college athletics, I'm pretty sure no one's had to tell a coach that Kanye West's "New Workout Plan" was the reason they tore their ACL. Yet every weekend, these guys buy a beer, line up around the outskirts of the dance floor, stare blankly at every girl who drops it like it's hot and bob their heads like that weird kid with the headphones sitting in the back of the PVTA.

Here's a tip for you guys: staring at people in a bar is no different than staring at them while waiting in an elevator. It makes people feel uncomfortable. The last time I was at The Pub I felt like the new guy in the prison shower, as if it was only a matter of time before some dude named Big Earl put his hand on my shoulder.

Now for the bathrooms, a bar must be prepared to flush away as much liquid as it sells each night. Drunken people pee more than my dad on a long car ride, and for that, a semi-clean, functional toilet is a necessity.

In terms of the lack of space, there's only one possible solution: remove all bar stools on busy nights. Think about it. Every bar has one primary goal: to sell drinks to everyone who wants one. Bar stools make this a virtual impossibility. How long do you think the dining hall would last if they let people eat right out of the buffet trays?

A note for all the aspiring DJ Skribbles in Amherst: New hip-hop is cool, but older hip-hop is cooler. Sure, we always appreciate it when Lil' Jon finds a new way to ruin a song by yelling "skeet skeet skeet" in the background, but you'd be surprised how many people would appreciate it if you played some "Naughty By Nature" or "Arrested Development" every once in a while. And when it comes to being compensated, insist on being paid in advance instead of charging a $2 cover at the door.

I'm not cheap. I'm just realistic. Two dollars means a snack for you, but it means a big deal to me. Do you have any idea what a college student can do with $2? I could go on forever — a load of laundry, two hours at a parking meter, a small Dunkaccino and a bagel, a Pabst Blue Ribbon bottle at Delano's, or even better, hot cheese up front at Antonios when we're too wasted to make a decision.

Now for the bathrooms: a bar must be prepared to flush away as much liquid as it sells each night. Drunken people pee more than my dad on a long car ride, and for that, a semi-clean, functional toilet is a necessity. Apparently this is a difficult task, because more often than not, I come out of the bathroom feeling like Andy Dufresne after escaping from the Shawshank prison. Let's look at the facts. I'm a guy. I pee standing up. This shouldn't happen.

But let's face it. They have no reason to run things differently. I'll go back this Friday. I'll pay the $2 cover. I'll wait 20 minutes to get a drink because the bar stools box out better than Ben Wallace. I'll watch the football players bob their heads to Lil' Jon as they watch everyone else. And I'll devour half a box of Cinnamon Toast Crunch when I get home. It's not like I have anything better to do.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

SOCIAL SECURITY MOVING IN RIGHT DIRECTION

In response to Andrew Freeman's editorial concerning Social Security reform, Mr. Freeman refers correctly to Social Security's inception as a program to use the wealth of the young to look out for the welfare of the old. The massive ballooning of the population eligible to receive benefits, and the added stress of a longer average life span, means that not only will more people be collecting benefits, but they will also be collecting them for a longer time.

While it is certainly right to give these working men and women what they have been promised, it is also necessary to ensure that a system is still in place for those who come after. I'd like to have sufficient funds to live comfortably after retirement. However, I know that with our current system each dollar that is taken out of my check each week as a payroll tax will never find its way back to me.

Contrary to what Mr. Freeman states, this is a crisis. It's not a crisis for the elderly, it's a crisis for the young who will not have Social Security to fall back on. In February of 1998, at Georgetown University, President Clinton said, "every one of you knows that the Social Security system is not sound for the long-term, so that all of these achievements ... are threatened by the looming fiscal crisis in Social Security."

Furthermore on Mar. 2, 2005, Alan Greenspan, the preeminent fiscal mastermind in the U.S. and Federal Reserve Chairman said, Congress can "either choose to do something in advance, which will ameliorate the problem, but not completely eliminate it, or wait until the problem is right on you, in which the solutions are going to be very painful."

The solution that Mr. Freeman proposes is to raise taxes in the future to solve the solvency problem. A suitable raise in the payroll tax would mean that members of the highest tax bracket would be paying more than 50 percent of their income to the federal government. A more palatable solution would be to enact a new Social Security system with personal savings accounts as a large component and to allow individuals to manage their own money.

Who among us would claim that the bureaucracy of the federal government could manage their money better than they themselves could? This would also eliminate that money from the hands of legislators bent on pork-barrel spending. The money would be more secure in personal accounts, no longer being a target of government money-grabbers.

In addition, the probable influx of money into money markets and stocks would do well for the nation's economy. Social Security needs to change, to say "there is no crisis" is fundamentally short-sighted and naïve. Liberals in this country need to see that their greatest achievement of the 20th century is in need of adjustment, and to work with republicans so that it survives well into the 21st.

A new era in Latin America?

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

Argentina, Brazil, Venezuela and now Uruguay all share an emerging commonality that differentiates them from the rest of their South American neighbors. These four states represent over two thirds of the region's population, and all of them have democratically elected leftist heads of state that are committed, at least in principle, to achieving economic justice and the bettering the lives of the majority of their respective and collective populaces. They are what may very well prove to be the rise of the new, pragmatic Latin American left that will finally bring the promised benefits of modernization to the people.

Though Kirchner, Lula, Vázquez and Chávez are as different as they are similar, they mark what is becoming a regional trend towards progressive social policy in Latin America. More than a decade of liberalization and nearly unquestioned neo-classical economic policy has achieved absolutely nothing for South America: the gap between rich and poor has widened as crime and despair have increased.

Increasingly, alienated and economically oppressed populations recognize the need for regional cooperation and the importance of certain exacted measures of state control. Reason being, they need to be protected from the brutal forces of the free market that have literally left them in tattered clothes and dirty favelas.

Nestor Kirchner, a Peronist, has taken a hard line with international creditors in the wake of Argentina's economic downturn that was at least partially caused by the structural adjustment criteria of the IMF. He has put together a bankruptcy package that will pay 30 cents on the dollar and has won the approval of more than three quarters of creditors, thereby gaining the graces of the IMF and using budget surpluses domestically to continue Argentina's staggering 9 percent annual GDP growth.

... at the moment, there seems to be a concrete and simultaneous shift in political philosophy [in Latin America] in favor of a reformed and even neo-socialist trend.

By supporting the growing movement of workers' councils in factories and providing community governance, perhaps Mr. Kirchner will be able to use his positive inertia with international investors to forward the socially responsible projects that he has promised his country.

Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva is the first Brazilian president ever from the Workers' Party (PT) and, as a lifelong union organizer and friend of the Landless Workers Movement, was heralded as the bringer of a more just and equitable order. Though he has faltered and made policies much more conducive to attracting foreign investment than to relieving the plight of his constituents — including meeting all IMF terms for Brazil's debts at the expense of long overdue fiscal policy allocations — he remains the leader of the southern bloc in the WTO and an outspoken supporter of autarchic growth in the region.

Many argue that President Gutiérrez of Ecuador falls into a classification similar to Lula, in that he is a centrist pursuing many of the same policies his predecessors did, while maintaining a leftist rhetoric whose realization is perpetually just around the next metaphorical corner.

The most ostensibly radical of the bunch is Venezuela's self-proclaimed social revolutionary Hugo Rafael Chávez Frías. The ex-paramilitary commander is closest among his peers to Fidel Castro and to the old Latin American left, and is accordingly the most ideologically motivated of all of them.

Chávez has initiated programs of cultural, professional, material and petroleum exchange with his neighbors and Cuba, even when less efficient than trading with the U.S. He has also utilized oil revenues to commence schemes for land reform, agricultural training and ghetto education, and has used harsh rhetoric to openly oppose both Washington Consensus economics as well as any U.S.-led objectives in the area. With the gradual de-corruption and improvement of these programs and diversification of the Venezuelan economy, Chávez may actually be able to go far in creating a less stratified society.

Now the newly elected socialist president Dr. Tabaré Vázquez, the first leftist president in Uruguayan history, joins the ranks of Latin American heads of state delegated with the task of instituting a regime of social economics. The goal of this regime is to replace the defunct neoclassical model that has brought such benefit to outsiders but rarely if ever to the people themselves.

His first two acts as president on Tuesday were the announcement of a $100 million poverty relief plan and the resumption of diplomatic relations with Cuba. He has also begun technical talks with Chávez regarding energy, trade and communications cooperation with Venezuela.

Past attempts at socialist reforms in Latin America have often failed due to their lack of pragmatism in retaining foreign investment and U.S. intervention, either in the form of penalties levied upon trade partners or direct military intervention. Yet at the moment, there seems to be a concrete and simultaneous shift in political philosophy in favor of a reformed and even neo-socialist trend.

Perhaps mutually supportive regimes will succeed in averting many of the economic pressures that have caused collapse in the past and help each other develop real results for the people on the ground. However, ideology is something quite distinct from policy execution, and the question must now be whether or not this is a permanent and serious trend in the region — a legitimate shift towards a regionalism based upon more socially responsible and egalitarian principles — or something else entirely.

From SWEETS to Beets

By Laura Beil
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — Scientists are confirming what kids know from Valentine's Day. For some, those little candy hearts are So Fine, and for others they're What Ever.

Research into the genetics of sweet preference suggests that candy not only tastes different to children and adults, it appeals differently from child to child.

"Children are living in different sensory worlds than adults," said Julie Mennella of the Monell Chemical Senses Center in Philadelphia. This month, in the journal Pediatrics, Mennella and her colleagues describe a study of 143 children and their mothers, examining how their genes influence their preferences for sweets.

Studies into the basics of food preference may eventually lead to a better understanding of why we like the foods we do. The findings may also be used to develop tools that could help parents encourage their kids to eat healthy without threat or bribery.

Scientists know that certain food preferences became hard-wired into the brain as humans evolved. Across human cultures and among different age groups, sweet foods are appealing, while bitter ones are more of an acquired taste.

One theory to explain the universal attraction is that throughout most of human history, food was in short supply. Eating the calorie-dense selections became beneficial.

"Sweet is a cue for calories," said Linda Bartoshuk, a taste researcher from Yale University School of Medicine. "Bitter is a cue for poison."

Human milk is also sweet, so being born with a sweet tooth could be a survival mechanism. Even babies who don't know of the existence of sweet confections delight in the first nibble of chocolate.

But individual preferences aren't evenly distributed. Liking a certain food is a product of genetics, culture and the environment. For example, tastes for bitter foods such as alcohol and coffee are learned. How much any one factor affects taste isn't known.

That's what researchers like Mennella are trying to tease out. Eventually, the work may help parents understand how to get their children to eat healthier. Children who are extremely sensitive to the bitterness in vegetables, for example, may need their broccoli more disguised with salt, butter or cheese.

In the new study, Mennella and her colleagues took cheek swabs from 143 children and their moms, and divided the subjects into three groups: those called PP carried two copies of a gene that made them particularly sensitive to one bitter taste, those who had one copy (called AP), and those who had two copies of a gene that made them less sensitive to the bitterness (called AA).

In the children, genetics predicted their taste preferences. Kids in the PP and AP groups, the ones most sensitive to bitter taste, were more likely to identify soft drinks as their beverages of choice. The kids in the AA group, who were the least sensitive to bitterness, were more likely to name milk or water. The kids in the PP and AP groups also

New Discover Your Lover couple doesn't click so well on date

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, February 15, Tom and Tina went on a date for the Collegian's Discover Your Lover dating game. The two went wall climbing at Northampton's Athletic Club, then to dinner at Pinocchio's, followed by drinks at the Moan and Dove.

In a post-date telephone interview, Tina admitted she wasn't exactly infatuated.

"I don't think we were on the same wavelength in personalities, but he's a really nice guy, I thought. I guess we just don't really mesh well," she said.

Tom met Tina in Southwest around 4:00. He greeted her at her dorm and the two hugged. She was giggly, wearing athletic pants and a white zip up hoodie. He was wearing a gym shirt and running shorts.

"Are you excited?" Tina asked him.

"Yeah," he replied.

The opening conversation was an indicator for the rest of the night. Tina did most of the talking, and Tom replied in clips and phrases.

Seated in a brand new Cadillac Escalade, Tom and Tina made first-date small talk on their way to Northampton. Among five prolonged silences, they asked each other where they were from, chatted about local bars, and discussed what they were majoring in. After a couple more silences, they fell back on the age-old conversation saver, and discussed the weather. It was an unusually warm 60 degrees.

At 4:30 they were harnessed up for wall climbing at the Northampton Athletic Club.

The two were then set up to race each other on the wall, and Tom decided to flaunt his testosterone and up the competition.

"I'll give you a head start," he said.

Tina beat him to the top.

"Should I wait for you?" she asked.

After the climbing festivities, the two were taken home to shower and regroup before part two of their date. At 7:30, Tom knocked on Tina's door with flowers, courtesy of Knowles flower shop.

When Tina saw him with the flowers, her eyes lit up.

The two talked for a few minutes. Then the conversation faded to silence.

After being seated at Pinocchio's, the two were left alone to enjoy their dinner and each other's company.

"He didn't really tell me anything about him that was fascinating, but he was talking about his brother, how he's younger than him, and he's bigger than him, which was funny because his brother is younger," Tina said afterwards.

"It was kind of like, so...what's up? I felt like I was carrying the conversation more. I had all these things to tell him and he was like, uh-huh, yah, that's cool" Tina said.

After the dinner, the two were taken to The Moan and Dove in South Amherst.

They drank continuously, and according to Tina, after a while, Tom disappeared temporarily, supposedly to the bathroom. Curious about the camera and entourage the two had, other bar-goers started talking to Tina.

"I guess my date got really mad and I know he was drunk, but it was unnecessary. He was like 'you ditched me.' But it wasn't my fault," Tina explained.

"The [Amherst] guys were really nice, and we had a really intelligent conversation which was lacking the whole night. I just didn't feel like any of [the conversation with Tom] was very stimulating," she continued.

"In the car ride, [Tom] was kind of ignorant, saying things like, those guys should go back to their own country. I didn't know what to say, I was in shock because that's so unnecessary. I thought it was really ignorant and mean, and it's so out of line. It was only the last half hour. I was kind of getting bored. I was like, oh, more entertainment," Tina said.

The two got back to their dorms, and Tom walked Tina to her door.

"He was giving me his number for some reason. He tried to kiss me, and I was so not about it. I gave him a hug or something. I was like, how can you do this after what you said in the car?" Tina said.

"I don't think he's racist — I think he just said that because...I don't know why, but it was pretty messed up," she continued. "It was a huge turn-off."

According to Tina, there won't be another date, especially after the late-night phone call Tom made after the date.

"That night, he called my cell phone. He was just like, 'can I come over?' And I was like, 'it's my bed time; I'm seriously done for the night.'" Tina said.

"It wasn't a total booty call, but who calls somebody at 3 a.m. like, you wanna hang out? And especially after all the stuff he got mad at, and I didn't kiss him, so it was kind of funny, but he never called me after that, and he probably won't ever again, but that's okay," Tina added.

Due to extenuating circumstances, Tom could not be reached for post-date comments.

Sweets are 'so fine'

But take heart, parents of kids with untouched spinach on their plates. Tastes change despite genetics. Mennella found that while 64 percent of the AP children could detect even the weakest of a special bitter solution, only 43 percent of the AP moms could. That means that the power of the bitter-sensitive gene was less important as they grew up. The reasons are unknown.

Such findings might explain why some children like sweets more than others. Mennella is now doing similar work with vegetables, and in babies.

She emphasizes, however, that eating is a complex behavior with numerous influences. Genetics is only one part, but it's an important component to understand, she said. Studies show that young children carry their eating patterns into adolescence, so parents want to establish good eating patterns early.

"Obviously the parents' role is to help provide a healthy diet for the child," she said.

In the meantime, she said, other studies show that children reluctant to eat healthy can benefit from repeated exposures to wholesome food, even if they turn their noses up the first time.

"You do not force a child to eat vegetables," said Valerie Duffy, a researcher at the University of Connecticut in Storrs. "You offer and do positive encouragement."

She praised Mennella's study and others that are examining the genetics of food preference. "All of this gives us more appreciation for why we eat what we do."

Unconventional art gallery showcases Bob Dylan photos in voyeuristic manner

By Molly McKibben
Daily Trojan

LOS ANGELES — Tucked between Laundromats and video stores lies a dark corner adorned with a few lights and some picture frames. It is a small room on 6th Street, and it isn't truly noticeable, even with the brightly red-colored square in its black sign.

This is the home of The Perfect Exposure, a small gallery that plays forum to exhibitions from various media organizations, including The Associated Press and The Los Angeles Times, along with photos from Pulitzer Prize and World Press Photo Contest winners, fine art and contemporary photographers. The gallery recently produced the "World Press Photo 04 Los Angeles" exhibit in partnership with the Annenberg School for Communication.

This gem of a gallery is home to a truly unique new art exhibition that features more than 40 rare photographs of singing legend Bob Dylan.

"Bob Dylan: Unscripted" is a collection of black-and-whites that photographer Douglas R. Gilbert took while working as a 21-year-old staff photographer for LOOK Magazine in 1964.

Although the photographs were originally shot for publication along with a story on Dylan, the magazine decided not to publish them, saying that Dylan was too scruffy for a family magazine.

These 42 photos are what are left of the 900-odd pictures that Gilbert, now 62, took of Dylan over a seven-day period during the summer of 1964 in Woodstock, N.Y., Manhattan and at the Newport (R.I.) Folk Festival.

The pictures capture moments between Dylan and his friends, who included poet Allen Ginsberg, writer Terry Southern and musicians John Sebastian and Jack Elliot.

Though seemingly spare and simplistic, what makes this exhibition so alluring is the way that The Perfect Exposure has set it up.

Each black-and-white photograph is framed in a simple black frame and hung either on a bright, white wall or a brick wall.

The floors of the gallery are homey, warm wood, and there is a second story loft that has a few chairs and benches to sit on while looking at works.

It is so simple that it is impossible not to focus on the pictures. During this exhibition, the gallery softly plays Dylan's many songs in the background, and it creates the aura that the singer is in fact singing right out of some of the photographs.

The photos all feel voyeuristic, and it is easy to ask why someone so private with his life would let a magazine photographer follow him around and capture personal moments.

But it is a glimpse into a life that few people other than a Rolling Stone writer have gotten.

One of the first photographs on the right side of the gallery is the most striking.

It is a picture of Dylan sitting cross-legged on the ground with a 3-year-old Woodstock neighborhood child. The charm of this picture is that both Dylan and the child are staring at the camera with the same, inquisitive glare.

It brings Dylan from the pedestal that the world has put him on as an artist and makes him truly appear to be the normal, 23-year-old singer-songwriter he was at the time. It grounds him.

Another group of photos that are equally as affecting are of Dylan on stage at the Newport Folk Festival.

These pictures show a contemplative side of Dylan, one that wasn't fighting with the press or crusading against whatever he was against at the time. Just Dylan, writing in his cowboy boots and black clothes.

Gilbert's pictures are a window into a Dylan-world that most people otherwise cannot see. They show Dylan laughing, eating, smiling, singing, playing and thinking.

They give us a taste of what it would be like to, for just a little while, be Bob Dylan.

Amherst College hold fashion show for tsunami victim relief

By Matthew M. Burke
Collegian Staff

On Dec. 26, 2004 an offshore earthquake caused the waters of the Indian Ocean to rise and come hurdling toward the beaches of Southern Asia with reckless abandon. The tsunami that would kill over 200,000 people was just beginning its destructive journey inland. Recently discovered sequential photographs, apparently taken by a deceased Canadian couple, show people rushing out to the exposed tidal flats to see the waves out at sea. Mere moments before the waves would touch down, the people began to run. Then in their last picture, taken off of the couple's recently recovered yet destroyed camera, the waves crashed on the beach.

Tourists John and Jackie Knill didn't have a chance to run, their son would later tell the media. They are two people out of the more than 200,000 killed. Villagers, farmers, toddlers, sweethearts, students, entire families, revolutionaries, tourists, and resorts were all snatched from their serene environment and dragged inland or out to sea to meet their dreadful fate. Each has a tragic story and each is equally important. There is no price paid worth that of a human life. It is in the spirit of those killed and those still struggling to survive that the Five College community has taken notice and decided to raise money to help those afflicted.

On Friday, Mar., 4 Amherst College will host a fashion show, developed and organized by the Amherst Tsunami Relief Campaign, featuring imported clothing from all of the nations affected by this disaster. The fashion show is designed to raise cultural awareness and unity among all that attend. Both men's and women's fashions will be displayed by student models from UMass, Amherst College, and all of the other colleges in the region. All models were selected through a Five College casting call that has since concluded. Professional stylists and makeup artists have been dispatched to assist in the show. The money raised goes directly to the World Health Organization, which will then, according to an A.T.R.C. press release, "distribute the full amount to its local representatives in the countries most affected by the tsunami."

After the fashion show, an after party has been planned, featuring NYC's DJ Varick, who will be fully equipped with professional lighting and sound. Varick has both impressed and rocked crowds at NYC hotspots like Marquee and the The Pink Elephant. A 21+ bar will also be available at what is being hailed as the "biggest social event of the year."

The Amherst Tsunami Relief Campaign includes members from all of the five colleges and consists of many different ethnicities. It was the brainchild of Amherst College's Viet Do, a junior economics major, and international student from Vietnam. Do, and several other students including Ali Khan from India (junior, political science), have raised over $7,000 so far, through a Casino Night and other fundraisers. Their success, in part, comes from the support of Amherst College's faculty and administrators, which has made this campaign the biggest and most successful in their school's history. They have also rallied local businesses into donating.

The campaign has mobilized over 1,000 students thus far in their efforts to alleviate the suffering wrought by this terrible disaster. The group hopes to raise an additional $5,000 at the fashion show and expects to host upwards of 1,000 people. The after party also promises to be fun and exciting. Khan, who hails from Northern India, was home for the holidays and heard from a lot of family and friends that were affected by this tragedy. Upon his return he was determined to help, and was surprised to find that many Americans and other international students were also interested.

"I think the response worldwide is amazing," said Khan. "It really goes to show how a traumatic event like this can unite the people. However, it's going to take a long time. People need to keep donating; there are long-term effects. Rehabilitating people and rebuilding cities will take a long time so they need to keep donating and be patient."

The group will also convene after Spring Break to determine what long-term endeavors they might undertake to continue helping the people of this region. Suggestions and volunteers are more than welcome. To help, or join A.T.R.C. please contact tsunamirelief@amherst.edu

Eve runs into casual fling and shows more than she planned

Original Sin
Eve

I guess you could say that I am that girl with the gay best friend. I don't know exactly what that means, but I know that our connection runs slightly deeper than his sexual preference.

We met before he could admit to himself and to others of this fact, and even though it was apparent, no one ever made it an issue. I can honestly say that I was relieved when I found him kissing another man by the bathroom of my favorite nightclub. I was surprised, but not too surprised with this discovery, and spent days convincing him that I could care less about his intimacies. He was finally being true to himself, and that is all I could ever want of him.

Our relationship became quite strong after that occurrence. We would stay up late gossiping about frivolous endeavors, going out on the town and enjoying each other's company as if we were soul mates. I have cried in his arms, shared my deepest fears and most ridiculous dreams. I have confided in his very being. We have had slumber parties, late night binges with greasy food, and shopping sprees that have kept me in debt for a full year. I guess you could say we are pretty close, but I never would have thought the day would come when we found ourselves in the same shower.

Must I continue? It was a Friday night, a very warm Friday night indeed. I was at the bars, in a revealing outfit, after hours, with my gay friend by my side. He suddenly tugged at my arm as if I neglected to see something very important, and I did. It was him, a casual ongoing fling that stood directly in front of me in awe.

"Hi," he said. I blushed ever-so-slightly, noticing my friend as he rolled his eyes.

"Eve, you're not supposed to like the guys you have fun with!"

I laughed over his comment because I knew he was secretly jealous that I would be occupied for the rest of the night. My fling took my hand and pulled me closer.

"Come over. We are having an after party and I want you there." He winked at me and waited for an answer.

My heart stopped. I noticed I was ill-prepared for this event to occur. I was sweaty from the bar, I hadn't shaved perfectly, and I had left my jacket in the car.

"Okay, I'll be over. Just give me an hour. I have to run home first."

I was overwhelmed by the amount of fixing up I had to accomplish in a very short period of time.

"Okay, I'll call you when I get home."

He walked away casually and I felt a sudden burst of energy.

I was ecstatic that I had seen him. The one person I do have feelings for, and we finally had another chance to see each other. I felt like a 1950's giddy school girl that had just been asked to go steady. I grabbed my friend's hand and raced to my car.

"Oh my God! How am I going to do this? Okay, you hold my cell phone while I quickly shave and shower." My friend nodded enthusiastically as I started the engine and sped back to the dorms.

"I can't believe you! You are acting insane!"

We giggled loudly until we finally reached home. I threw open my door and emptied all of my drawers for the perfect outfit.

"What do I wear? Help me!" He scurried around the room, trying desperately to match the perfect outfit.

"Here you go." he exclaimed as he held up both jeans and a newly washed shirt. "Not too bad, but bad enough!"

He smiled as I tore off my clothing and wrapped myself in a towel. "Can you come with me? If he calls, you have to give me the phone while I'm in the shower."

He rolled his eyes in an exaggerated manner and followed me down the hall.

He made himself comfortable against the wall of the outside stall area and waited. I jumped in, lathered up as quickly as I could, then I heard voices. Many voices, all of which were girls, coming into the bathroom. His eyes widened in complete chaotic fear and he jumped straight into the shower with me. He was fully clothed, in Armani wear with new shoes, and he was still holding my phone. I, completely startled by his intrusion, forgot I was naked. And he, completely fearful of being caught, forgot I was naked too.

"H.E.W." he screamed as he covered his eyes and crouched in the corner.

"Must I really need to see that?" He laughed as he slowly lowered his hands from his face.

"So that's what a woman looks like!" I giggled and then told him to shut up.

"Quiet. I need to shave." So there we were, closer than ever before. Who would have thought? But isn't that what friends are for? One thing is for certain, I'll never forget that evening, and I'm sure he feels the same way.

HEA standings complicated

5. Lowell	10-9-3 23 points
6. Northeastern	9-9-4 22 points

Lowell plays at Merrimack (1-21-1 1 point) tonight in Merrimack's season finale. The River Hawks will conclude their schedule by hosting Providence on Saturday.

Northeastern plays a home-and-home series with UMass, which begins in Amherst tomorrow night and shifts to Boston on Saturday.

Lowell will earn the fifth seed following these scenarios: Lowell wins two games this weekend; Lowell earns 5 points (win and tie) this weekend, and Northeastern only earns a maximum of 2 points against UMass; Lowell earns 1 point this weekend, and Northeastern only earns a maximum of 1 point this weekend; Lowell loses twice and Northeastern earns a maximum of 1 point.

Northeastern will earn the fifth seed following these scenarios: NU wins twice, and Lowell only earns a maximum of 2 points; NU earns 3 points (win and tie), and Lowell only earns a maximum of 1 point; NU earns 2 points, and Lowell loses twice.

Also, in the event that Lowell and Northeastern finish tied in the standings with the same amount of wins, head-to-head results verse the first-place team will determine the tiebreaker.

Lowell wins that scenario if UNH or BC wins the conference championship. Northeastern wins that scenario if BU or Maine wins Hockey East.

The final grouping in the Hockey East standings consists of Providence and UMass. Both can finish as high as seventh in the standings, but neither can drop below eighth. Here is where both teams currently sit:

7. Providence	5-14-4 14 points
8. UMass	5-15-2 12 points

As previously stated, PC closes out its schedule with one game at Lowell, and UMass will complete its regular season with a home-and-home against Northeastern, beginning in Amherst tomorrow and moving to Boston Saturday. UMass holds the head-to-head tiebreaker with Providence by winning two of the three meetings this year.

Providence will clinch the seventh seed if: the Friars win at Lowell, and UMass only earns a maximum of 3 points (win and tie) against Northeastern; PC ties Lowell, and UMass only earns a maximum of 2 points against NU; PC loses to Lowell, and UMass only earns a maximum of 1 point against NU.

UMass will clinch the seventh seed if: UM sweeps NU; UM earns 5 points (win and tie) against NU, and Providence ties Lowell; UM earns two points (either a win or two ties) against NU, and PC loses to Lowell.

The first round of Hockey East playoffs will be played March10-13. It is a best two-of-three format, with all of the necessary games being played at the higher seeded team's arena.

The semifinals will be played at the FleetCenter on March 18, and the finals will be played the following night.

Hawkins leads UMass men's ski team to strong showing season standings.

Ten seconds might seem like nothing to sports fans who are used to seeing time being expendable. But winning by two seconds in skiing is like winning a basketball game by 30 — it isn't easy to do, but the men's and women's teams made it look easy this last weekend, and that is why the margins of victories that these teams are posting might seem inconsequential. It is quite the opposite.

"You have 20 runs in a day and we had 39 out of a possible 40 completed this weekend. It was incredible." Pomeroy said. "It's almost unheard of to have a team have so many successful runs. They had everything together. They were focused and ready to win. It was evident."

The women's team was spectral as well. Finishing second in the division to Brown, the women's skiing team was expecting a strong finish to the season, and they got off to a good start at Waterville.

Hawkins finished third in slalom event with Doughty (fifth) and Rauh (12th) rounding out the race. They finished with a team-time of 301.70.

In the giant slalom Hawkins, placed in first place Doughty (fifth) and Lisbet (10th) again rounded out the Minutewomen's lineup. The women finished with a team-time of 386.25 in the giant slalom. Finishing with an overall time of 688.25, the women's team trounced the competition, beating second place Boston College by a full 7.59 seconds.

Pomeroy, though not fond of giving individual accolades, cited Doughty's tremendous performance.

"Caitlin Doughty had the weekend of the year. She was not feeling good about her equipment coming into this weekend so we changed some things around, and it was her best performance of the year."

Looking ahead to nationals next week in Idaho (Mar. 7-12), the men's and women's teams are flying high.

"We're coming off a great weekend. We are going out west as the teams from the east to beat." Pomeroy said. "All we have to worry about is a few teams from the west. We could not be going out there with a better frame of mind."

In a weekend that required the best performance at the highest levels, both teams came through in pressure situations. The best three times for the men came in the last run of their giant slalom race. It was enough to seal the deal for the UMass men's team, a fitting ending to a weekend that was full of clutch performances.

Free agency begins

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

The Washington Redskins did it again, jumping Wednesday to sign the first free agent of the season.

But the Baltimore Ravens landed the biggest prize of the first day of free agency, signing wide receiver Derrick Mason, whose 96 catches for Tennessee last season led all NFL wide receivers.

And the Cleveland Browns traded defensive tackle Gerard Warren, the third overall pick in the 2001 draft, to Denver. It was an overall net loss for Cleveland, as the Browns will get just a fourth-round draft choice for the underachieving Warren.

The 31-year-old Mason, one of six Titans cut last month in a salary cap purge, will join a team whose leading receiver had just 35 catches a year ago.

"We were high on his list, and he was high on our list." Ravens general manager Ozzie Newsome said. "He was really the only receiver we have had any active discussions with thus far. What this does is, we bring in a veteran receiver who has the type of attitude and type of personality that we look for in a football player."

St. Louis, meanwhile, signed 32-year-old linebacker Dexter Coakley, one day after he was released by Dallas.

Washington's catch was a former Raven, center Casey Rabach, who joined a team which has spent millions in the early days of free agency the last two seasons. But more significantly for the Redskins, who went wildly after high-priced free agents on the first day the last two years, was keeping one of their own, left tackle Chris Samuels, whose contract was redone to provide more salary cap room.

Those were the major free agents to sign on Day 1 of free agency.

Oakland also made an expected splash by officially completing the deal for Randy Moss, a trade made last week with Minnesota. The Raiders gave up linebacker Napoleon Harris and two draft picks, one of them the seventh overall in April's lottery.

On the road during huge win

Brendan Hall

Everybody remembers last Dec. 9 for almost the exact same reasons, emphasis on almost.

It was the night the Massachusetts men's basketball team was reborn anew, flush with newfound energy backed by an electric crowd, all reminiscent of the Calipari era, "Refuse to Lose" and that blazingly hot starting five of Camby, Padilla, Travieso, Bright and Dingle. The ESPN 2 cameras were rolling, the arena was sold out and it was such a good time to be donning Maroon and White. I couldn't believe it until I saw it again on ESPN Classic.

Why couldn't I believe all this? Oh, right, because I was nowhere near the beloved Mullins Center on the night they pulled off one of the biggest upsets in school history, the famous last-second upset of an overrated defending national champion. In fact, I was about three hours south in lovely Hempstead, N.Y., doing something else I currently love even more — watching UMass women's basketball.

This trip started at roughly 1 p.m., with me pacing around my room back and forth, making sure my tie was on straight and my shirt was tucked in. This was a very important game, which conversely called for very sharp looks. I hadn't gotten much sleep the night before, but that was okay because I'd be able to catch some Z's on this long ride over, or so I thought.

Anyways, the phone rings. It's my ride. He's outside the building in his Grand Am. It's go time. I packed a few CD's in my bag just in case conversation stalls and we feel like cruising in style, but I should have known better.

Three hours we drove nearly nonstop on the road, and not a split second went by without one of us sharing a crazy R-rated college story or conversing about some miniscule sports argument. But that's when we weren't talking about how crucial that night's game against Hofstra was going to be for these Minutewomen.

Somewhere we stopped at a McDonald's along a truckstop on Connecticut's Interstate 295, which reminds me: don't pig out at a truckstop. They jack up the prices ridiculously on everything because tourists think it's the only place they can stop and get a bite to eat for the next 100 miles. Losers.

Our route took us by the Nassau Coliseum on the right as we neared the New York lets' glorified practice facility. The arena had all the looks of the world's largest cesspool following the NHL lockout, but it's not like the Islanders have a huge following anyways.

So we finally arrive at the Hofstra Arena and spend 10 minutes skimming around the campus wondering where we 're supposed to park.

This arena was gorgeous, and when I say gorgeous I'm not talking about some glorified high school gym. This thing easily sits 5,000. It's nice and spread out and on top of that there are club seats. Yes, this neat little arena has a skybox in case the Pride garner another Speedy Claxton-type and generate interest.

But of course, no major college basketball game is complete without the ever-so-important media room. For those of you who have never had such a privilege, you get all the free food you want, and a bunch of cool media guides and releases with extensive stats so you can prep yourself to the max. Somebody want to remind me why I paid $6.75 for a cheeseburger in Connecticut?

My colleague gets a call from Amherst that says the fans have been piling into the Mullins Center since 8 p.m. That's one hour before tipoff. This must be some joke.

The Minutewomen end up winning the game 64-57, but this story is far from over. Another call from Amherst. The Minutemen are up 20-7. 20-7? We literally raced to the Grand Am and sped off in search of radio reception. All we got was "Zzzz ... fizzle ... crackle-crackle ... Freeman ... criggle-craggle ... zing ... Villanueva ... it is a sea of red here..."

And it would continue like that for the next 45 minutes or so before we finally fiddled around enough with the frequency to stumble upon UConn's flagship station. The reception wasn't much better, but at least you could hear some sort of score.

Oh, the score? So after we passed what seemed like a plethora of police cruisers along the Interstate, the reception finally clears up and tie game?

UMass, a team that hasn't had any significant impact on collegiate basketball since the 1990's, is going basket for basket against the defending national champs? Not to mention with two minutes left to go.

We've got to pull over.

Unfortunately, we landed ourselves in an abandoned church parking lot in New Haven. For those who haven't been to New Haven, it has all the looks of a rundown city left for dead ever since Jim Morrison got arrested there back in the 60's for indecent exposure, but that's a moot point, we weren't spending the night in this dump.

So now we got the game on full blast, all the doors open and windows down, and the three of us are hyperventilating like crazy. My colleague is pacing around the parking lot, I'm leaned against the trunk of the Grand Am with my head down.

You can barely hear the announcers of this game over the deafening roars of a crowd that, for one reason or another, has yet to again show even an eighth of the level of excitement it showed on this particular night. The final 10 seconds, however, are the ones I'll remember in vivid detail now, and probably still when I'm 75.

"Here comes Bowers down the floor. It's a two-on-one...dishes to Freeman and it's good! With 4.3 seconds left the Minutemen have taken the lead 61-59! Now here comes Anderson down the court, dishes off to Denham Brown. Brown for three...GOOD! And the Minutemen have won the game, and here they come onto the court!"

Wait, Brown hit the trey, but UMass won? That would mean our good ol' Maroon and White lost the game, but still won. Only after the announcer repeated the score, UMass winning 61-59 (not losing 62-61 as the play-by-play would have implied), were we truly able to run rampant around the vacated lot screaming our heads off and bumping chests.

We stop at the next gas station, half-angry, half-ecstatic beyond even abnormality. I must have gone to the counter and then changed my mind at least a half-dozen times. A fuse must have blown in my mind because the unthinkable just happened, and we were nowhere near the chaos.

And as we finally make it back to the epicenter of the chaos, Amherst, I think to myself, "Would I do it all again?"

Had I known something of this magnitude was going to erupt, would I have taken the trek, since I wouldn't have arrived back in time to reach the deadline anyways? Would I have even bothered?

The answer to all these questions is yes.

Sortino a master of her art

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Coaching is an art. Not many know how to do it right, and very few have mastered the skills of this art.

Since 1980, Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino has been painting the picture that is UMass softball. With a career record of 858-372-3 over the past 25 years, Sortino has propelled UMass into a class of elites and has developed some of the best college softball players in the nation.

For Sortino, it starts and ends with the players, and recruiting top-notch high school softball players is something that she has become accustomed to. But while Sortino searches for the most dominant recruits, she is not only interested in those who can pinch, hit or run the best.

"The first thing I look for is grades," Sortino said. "I always find that kids that do well academically. They're not lazy. I think lazy in a classroom translates to lazy on a court or on the field."

The talent that Sortino's past and present players have demonstrated is well documented. Former UMass pitcher Danielle Henderson (current assistant coach) is the prime example of Sortino's tenure at UMass. Henderson was a three-time All America selection, the winner of the Honda Award during her career at UMass, and a member of the 2000 gold medal winning Olympic softball team. Although Sortino still hopes that she can coach another Gold Medalist and some more professional athletes, UMass is always the priority for all of her sportswomen.

"The bottom line of any kid that ends up on our roster is they live, eat and breathe to play at UMass. They want UMass, and I look for that loyalty to our program," Sortino said. "I find that we're best getting the kids that really want to come to UMass. I don't ever try to talk a kid into coming here. Not one word. Never."

Academic success and faithfulness to UMass are not the only aspects that Sortino looks for in her players. She also makes sure that any girl she recruits has that intangible competitive edge that can only come naturally.

"There's nothing worse to coach than a great athlete with low desire. You can't do anything with that," Sortino said. "But you can take an average athlete with great desire and turn them into, you know, wonder women."

In the Atlantic 10 conference, six other softball teams strive each year to obtain a winning season.

Sortino has never had a losing season. As the toughest game on each A-10 team's schedule, Sortino must deal from year to year with the pressure of being the best. And while the Minutewomen know they have a target on their backs, Sortino and company thrive off of the tension.

"The reason why they chose UMass is they wanted that [pressure]. They wanted to be part of our great tradition. Is it pressure? Absolutely. Does it make life tough? Very difficult," Sortino said. "There are very few nights that I sleep through the night from now till June. It's what we want, it's what we do and we're very proud of our tradition."

After 25 years of proving that her program is among the most respected in the country, Sortino was recognized with an individual acknowledgment last year. As only the 16th coach to win over 800 games in NCAA history, Sortino was inducted into the National Fastpitch Coaches Association Hall of Fame on Dec. 4, 2004.

Even though it may be a strain to think of people who this Hall of Fame coach admires, there are such people. After all, every teacher has been taught.

"I've really learned by watching lots of coaches coach in all sports. Someone who had a very deep effect on my life that was here was Pam Dixon. She was someone I always looked to and held up on a pedestal," Sortino said. "There have been many people in the game of softball that I looked up to and there's people that I still look up to."

Is the life of a Division 1 softball coach a difficult job? That's debatable. What is true is that Sortino spent Saturday, Feb. 15 cleaning her house. That would mark the final day off that Sortino will have until June.

Until then, she will be focused on her job, on her duties and on her art.

Hockey East standings still unsettled for final weekend

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

More than five months of collegiate hockey has now passed by, the longest season in collegiate athletics is finally winding down and almost nothing has been assured in the Hockey East standings heading into the final weekend of regular season play.

Unless your sweaters read "Merrimack Warriors," you have a whole lot to play for as the season closes out.

First, there are several things that have been decided with the final one or two games left on each team's plate.

Once again, the Big Four — New Hampshire, Boston College, Boston University and Maine — have all earned home-ice advantage for the first round of the Hockey East playoffs.

The next four — Lowell, Northeastern, Providence and Massachusetts — have all clinched playoff berths, and Merrimack is the only team that will not play any playoff hockey.

Each of the top four teams can still win the regular season Hockey East crown, and here is how the Big Four are positioned with the final group of games set to begin tonight:

1. New Hampshire	15-4-3 33 points
2. Boston College	13-3-6 32 points
3. Boston University	14-5-3 31 points
4. Maine	13-5-4 30 points

Fittingly enough, these teams will all square off this weekend. UNH and BU will play a home-and-home series beginning tonight in Boston and concluding Saturday night in Durham, and BC will host Maine at Conte Forum twice, starting tomorrow night and finishing up on Saturday.

Here are the scenarios that will give the Wildcats the championship: UNH sweeps BU; UNH earns 3 points (win plus tie) against BU, and Boston College does not sweep Maine; UNH earns 2 points (one win or two ties) against BU, and BC only earns 2 points against Maine; UNH only earns one tie with BU, and BC only takes 1 point against Maine.

Here are the scenarios that will give Boston College the championship: BC sweeps Maine, plus UNH only earns a maximum of 3 points against BU; BC earns 3 points against Maine plus UNH and BU split or tie twice.

Here are the scenarios that will give the Terriers the championship: BU sweeps UNH, plus BC only earns a maximum of 2 points against Maine; BU earns 3 points (win and tie) against UNH, plus BC only earns a maximum of 2 points against Maine.

Here is the scenario that will give Maine the championship: Maine sweeps BC, plus BU earns exactly 3 points against UNH.

The next pair in the standings are Lowell and Northeastern, and both schools are in a battle for the fifth seed while neither can finish worse than sixth heading into the postseason. This is where they currently fit in the standings:

BU handles Minutewomen

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Correspondent

After a 6-10 season in 2004 the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is looking to improve this season. The 2005 squad is young, with 15 of 27 players being incoming freshman. It is important that the women's team set the tone early, and that is exactly what they did at Holy Cross on Feb. 26, beating their in-state rivals 14-11 in their season opener.

UMass	4

Against Holy Cross, junior Kerri Connerty scored four goals and added one assist, while freshman Kathleen Typadis recorded a hat trick. It was the most goals by a freshman in a season opener in the last five years. Only four other freshmen in the last four years have scored three goals in one game. Typadis was honored with the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week award for her performance in the season opener.

The Minutewomen fell behind early against Holy Cross, with three consecutive goals being scored by Patricia Sutton in the first six minutes of action.

After UMass went down 4-0, the team riled off four consecutive goals to tie the game. The Minutewomen scored three more times before the half, taking a 7-5 lead into halftime. They did not relinquish that lead as the team was led by two freshman, Typadis and Kristina Twichell, to a solid second half and the victory.

Trying to ride the momentum from last week, the Minutewomen visited Boston University yesterday to play a turf war at Nickerson Field. The Minutewomen fell to the No. 14 BU Terriers 14-4, as BU led a balanced attack, with four girls providing a hat trick for the Terriers. They were led by sophomore Angie Martin who scored three goals and two assists for five points. Martin was joined by senior Alyssa Trudel, freshman Jenny Hauser and freshman Lauren Morton, who all posted hat tricks against the Minutewomen.

The Minutewomen cut the lead to a slim two goals with a score by Jackie Nesbitt with little time remaining before the half. The Terriers, however, struck right back with a last-second goal before the half to make it 6-3.

The last-second goal was deflating for the Minutewomen as BU took over.

The Terriers controlled the possession of the game by creating eight turnovers in the second half and forcing UMass into bad decisions. The Minutewomen had 16 turnovers in the game and struggled in the second half, being outscored by the Terriers 8-1. UMass was outshot 27-10 for the game.

The Minutewomen and senior Kristin St. Hilaire didn't have the answers against No. 15 Boston University yesterday.

Junior Lauren McCarthy made 12 saves on 27 throughout the game, while BU goalie Anne Sheridan posted six saves of 10 shots.

She was a World Cup member in 1997 and 2001. It will be her second year as the coach of the women's lacrosse team, coming off a 6-15 record in her debut last season.

UM men's track team impressive

By Daniel Hillman
Collegian Correspondent

Friday and Saturday, the Massachusetts men's track team traveled to Boston to compete in the New England Track and Field Championships.

The momentum from the strong performances the week prior at the Atlantic 10 Championships carried over, as the Minutemen impressed a large field of competitors. UMass finished seventh out of the 36 teams participating over the weekend and boasted several strong performances.

In the 500 meter, junior standout, James Godinho, finished in first place. The first-place finish marks the third time this season that Godinho has finished number one. Godinho also broke the school record with a time of 1:02.98.

This is the third time he has broken the school's 500-meter record in the last year. In addition to those achievements, Godinho also improved his qualifying mark for this upcoming weekend's, IC4A championships.

The other first-place performance of the day belonged to senior John Korhonen, who just a week ago settled for a second-place finish in the Atlantic 10 Championships. Korhonen bounced back strong and found himself atop the leader board in the mile race on Saturday. His time of 4:08.58 beat out second place Max Smith of Providence by almost a full second. Korhonen's time on Saturday was the second fastest time he's posted this season.

In the 55-meter dash, senior co-captain Joe McCormack, for the second week in a row, finished in second place by a hair. His time of 6.42 seconds was another season-best performance this weekend for the Minutemen.

The other captain of the team, senior Henry Smith, finished in third in the long jump. Smith's jump of 46 feet, 2.5 inches marked yet another career-best mark for a Minuteman over the weekend. Freshman shot-putter, Sean Callicchio, also continued to throw well this weekend. His toss of 51 feet, 1 inch landed him in seventh place.

In a very competitive field, the men's 4x8-relay team took home fourth place with a time of 7:45.02. The relay team, which last week won the Atlantic 10 Championship, clocked in at a time that was nearly a minute faster than its top time of the season.

The strong performance by the Minutemen was a big boost as the team begins to hit its stride heading into the outdoor track season. The team will be returning to Boston this weekend, to compete in the IC4A Championships.

Strong performance for UMass

By Rob Greenfield

While skiing may appear to be an individual sport, the intangible team aspects are essential for success, especially in pressure situations, assistant coach Dave Pomeroy said.

This was evident last weekend in Waterville Valley when both the Massachusetts men's and women's skiing teams took the regional title, each team beating 19 other teams out for the win.

"They are psyched," Pomeroy said of the skiers. "They are both still really young teams, for them to pull this off is great. It is promising for next year as well."

After the men finished second in the division to Plymouth State, and the women placing second behind Boston College, both teams came into this weekend with high expectations. No one, however, expected this.

Even though UMass skiing dominance in the past and present has not made much of a splash outside of the skiing world, an accomplishment like this should not go unnoticed.

"No one can recall a time when both the men and women won the Eastern Regional," Pomeroy said. "We are glad were part of making history. Within the last three years, the men have won the regional twice and the women once. We are all proud of ourselves."

Ken Thoman was named coach of the skiing program in September of 2003. Since his arrival, the skiing program has had great success.

"He does have a different approach," Pomeroy said. "He's largely focused on maintaining all the guys' equipment. He is up there at the start of the race putting additives on the skis. He is definitely hands-on, and the results are showing."

The men and women's teams cut their squads down to five from 10 to race in the regional final. The men's team sent freshman Jason Small, sophomore Rush Hawkins, senior Kevin Collins, junior Marc Epstein, senior Pat Hofer and junior Pat Bachant — six skiers to situationally strengthen the team.

Taking three out of the five racing scores, the men's team dominated the competition. Rush Hawkins (first), Jason Small (sixth) and Patrick Hofer (13th) rounded out the men's slalom runs with a team-time of 275.1, beating the runner-up in the event by 1.38 seconds, a substantial margin.

With confidence riding high, the men posted even better times in the giant slalom event. Hawkins led the way again in first with Marc Epstein (eighth) and Pat Hofer (11th) following, posting a team time of 367.21, a full 7.38 seconds ahead of the second-place finisher. The men's squad finished with an overall time of 642.31, 10.41 seconds ahead of Plymouth State, the one team that finished ahead of them in the regular

By Matthew Belliveau
Collegian Correspondent

It's been nearly a month since the New England Patriots defeated the Philadelphia Eagles in Super Bowl XXXIX, but for the University of Massachusetts Dining Services department, the smell of victory still lingers.

Weeks before the Patriots kicked off against the Eagles, Ken Toong, director of UMass Dining Services, made wagers with both Matt Smith, the director of Dining Services at the University of Pennsylvania, and Barry Scerbo, Penn State's Food Service director.

If the Eagles won, Toong had promised to send a large number of baskets filled with New England's finest foods: lobsters, clam chowder, baked beans, brown bread and a Boston cream pie. Toong was also willing to send his executive chef, Willie Tsg, to Penn State to be photographed wearing a Eagles T-shirt and cap while preparing food for its students.

If the Patriots won, Smith and Scerbo promised to send plenty of Philly Cheese steak grinders, pork rolls, scrapples, soft pretzels, and tasty cakes to the UMass campus. Sherbo also countered Toong's wager and agreed that if the Eagles lost, he too would send his executive chef, Bill Laychur, to UMass in order to prepare a special feast exclusively for Mr.Toong.

Everyone knows who came out the victor in that wager. The Patriots were victorious sliding past the Eagles 24-21.

Smith and Scerbo both sent the food as promised, and UMass students, as well as some of the faculty, enjoyed most of the food: except for the scrapples, a highly priced sausage-like food served at breakfast.

"Awful," scoffed Mr.Toong. "They tasted like liver. The students just shook their heads after eating them. But you can't beat their cheesesteaks, they were amazing."

But instead of having Laychur cook specially for him, Mr.Toong decided to organize the "UMass vs. Penn State Cooking Extravaganza," placing Chef Tsg's cuisine versus Laychur's culinary creations. Five "impartial" judges would be selected to judge the dishes, and smaller portions would be given out to the twenty of the invited guests in attendance.

Brazilian Carnival coming to UMass

By Juliana Leal
Collegian Staff

Dance lovers will have a chance to enjoy themselves in the University of Massachusetts' own rendition of the Brazilian Carnival. Organized by the Brazilian student association, "Student Association for the Multicultural Brazilian Alliance," the third annual carnival will take place tomorrow from 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Carnival is known worldwide as the largest cultural celebration, longest party, and the perfect vacation for Brazilians and foreigners alike. The way it is celebrated depends on the region of Brazil visited; the northeast is best known for its week-long street parties with famous performers. The southeast has elaborate parades of "samba schools," each with its own theme, incorporating thousands of participants. Every other region integrates its own cultural traditions to the national festivity.

Last year's carnival at UMass "was a huge success," says SAMBA president Talia Yagudin. With about 400 attendees, the Carnival Out of Season featured Brazilian dinner, typical dance performances, a show by drumming group Treme Terra, and a Brazilian DJ.

This year, SAMBA is bringing back the most successful aspects of last year's celebration, but making the event even bigger.

Dinner will launch the night, with dishes such as Latin Risoto, Salpicão (a Brazilian salad with ham, potatoes, and mayonnaise), Fried Plantains and Frango Nobre (a traditional chicken recipe).

A presentation by SAMBA members on the origin and uniqueness of Brazilian Carnival will follow.

"It's important for people to understand what it is that makes Brazilian Carnival so different from other places," said Yagudin. "Most people don't know the significance of the celebration or the fact that it varies so much depending on where you go in the country."

Bruno Ferreira and his group, instructors of Brazilian dance in Boston, will perform at the event. After, they will lead a short workshop to teach the crowd simple moves that will enable them to get the most out of Carnival.

Banda Treme Terra, a seven-piece drumming group accompanies, a show by drumming group Treme Terra, and a Brazilian DJ.

Nightclub workers' death benefits paid

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — A judge on Thursday ordered the owners of a nightclub where a deadly fire occurred in 2003 to pay death benefits and lost wages to the families of four nightclub employees.

State Workers' Compensation Court Judge Bruce Morin ruled the families of employees Andrea and Steven Mancini, Tracy King and Dina DeMaio should each receive $15,000 in death or burial benefits. He also ordered the club's owners to pay $818.10 weekly to King's family and $732.90 weekly to DeMaio's son and guardian. Those payments are retroactive to the time of the fire, and continue until the children reach legal age, or if King's wife remarries.

Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, owners of The Station nightclub, did not have workers' compensation insurance when their club burned to the ground in the Feb. 20, 2003, fire that killed 100 people and injured more than 200 others. The fire was sparked by a rock band's pyrotechnics.

"The bottom line is (the Derderians) have always wanted to compensate the families of their employees," said Jeffrey Pine, attorney for Jeffrey Derderian. "The issue has always been to reach some sort of settlement on that."

The Derderians have five business days to file an appeal, according to Maureen Aveno, executive director of the Workers' Compensation Court.

Barbara Magness, Steven Mancini's mother, said she was happy to receive some compensation, but the money wasn't why she took legal action.

"Why shouldn't (the Derderians) be held accountable for what they did?" Magness told The Associated Press.

Under state law, if the Derderians had carried workers' compensation insurance, the families of the employees killed would have been eligible for $15,000 for burial and other expenses, plus a portion of the deceased's lost wages.

Michael St. Pierre, DeMaio's attorney, was cautious about the ruling.

"I think it's going to be difficult to come up with what they have to pay for these four families," he said.

Pope could be out of hospital by Easter

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II may be out of the hospital in three weeks and in time for Easter, his spokesman said in a cautious declaration Thursday, stressing that the frail pontiff's health continues to improve as he leads the Roman Catholic Church from his hospital room.

The Vatican said John Paul is eager to leave the hospital but accepts his doctors' advice not to rush his discharge.

A week after the 84-year-old pope was taken to the hospital after his second breathing crisis in a month, spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls would offer no firm prediction of when John Paul would return to the Vatican, confirm any of his plans for Easter or say with certainty whether he will participate in noon prayers this Sunday.

"There's no precise date yet. I wouldn't want to put forth a likely date because it might change in a positive or negative way," Navarro-Valls replied when asked about the pope's eventual release.

In line, however, with Vatican efforts to show John Paul is in command, Navarro-Valls said the pope has been receiving several top churchmen "with whom he daily follows the activity of the Holy See and the life of the church."

With Vatican officials standing in for the pope, including an archbishop who has become his official voice, a new image of the papacy has been emerging during the hospitalization. Several top officials have said they see no problem with a pope who can't speak.

Illustrating how the ailing pope is attending to business, the Vatican released a message the pope sent to a Vatican congregation holding its general assembly.

Pope John Paul II waves from his hospital window on Sunday.

But John Paul's presence would be important at Holy Week celebrations leading up to Easter on March 27.

Asked whether the pope might be back at the Vatican in time for Easter, Navarro-Valls said: "It's possible."

He said the Vatican was going ahead with its regular Easter schedule and that if the pope was released before the holiday, his level of participation would still have to be decided.

Navarro-Valls said the incision made in John Paul's throat after surgery to insert a breathing tube was healing, although it was not known if there were plans to remove the tube. Reporters have been unable to speak directly with the pope's doctors, as during previous hospitalizations at the Gemelli Polyclinic, but Navarro-Valls said the medical bulletins were the work of the attending physicians.

He said the Vatican would decide Saturday what the pope's schedule for Sunday would be, but that it was likely an archbishop would read out the Angelus prayer and blessing to the faithful, and implied the pope might make another appearance at his hospital window.

"The health of the Holy Father John Paul II continues to improve and show progress," the spokesman said. "As previously stated, the pope is eating regularly and spends several hours each day in an armchair. The surgical wound is healing."

He said the pope's daily speech and breathing therapy was continuing "with the active collaboration of the Holy Father," and that the pope spends some time in the small chapel adjoining his room.

The pope's overall health and recovery are complicated by Parkinson's disease, which causes gradual loss of muscle control. He also suffers from crippling hip and knee ailments.

John Paul was taken by ambulance to Gemelli with breathing spasms on Feb. 1 and was released on Feb. 10, only to be rushed back again on Feb. 24 for a throat operation that left him with a breathing tube and facing extensive speech and respiratory therapy. The Vatican said the next health update would come on Monday.

Senate against Canadian beef

By Libby Quaid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted Thursday to overturn the Bush administration's decision to allow Canadian cattle into the country nearly two years after they were banned because of mad cow disease.

The White House said President Bush would veto the measure if it ever reached his desk, warning that continuing to refuse Canadian beef would damage efforts to persuade other countries to buy U.S. beef.

Supporters fell short of the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto. The Senate's 52-46 vote was to reject the Agriculture Department's decision to resume imports of Canadian cows under 30 months of age beginning next week. A similar measure has been introduced in the House, but leaders there have scheduled no vote on it.

"They've got mad cow disease," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D. "Now the question is, should we run the risk of opening our border to livestock imports from Canada, when the evidence demonstrates clearly they're not enforcing their regulations to reduce the risk to them and to us?"

Agriculture officials had planned to reopen the border next Monday. However, a federal judge on Wednesday granted a temporary injunction sought by Western ranchers seeking to keep the ban in place.

Western ranchers saw near-record cattle prices last year and want to protect those prices by refusing Canadian cattle.

New restrictions for fishermen

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON — The beleaguered North Atlantic right whale gets new protections from fatal fishing line entanglements under proposed rules released last week, but it's going to cost fishermen.

New whale-safe gear requirements, including a switch to rope that sinks to the ocean floor so whales don't get snared in it, could cost East Coast fishermen an estimated $14 million annually, according to a federal document.

Lobstermen, particularly in Maine, would absorb the vast majority of the cost.

The proposal to amend the Atlantic Large Whale Take Reduction Plan also predicts that under proposed rules favored by the federal government, which makes the final decisions on the law, some fishermen would "face costs significant enough to drive them out of business."

The rules won't be enacted for several months, after the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration considers public comments and submits final regulations.

Pat White, chief executive officer of the Maine Lobstermen's Association, said he hopes funding is available for lobstermen forced to switch gear, much of which is already used in different sectors of the industry.

"No one wants to see the whales all gone, but no one wants to see us all gone either," White said.

The changes would do away with a widely despised system, called Dynamic Area Management, which forces lobstermen to pull unsafe gear from areas where right whales are spotted. Fishermen have complained the system is too unpredictable and regulators have questioned its effectiveness.

"It's not working as well for us, the whales, or the fishermen," said Mary Colligan, NOAA's assistant regional administrator of Protected Resources.

The proposed rules come after years of research and debate between fishermen, regulators and environmentalists about how best to protect the North Atlantic right whale, which has a total population of about 300 to 350.

The draft document includes two separate slates of rules that NOAA said it favors. Both include the new gear requirements, as well as expanding whale-safe rules to other industries that present similar entanglement threats with fixed nets or traps and pots, such as the shrimp and scup fisheries.

The lobster industry bears about $12.8 million of the estimated $14.2 million it would cost annually to comply with the changes, according to the document.

About 3,700 boats would be affected by the new rules. Of 212 vessels projected to be "heavily affected," meaning annual costs to comply are more than 15 percent of revenues, 56 percent - or 122 - are lobster boats from Maine, by far the East Coast's leader in annual lobster revenues with about $202 million in 2003.

nied by female dancers, will follow. They will show the music and dance of the Afro-Brazilian culture predominant in the state of Bahia, with clothing and moves derived from African heritage.

The second half of the performance will show carnival as it is in Rio de Janeiro, with Brazilian drumming and dancers in ornate costumes characterized by sequins, feathers, and lots of color.

"We're so lucky to have Treme Terra perform at our Carnival. Their energy is incredible, not a single person can stay seated when they're drumming and dancing," said Barbara Rosemberg, SAMBA secretary.

A new addition to the carnival celebration will be the band Syllus. A regular at Brazilian Carnival events all over New England, the seven-piece group will perform the high-energy music of Carnival.

UMass alumnus Dmitriy Ishbilkant is traveling from Boston, along with other alumni, just for Carnival.

"I'm looking forward to seeing the band perform. Brazilian music is so contagious, the best way to really enjoy it is live."

DJ D' Martinez from Boston will close the night with Brazilian, Latin, hip hop, reggae, and dance beats.

Tickets for "Carnival" are $4 for UMass students and $5 for the general public. The first 50 people to attend the event will receive complimentary masks. SAMBA asks that guests wear green, yellow, blue, and white - the colors of the Brazilian flag - to get in the spirit of Carnival.

"We thought it would be great if we could showcase the regional delicacies of each region, in hopes of finding out who's better, just as a friendly competition," said Toong. "But really the main idea behind this is just the promotion of college dining, which is quite different from what it used to be."

The five judges used for the competition included Frank Lattuca from the Hospitality and Tourism Management department; the Daily Hampshire Gazette's Tom Marshall; Carol Cambo, a writer UMass Amherst Magazine; UMass freshman, Tim Bessette; and Philadelphia native, John Bonanni, sophomore at UMass.

The judges were asked to score the chef's dishes on three criteria: the presentation and serving method of the dish; the level of its creativity and practicality; and the flavor, taste, texture, and "doneness" of the meals.

Sng's menu consisted of grilled Maine lobster with a Cajun beurre blanc, Boston clam chowder and crab cakes with a mango salad. Laychur countered Sng with his menu that included a traditional Amish Chicken corn chowder, oak lettuce salad, venison loin steak and Philadelphia style cheesecake.

Although there was a declared winner, Tsg's menu scored a total of 220.25 points to Laychur's 216.25, everyone in attendance saw the "Cook-Off Extravaganza" as a success in which everyone was a winner.

"This was more for fun that anything," said Martha Monaghan, head of Special Operations for the UMass Dining Services.

Both of the chefs received plaques honoring their sportsmanship throughout the contest. Laychur and his assistant Paul Nicolini were also given UMass sweatshirts and sweatpants in reward for their efforts.

"I really liked the clam chowder," said Bessette, "it's something that I've had everywhere, but this tasted different with the bacon on the top."

Bonanni, a huge Eagles fan, enjoyed Laychur's venison loin steak.

"I've never had anything like that," said Bonanni. "It was drizzled with some strawberry sauce that really made it stand out."

Laychur wasn't too disappointed with his "loss."

"It was good times, a great competition. A lot of great spirit and great dishes," said Laychur.

"I would love to do something like this again," said Sng, "but after losing all of those players I'm not sure the Patriots can make it back."

Hell is just a sauna

World Perspectives

Paige Cram

In the tiny Tuscan town of Montecatini, nestled into the Apennine Mountains, my friends and I found paradise ... literally. There's a day spa built on a series of natural hot springs and caves which are used for therapeutic massages and steam baths, and last weekend we decided to take a day trip there without really knowing much about it. As with many of my adventures here, it turned out to be the experience of a lifetime.

We arrived at the spa just in time for our appointment for the "steam caves." The woman in charge explained to us that there were three levels to the caves that would become increasingly hotter as we descended. She recommended that we take our time and allow our bodies to adjust before proceeding to the final level.

We walked down a long pathway that led us into the entrance of the cave and eventually to a clearing. We were greeted by a strange little man in a white linen gown who for some reason reminded all of us of the Albino from The Princess Bride. He gave each of us matching white gowns and heated lockers in which to keep our clothes. Then, he simply pointed us in the right direction and said, "Prego ... Paradiso," which essentially means "welcome, paradise awaits you."

We figured we must have somehow taken a wrong turn and were about to ask the man if he happened to be St. Peter, but apparently the woman in charge had simply forgotten to mention that the levels of the caves were named after Dante's three works of the "Divine Comedy": Paradise, Purgatory and of course, The Inferno.

After assuring ourselves that we were not in fact in the afterlife, we wandered around Paradise. It was certainly relaxing: dark, cool, quiet and the caves were amazingly beautiful, but I couldn't help thinking that it certainly didn't look like any paradise I would want to live in. Purgatory was similar, except noticeably hotter, and half an hour later we found ourselves in the Inferno, where we were welcome to sit down, relax and enjoy the natural sauna-like conditions. It seemed strange to all of us that in a mostly Catholic country they could justify making Hell so pleasant, but we certainly weren't complaining.

As I sat soaking in this supposed hell, I realized there had to be some significance to this experience. I've never been an exceptionally religious person, but I'd have to be blind, deaf and dumb to ignore signs as clear as these.

E.M. Forster said it best when he wrote "Italy is both the school and the playground of the world." My own personal playground here consists mainly of Nutella, gelato and train rides to anywhere I please. I've walked among Roman ruins, bathed in underground Tuscan caves, and viewed more original art work than my mind knows how to appreciate. And while a good amount of this trip has been fun and games, it certainly doesn't stop there. The funny anecdotes and priceless memories are only the shallowest level of my experiences thus far. And while I'm not sure I will ever be able to explain the effects of this trip, I can feel them taking place at every turn.

It's not really a matter of religiousness, but rather one of spirituality. A person can not come to Italy, can not see the things I'm seeing and do the things I'm doing without coming away a little changed. I sat in the church that Dante attended, went to the house where Michaelangelo lived and walked along the original streets where, two thousand years ago, the Romans went about their daily lives. You cannot live here in the present without simultaneously experiencing the past, and you cannot touch the past without it altering your future.

You cannot live here in the present without simultaneously experiencing the past, and you cannot touch the past without it altering your future.

Every day I walk across one of the oldest bridges in Europe on my way to attend my actual classes, but as it is turning out, this country, its people, and its past are giving me a far better education than I could ever hope to obtain elsewhere.

As my time in the Inferno drew to a close, I slowly brought myself back to one of the strangest realities I have ever known. I had come to no real conclusions, except that when I returned to the world of the living I would continue to cherish every second of my time here. I want to live, breathe and, most importantly, eat this country before my time runs out. I made this resolution to myself and took a deep breath as my friends I prepared for our journey back. We would ascend from the depths as new people, wiser and more appreciative, and when we returned to the top we would find ourselves, once again, in Paradise.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

ENOUGH RED TAPE

I feel thoroughly embittered by my four years at UMass. I am frustrated at the red tape of the administration: the pitifully slow processes of bureaucracy, construction and paperwork.

The nepotism, corrupt backwardness of a stagnant group of paper-pushers nearly balance out the merits of the academics of UMass, which I consider to be excellent.

Every President and Dean of Students whose solution for changing our school is only to make it more expensive and less accessible to the poor of Massachusetts, hurts us. Every student program designed only to fit a narrow budget and serve a narrowly-defined role, hurts us.

A university, particularly a public one, funded by the state, should be managed with the best interests of the students of Massachusetts in mind.

A University is not an educational corporation, an expensive four-year training program founded for profit or financial expansion.

The University of Massachusetts should not seek to exclude the poor of its own state so that the rich from afar can enter it like any private school. If we must raise taxes so that the young people of our state are educated, then let us raise taxes.

Perhaps first let us cut the good-old-boy salaries of figures like William Bulger, who recently suffered a small cut to his enormous pension.

If need be, let the administration be reorganized and some cut. Cut the unnecessary fat, but do it all in the best interest of the student, the presumed first citizen of this college. Not in the best interest of Coke, or Disney or Spring Break Vacation companies who are allowed to run amuck while student organizations and student businesses struggle.

Let us not think of the bottom line or the shallow image of this school, but rather let us think of its noble goal: to educate the citizens of our commonwealth.

Let every step forward be in their name.

Excitement for spring sports

Mike Anmuth

Now that spring is coming, despite the snowstorm that we just experienced, I know this means that the basketball and hockey seasons are ending. This makes me sad because since I've returned from winter break, I've gone to as many hockey and basketball games as possible, both in men's and women's sports and mostly home but also two away games, where I got to be in the absolute minority that was UMass fans. It was been very satisfying to me since I realized that intertwined with my love for our athletics is my love for this campus, and if you've read my earlier columns glorifying said campus, you know that frankly, I am all about the University of Massachusetts.

Still, all good things must come to an end, and with the last home game for men's hockey on Friday night and men's basketball following on Saturday, I am psyched to root on those sports before going on to the next stage when lacrosse, softball and baseball will be primarily occupying my devotion to athletics and I will be cheering on their sidelines. Though I know that I am not actually part of the teams, I feel a connection at the games seeing the good, the bad, and the sometimes ugly that is Division I sports.

Despite the fact that I have not yet obtained my foam hand for cheering and waving ostentatiously in the air, ever thankful to the Maroon Platoon, I was able to borrow the Massachusetts banner from the Mullins Center to take to the UMass/Temple men's basketball game at Temple. Nothing made me more proud than to cast that banner over the seats in front of my buddy and me at the game and stand up and scream for our beloved Minutemen. Even though the game was not a victory in our favor, the banner displayed our love and admiration for our team.

Win or lose UMass, I will be there rooting on the teams to victory. I have attended events in snowstorms, at odd times of day, when I should have been reviewing for other tests since I did poorly due to not studying, and when I deemed going to events more important than anything else I could have been doing at that time. This is a practice that will not fold due to the end of basketball and hockey, but rather will expand with the advancing of the calendar towards spring. I will be avoiding studying all spring long by attending outdoor sporting events that I will decidedly make more important than being indoors.

Win or lose, UMass, I will be there rooting on the teams to victory.

At this point in time, I am offering my gratitude to those athletes who work hard and practice every day to play for this university. I would love to be known as the official women's basketball superfan, and I hope that I was seen as a fixture behind the basket for each home game. I think it was at these games where I had the most enjoyable time, despite sometimes being the only one in the student section. Being alone is no fun, and as usual, I would encourage everyone to check out women's basketball for next year's home games along with the other events that are concluding in the near future.

Spring is eminent and I make the same promise to the sports in the spring that I did for the sports mentioned above. I will be there, possibly with big maroon foam hand and possibly without (depending on whether I actually purchase it or not), and I will be screaming and jumping up and down in support of our teams. You can look for me, there are only so many 5'5" guys who insist on cheering whenever possible. Actually, if I knew how to play the trumpet, I would play the fight song at events where the band isn't present just to show more support.

This means that I want to see as many people as possible out to watch the spring sports, on the sidelines and cheering for our teams. Even if you can't make it to all of the events, like I try to do, make it to the ones that interest you. Not only will you encourage our student athletes, but you will feel like more of a part of this campus and a part of our athletics program. Let's show our support, UMass, and show our rivals on the court or the field that UMass students stand behind their spring sports 110%. I know I will, and every time we score or excel, I will stand proudly at the sideline and jump in the air while yelling, "Let's go UMass!"

Where have the viewers gone?

Erin McNamee

Before I begin, let me say this: I am not by any stretch of the imagination an expert on the television industry. However, this column will serve two purposes. One for my own agenda and the other for the good of mankind: to get you to watch "Arrested Development" and to figure out why the hell TV networks cancel good shows and shower us with bad ones instead.

It seems that in these "American Idol"-obsessed times of huge ratings and lucrative endorsement contracts involving aspiring singers frolicking around a Ford Focus while drinking from huge cups of Coca Cola, TV networks are only looking for quantity. If a show rings in tons of viewers, great. If a show is low rated but wins awards and critical acclaim, not so great. Frankly, I don't understand this; it seems completely backwards.

I realize it's an oxymoron to criticize Hollywood for being greedy, but there's no room for greed in the television industry. While a movie studio can return a profit thanks to the DVD and overseas markets, television shows don't have these options until they've become successful mainstays in America.

I don't think the networks are entirely at fault, however; viewers certainly have a hand in the problem as well. After all, people actually watch some of the crap that's on TV. I'm not trying to be a snob here, but how in the name of "Seinfeld" can someone prefer a one-note bore like "Two and a Half Men" (CBS) to two of the best shows on television, "Arrested Development" (FOX) and "Scrubs" (NBC)? I tried once to watch "Two and a Half Men" to see what all the fuss was about, but I was so bored that I actually wanted to do homework instead.

On the other hand, "Arrested" and "Scrubs" are so good that I wouldn't even call them sitcoms; the jokes are consistently funny, the characters and actors are dynamite, and best of all there's no annoying, intrusive laugh track.

Let's put this into perspective ratings-wise: "Arrested" actually has about the same amount of viewers as FOX mainstays "Malcolm in the Middle" and "That 70s Show," yet the two latter programs have been broadcast for multiple seasons and don't seem to be going anywhere in the near future. So why can't FOX commit to "Arrested" despite its loyal fan base and multiple award wins from the Emmys, Golden Globes and the Writers Guild of America?

Or maybe part of the overall problem can be blamed on the increasingly popular practice of downloading television shows from the Internet? It sure sounds like the ideal situation: download a show, usually in a commercial-free, High-Definition format, and watch it whenever is convenient for you.

Two of the most downloaded shows on the Internet are, sure enough, "Arrested" and "Scrubs." These shows can be downloaded using a program called BitTorrent, which is currently used by more than 20 million people. Through BitTorrent you can download a TV show in a matter of minutes.

This all sounds very attractive, but I can understand why TV networks are freaking out over the phenomenon. The potential few million people who download "Arrested Development" instead of watching it on TV have no way of being counted into the weekly Nielsen ratings, therefore harming the show's chances of survival. And since mostly college students use BitTorrent, this is taking a huge chunk out of the coveted aged 18-49 demographic that most television shows target.

But BitTorrent can't be entirely to blame: shows that are recorded with TiVo, InDemand, or even a VCR are also not factored into the Nielsen ratings. Perhaps, then, the problem lies within the system that the networks use to measure ratings; it is obviously critically flawed and doesn't give an accurate reading on how many viewers actually see these shows.

If television networks want to keep high-quality, under-the-radar shows on air, they need to do a better job of reaching their viewers through stable time slots, rigorous cross-promotion, and a better ratings system.

I love to watch a good television show once in a while as I'm sure do a lot of other people. However, I've become increasingly frustrated with the medium because it seems that the really awful shows are often the ones to get high ratings, forcing the rare gems to be swept under a rug and forgotten forever ("Freaks and Geeks," anyone?). Not every TV show can be a huge ratings draw like "American Idol" or "CSI," so it doesn't seem fair to thwart what little creativity and originality is already out there.

The bottom line is this: if television networks want to keep high-quality, under-the-radar shows on air, they need to do a better job of reaching their viewers through stable time slots, rigorous cross-promotion, and a better ratings system. It also wouldn't hurt to air whole seasons of regular shows in their entirety instead of interrupting them for a month to air "Who Wants to Clean P. Diddy's Toilet?" or whatever new reality show (oh I'm sorry, "human drama") they have in the can. TV needs some TLC, stat.

Donald Trump's "The Apprentice" is holding auditions at campuses nationwide for a new season of the reality TV show.

YOU'RE HIRED!

Students, alumni are lining up for latest `Apprentice' casting call

By Lucy Kapanov
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

At George Washington University's casting call for "The Apprentice" there were no awkward combovers or "Free Martha" t-shirts. But there were more than 130 students and alumni sporting everything from tattered jeans to their business best.

"It's not about lame and fortune, it's just the experience, you know?" said Kwaku Akyeampong, a GW alumnus and senior consultant for IBM. "Life is short and you're only here for a short while, so you just have to have fun."

NBC producers contacted the school about hosting the closed audition, held on Thursday, for all students and alumni over 21 years of age, said Valoree Vargo, executive director of advancement, communications and events at GW.

With the nationwide open casting calls often drawing crowds of hundreds or more, intimate campus settings allow students and producers to get a better feel for one another in a less pressured setting. Other schools are also benefiting from similar opportunities, including Boston University, the University of Indianapolis and Duke.

The hallway of the GW Alumni House was packed with students and graduates, some full of dreams and aspirations and others just along for the thrill of the ride.

GW alum Akyeampong looked composed and professional in a pressed navy suit, power-blue tie and handkerchief that peeked out of his left breast pocket, and seemed more ready to preside over the boardroom than to compete in it. His confidence also matched his smart dress.

"Like I said, I am a smart person. I am African but I was educated by the two superpowers: the Soviet Union and the United States," said Akyeampong, who also showed off his fluency in Russian during the interview. "I'm smart in math, science, space exploration, military defense... If I win it's fine and if not, life goes on."

From 3 to 5 p.m., applicants were ushered into a small room where they received a numbered ticket and told to wait their turn. By 3:30, the Alumni House was transformed from an idyllic house into a crowded, frenzied waiting area.

A table with water and potato chips for applicants was left somewhat ignored, as students and alumni nervously chitchatted, went over their resumes or tried to absorb themselves in reading or doing work. A nervous silence fell over the room whenever a new group of numbers was called up for interview.

Many expressed surprise at the informality of the interviews. Students and alumni went into the interview room five at a time, and were either seated at a rectangular table or in soft cushioned couches and armchairs a few feet away. One of the producers ate her lunch as she conducted the debate-style interview. The other was comfortably reclining against the red cushions of the couch, listening to the animated conversation taking place among the candidates.

"The interview was real easy, mostly just talking and getting to know each other," said Anna Tucker, a 25-year-old MBA student. "Obviously everybody is wanting to stand out and say 'Look at me! Notice me!' and so everybody is kind of talking over each other. But the producers were very nice and welcoming and gave everyone a chance to talk."

"It started out very businesslike and then they told us to be relaxed and to just enjoy it, and we kind of just had this nice conversation," said Tamiont Copeland, a 28-year-old student working on his MBA. "They asked about using sexuality to get ahead in business. I said that if it's part of being confident then, hey, use it! There's nothing wrong with it as long as you don't cross the line between appropriate and not."

Though most agreed that their decision to audition was more spurred by the excitement of the experience than by the hefty six-figure salary reward, those who thought they'd win had some innovative plans for spending the money. Responses ranged from nice vacations in Italy, to bringing family members to the United States, to paying a father back for film school, to donating it all to the Democratic Party.

The crowd consisted mostly of 20- to 30-somethings, with a number of younger students milling about as well.

Beth Brodsky, a 21-year-old communications major who said she is clueless about where she might work once she graduates in May, hoped her age could increase her chances of being selected.

"I actually think that it can work as an advantage since these people do have jobs and I don't have anything to do next year so I would be available for taping," Brodsky said. "I don't have a job on hold or a family and I love to be in the spotlight."

"I always told myself I would never try out for any reality TV shows," said 25-year-old Jason White, who took time off from his job at a film production company in New York to audition. "But when 'The Apprentice' went on, I thought, here is a show gives an opportunity for success to someone regardless of college degree. I liked that it's more about that common sense, that entrepreneur attitude."

As for the Donald's hair:

"I don't think it matters," said White, running his hand over his own smooth scalp. "Shaved head, or flap or somewhere in between. It's what's inside that counts."

Angst is the perfect fit for `The Jacket' star Adrien Brody

By Nancy Mills
New York Daily News

HOLLYWOOD — Adrien Brody was making the rounds after the Oscars and saw Tom Cruise arrive at the Vanity Fair party.

"He showed up on his motorcycle, and it was a really cool thing to see," Brody says. "I wish I'd ridden my motorcycle instead of being in a limo. That would have been more my style.

"I really admire Tom. He's lived with fame for most of his adult life, and he handles himself like a true gentleman. I said to him, 'I'm trying to learn from you.'"

Even when he's happy, Brody can't resist a little New York angst. Torment seems to be his strong suit.

In "The Jacket," opening Friday, he plays an injured Gulf War veteran with amnesia who is accused of murder and winds up in an insane asylum. Drugged and locked in a morgue body drawer, he finds he can see into the future.

"I do suffer well," says Brody, who won the Best Actor Oscar two years ago for "The Pianist." This is his first starring role since then, though it was originally written for Colin Farrell.

"Jacket" director John Maybury stepped in when the $60 million action movie became a $20 million character study. Mark Wahlberg was set to star, but he dropped out around the time Brody won his Oscar.

"Adrien is not the stereotypical hero," Maybury says. "He's not a cookie-cutter beauty like Brad Pitt or Keanu Reeves. He has sensitivity, delicacy and finesse.

"His face is almost like a Modigliani. It couldn't be more expressive. In one scene where he's lying in bed with Keira (Knightley), he looks like Rudolph Valentino."

Brody grew up in the New York City borough of Queens, photographer Sylvia Plachy is his mother. "I wasn't surrounded by poverty," he says, "but I had an understanding of reality and the difficulties of life.

"Playing characters that suffer or are conflicted by something that torments them gives me the opportunity to step outside myself and appreciate my sanity and physical and emotional health."

In his next film, director Peter Jackson's remake of the 1933 classic "King Kong," Brody barely suffers.

"I spent 11 hours in a harness the other day doing stunts, and I was hurting," he says. "But my character is not emotionally tormented, which is a relief."

Brody plays Jack Driscoll. Ann Darrow's (Naomi Watts) love interest. (Bruce Cabot and Fay Wray played the parts in the original.) "He's heroic," Brody says, "but he's an unlikely hero. He's a playwright, not a ship's first mate. He's not the overtly masculine epitome of a male you usually see."

He describes the film, which opens in December, as "one part homage and one part Peter's impression of how the original could have been done."

Brody knows about being on display, like the big ape.

"I can put on a hat and sunglasses, yet ..." the 31-year-old actor sighs, "it does make observing more difficult, but I'm adjusting to it."

Another hit for EA Sports

COURTESY ELECTRONIC ARTS

Electronic Arts' latest baseball game, which was released last week, allows players to build their own stadiums and field minor league teams.

In typical Electronic Arts fashion, they have updated their popular "MVP Baseball" franchise with more details to enable an in-depth gaming experience. They have improved the graphics, the pitching, the hitting, the character like-nesses of some of the biggest names in baseball, expanding the minor leagues to Single-A games and the all new create-a-stadium.

"MVP Baseball" is quickly becoming the baseball version of EA's "Madden NFL" franchise. It has picked up in aspects that have made most other games a far cry from a decent baseball game. "MVP 2005" made updates that should keep baseball fans already eager to see what will be updated in next year's edition.

The new 2005 update is much more realistic than the 2004 version. When your batter cracks a foul ball, they react to it rather than quickly get back to their stance. The players are more realistic as they are detailed down to how they react when they crack a monster home run.

Game play has stepped up a solid notch from last years "MVP" with hitting, pitching, and fielding. In "MVP 2004," the fielders were so bad that it was easier just to put the 'assisted' fielding option on. "MVP 2005" has made the fielding a bit easier for the player to do on their own, but you will still find yourself stuck running to a pop-fly with a fielder no where near the play, while your second baseman could take two steps to make the catch. There are also a lot of times you will suddenly miss a ground ball, leading to an inside-the-park homerun.

While the fielding is nothing to brag about, EA did improve the hitting. They now have the 'hitter's eye' graphic where your batter can read the type of pitch coming at them according to a few different colors that flash on the ball as it's pitched. This way you will be able to hold back from swinging at a pitch that might drop out of the strike zone or crush a fastball over the fences.

In addition the 'hitter's eye,' you can now position your player closer or further from the plate. So if you find yourself facing a pitcher that likes to throw hard fastballs inside, take a step back from the plate and crush an inside pitch. Homing in on this skill will help you get on-base more often.

Creating a stadium is a fantastic new addition for "MVP 2005." You can build a stadium, buy a team, and manage it towards a World Series championship in owner mode. This option is similar to 'owner mode' from "Madden" games, but the stadium part has a little more detail and could create a better experience than the mode from the "Madden" games.

'MVP Baseball 2005'
X-Box, PS2, Gamecube, and PC
Agreeable EA Sports
Unanimous EA Sports
Rated E for Everyone

In 'manager mode' you can run your own stadium, but do not expect to have a George Steinbrenner bank roll dropped in your lap just because you decided to manage the Yankees. You will be quickly forced to cut your high paid athletes to make it by the season. At least you get to hire and fire coaches for all league levels. So if a few Triple-A pitchers, who you told were hot prospects, are turning into duds, then fire the pitching coach and get a new one to get the most out of your minor leaguers.

Dynasty mode is the same, but this time you will have to deal with Single-A games as well. After a few rounds you will eventually want to just simulate through anything but the major league games. Your minor league players are terrible and do not make much progress over a single season. You could cheat and boost their stats, but you will end up with a load of players demanding to be on a higher roster with a pay increase at seasons end. Stick to your Major League and Triple-A games to build up future prospects and get more funding, unless you find in really necessary to play every time-consuming game.

One thing some "MVP" gamers have complained about is the lack of players that are not in the players union. Barry "I got this big naturally" Bonds and popular Red Sox player Kevin Millar have been left out of the game; sort of. If you go to the Red Sox roster, look to see some guy named Anthony Friese playing 1B and just change his look, number, and name then you will have Kevin Millar. While it becomes tedious to go around the league and change these faux characters, EA has at least created the characters with the stats for the missing players.

The pitching follows the same format, but you can have a pitcher get worn down faster if you over work their fastballs, have them give up too many hits in an inning, and so on. The pitchers timing will also vary depending upon their approach to the plate. While someone like Roy Halladay has a long wind up, Tim Wakefield does not, which means gamers will have to get used to the timing for different pitchers.

For Boston Red Sox fans, this game is a must have. After the Red Sox won the World Series, EA named Manny Ramirez as the cover player for the game. EA also gave Boston fans a nod in the opening sequence as well as adding the Dropkick Murphy's song "Tessie" to a list of decent soundtracks. They even managed to squeeze Boston's favorite rookie, Kevin Youkilis, onto the team's roster.

If you are a baseball fanatic, then "MVP 2005" is undoubtedly the baseball game of choice. While ESPN and 989 Sports have created decent baseball games, they are not on the level of "MVP 2005" with its superior graphics, game play, and attention to detail.

"MVP Baseball 2005" is currently available for all platforms with online play and content download available on PS2 and X-Box. A subscription to "X-Box Live" is required to go online with X-Box.

Underappreciated 'Bob Dylans' — a guide to singer-songwriters

The Mix Tape

Matt O'Rourke

The singer-songwriter genre hasn't died, but it's taken a back-seat in the mainstream. For this week's tape, I gathered a collection of singer-songwriters who I felt have been brushed aside for their talents.

"Trouble" - Ray Lamontagne (4:01)

Ray Lamontagne's deep soulful voice may be the closest music has ever been to creating a male Janis Joplin. The title-track off his debut album, "Trouble," provides a very classic singer-songwriter feel, combined with a string section and a jazz rhythm in the drums. In fact, if you didn't know the album was recently released, you might find yourself questioning how old the track is. Well crafted lyrics provide the story of man who has been surrounded by troubles his entire life, but is "saved by a woman." The track is a sure way to express love, and promises to get your hopes up on that rainy day.

"Naked as We Came" – Iron and Wine (2:32)

There is something about Sam Beam's voice that tells the listener "everything will be alright"- even though most of the time he writes songs about dying. That's not to take away from his music though. With a bright progressive acoustic guitar, Beam comforts the listener with his poetic lyrics and calm tone. It may take a few listens to truly understand his message, but it will be an altogether pleasant experience.

"Lua" – Bright Eyes (4:25)

A favorite of Rolling Stone magazine to be the "next Bob Dylan," Conor Oberst may well be the voice of many twenty-somethings. Reflecting upon his recent move to New York City and other life experiences, Oberst composes a simple ballad that is "Lua." Listeners will find themselves feeling alone with Oberst as if they were sitting in on a studio session one on one. "What's so simple in the moonlight, by the morning is so complicated," he sings, leaving the listener with silence to interpret his meaning, although most will likely guess the track to be about love.
(Saddle Creek, 2005)

"Northern Sky" – Nick Drake (3:45)

Perhaps like Iron and Wine, Nick Drake largely unheard of until the release of Zack Braff's "Garden State" soundtrack. However, he is from the same musical era as James Taylor, Simon and Garfunkel, and Joni Mitchell. Although many singer-songwriters write of the same themes (love, war, peace, etc.), their approach to the theme is always key. Acoustic guitar, piano, and light blend together to create a lounge music mood. Called by NME Magazine as the "greatest English love song of modern times," "Northern Sky" is light and smooth, while also deeply contemplative.

"Stupid Memory" – Sondre Lerche (4:10)

The next track on the mix-tape picks up the rhythm and the mood. Lerche, another twenty-something songwriter from Norway, has been gaining acclaim internationally and is slowly building a strong fan following. Acoustic guitar is looped and combined with steel guitar, which is never quite overdone nor does it lead the track to sound like a country-folk song. An almost silly sort of song, "Stupid Memory" is simply about forgetting the embarrassing moments in life. However, Lerche reminds us that no matter how hard we try to cover events up, we can never hide the fact that what has happened, happened— but at least we can laugh about it.

"The Professor" – Damien Rice (5:09)

It seems that singer-songwriters have never gone out of fashion in Ireland. Damien Rice is one of the best musicians, let alone singer-songwriters to have come around in quite some time. "The Professor" is one of his many multifaceted tracks. Questioning a relationship just ended, Rice sings "What makes her come and what makes her stay? / What make the animal run, run away/ What makes him stall, what makes him stand /And what shakes the elephant now /And what makes a man?" He is able to build vocally from the lows of his questions to his sorrowful near-shouting of "I don't know." The track is deep, from the immaturity of a misunderstanding, to the verses in French, the ultimate "romance" language. Well worth a few listens, and it listeners will discover something new every time.

"Shine" – David Gray (4:31)

Perhaps best known in the U.S. for his hit single "Babylon" off his album "White Ladder," David Gray's "Shine" is one of the most motivational pieces of songwriting in his genre. Like most of the tracks on the tape, this one is also about love. Although concerning a love soon to be lost (at least for one person in a relationship), Gray sings in the most uplifting of ways. "Shine" is about becoming the person you have the potential to be. The last verse, however, is the most motivational, even the though the "road is strewn with goodbyes," Gray leaves us with a priceless piece of wisdom to, "remember your soul is the one thing you can't compromise."

Anderson done for the year as Minutemen wrap up season

make Senior Day all the more difficult and bittersweet for the Lynn native who has started four seasons at the point for UMass.

For his career, Anderson finishes 19th all-time in school history with 1,211 points, ranks third all-time in steals (150), and seventh in assists (367). Beyond the arc, he ranks second in 3-pointers made (277), second in attempts (703) and fifth in percentage made (.390).

"I feel sick for Anthony," Lappas said. "Here he is, finally on a good team, and he's not going to be able to take part in the conference tournament and postseason.

"You've got to feel bad for because as hard as he's worked to get to this point, now he's not going to be able to finish it is really a shame."

UMass suffered its first loss in six games with Anderson out of the lineup on Tuesday, but Lappas feels as if his team comes together without its unquestioned leader in the lineup, something it will have to do in post season to be successful.

"I think they band together when Anthony isn't out there," Lappas said. "They've all learned something from him at one point or another, and they know how much it hurts to not have him out there so they elevate their game knowing they need to step it up because they don't have him and what he brings."

Joining Anderson in playing one final game on the Mullins Center court is current starting point guard Chris Chadwick, who played two seasons in Amherst after transferring from Cecil Community Junior College in Maryland, and second-year walk-on Tim Collins, a former team manager and a native of Lee.

Also being honored are senior student managers Adam Glessner, Brian Kamuda and Mike Girard.

"It's going to be a good day for them, a lot of friends and families are coming up. It's going to be a nice event," Lappas said.

To send their seniors off with a win, the Minutemen must take care of the struggling Dukes; a team that beat UMass twice last season, including a 79-76 win in the first round of the A-10 tournament, but has managed just an 8-20 overall record and a 5-10 mark in conference.

The Dukes are led by guard Bryant McAllister and his 16 points per game average, along with forward Kieron Achara who averages 11.5 points and seven rebounds per contest.

The Minutemen can clinch a tie for third place in the Atlantic 10 East Division, and will earn a No. 3 seed in the A-10 Tournament if Saint Joeseph's defeats Fordham. If Fordham defeats SJU, the Rams clinch the third seed regardless of a UMass win or loss.

UMass puts stamp on season

tonight's game looking for back-to-back wins since their three-game winning streak that stretched from Dec. 11 - Dec. 30. UMass was victorious in Niagara on Saturday by a 4-3 margin.

"We're playing better as a group of people, and we're playing within ourselves," Cahoon said. "I don't know that the offensive side of things has really broken open for us, but we've certainly played soundet hockey and been more competitive on a pretty regular basis over the last two or three weeks. We felt the Northeastern game [on Feb. 3] was a good performance, it just wasn't good enough."

Northeastern has been led all year by Hobey Baker Award candidate goalie Kent Gibson, who was also just named ITECU Hockey East Goaltender of the Month for February. He was 5-2-1 last month, only allowing 1.73 goals per game and boasting a .941 save percentage.

"Gibson is their most important player, simply because of the position, and he had a great year and has probably been the best goalie in the league this year with some other good goalies in the mix, but he's been probably the most consistant and their difference-maker," Cahoon said.

Considering this is the last weekend of Hockey East play, both schools have playoff implications on the line for these next two games. The Huskies are in a battle for the lifth seed with Lowell, which is one point ahead of NU in the standings, and UMass is trying to lap Providence for seventh place in Hockey East. PC currently has a two-point lead in the standings but only has one game remaining on its schedule.

KARA WINGER/COLLEGIAN

NOTES: UMass can clinch the seventh seed in the playoffs under the following circumstances: UM sweeps NU; UM earns 3 points (win and tie) against NU, and Providence ties Lowell tomorrow night; UM earns 2 points (either a win or two ties) against NU, and PC loses to Lowell. UMass holds the head-to-head tiebreaker with Providence, as it went 2-1 against the Friars this season.

son, including two to Rhode Island, the team that overtook them for the second spot, and UMass finished as the No. 3 seed in the East.

"I don't think the players understood in the grand scheme of things what getting the bye would mean," Dacko said. "But they're a resilient group, and they seem pretty fired up to be playing Dayton. They actually told me they'd rather have it this way."

"After the Rhode Island game, it stung a little bit," Nelson said about squandering the bye. "But you can't really worry about it. Hopefully we'll go and get the win and just go from there."

All year the Minutewomen have had a tendency to get up for the big games, but against lesser opponents they have played down to the level of their competition.

That shouldn't be an issue this weekend as every game will be do-or-die for UMass. The only chance the Maroon and White has to make the NCAA tournament and extend its season will be to run the table this weekend and receive the automatic bid that is granted to each conference's tournament champion.

Such a run seems unlikely, considering the Minutewomen's recent struggles, but UMass has been up and down all year, and both Nelson and Dacko believe the team is capable of making it deep into the tournament.

"Nobody on this team has any doubts that we can go all the way and win four games in a row," Nelson said. "We just have to work hard and get things together and get prepared for four tough games."

"We're optimistic and confident going in," Dacko said. "It's one game, and our season is either over or we keep going. I told the kids I want to play until Monday."

Minutewomen looking for first victory

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Coming off a 14-4 loss to the No. 14 ranked Boston University Terriers, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is looking to bounce back against Harvard tomorrow.

"They took it as well as you can take a loss," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said. "They are relaxed and ready to move on. We are not dwelling on the past. We are doing what we can to recover. We are focused on more of the technical things that you can control."

The UMass squad is putting an inexperienced team out there this year, with 13 of 25 players being freshmen. It is the youngest team in the Atlantic 10 conference. Young teams tend to have high and lows, hot streaks and cold streaks. However, this team rolled with the loss against BU and has come out of the gate this season with a lot of intensity.

"It's fun having youth," Bolduc said of her team. "They come out with a lot of fire and energy. They bring that onto the field every day, and it brings everyone else up around them."

Of the incoming freshmen this year, one player has emerged as a standout and has impacted the team tremendously.

Freshman Kathleen Typadis has provided an unexpected lift for the Minutewomen here in the early going. In the season opener against Holy Cross at Garber Field, Typadis notched a hat trick and added an assist for a total of four points on the day. In the loss against BU, Typadis provided a positive for UMass by recording another hat trick.

"You can't ask for anything more. We're fortunate enough to have a freshman score at all," Bolduc said. "She has also got a great work ethic."

For an inexperienced team, it is absolutely necessary to have solid and reliable leadership. Junior Kerri Connerty has been around for two years and has excelled not just in scoring, but also in providing the intangible aspects of the game including leading this team.

"She is invaluable," Bolduc said. "Kerri is our leader all over the field. We are depending on her and the younger freshmen to bring the group together. She'll do whatever it takes to get the job done. We love having her on the team. I think she is going to do some good things for us this year not primarily as a point-scorer but as a leader. She is an overachiever. You have to love an overachiever."

This weekend the Minutewomen will face a Harvard women's lacrosse team that went 6-9 in 2004 but defeated UMass at Garber Field in a hotly contested overtime game to start the 2004 season. Harvard won the game 9-8 after coming back from a 7-2 deficit in the second half. Crimson freshman Liz Gamble notched a hat trick, including the game-winner in overtime.

The Minutewomen do have one advantage in their favor tomorrow, though.

"It is their first game of the season, and it is our third. We have to take advantage of that," Bolduc said. "We have to take advantage of the first 30 minutes in which they are working out the kinks, while we're working out the kinks from two full games."

The battle tested Minutewomen have already played two tough contests this year — in-state rival Holy Cross and No. 14 ranked BU. UMass has already seen the adjustments they need to make, which is why the Minutewomen feel they have an advantage going into Saturday's game.

"We just have to do the small things right against Harvard," Bolduc said. "The things we unfortunately failed to do against BU were the details, the simple things."

Dukes will cause problems

that this is the last hurrah, an indisputable do-or-die situation, the afterburner has turned on, and with it the Minutewomen's grit.

"We pretty much know that this is our last chance," guard Katie Nelson said. "We have a lot to owe Duquesne, we've got to come out ready to give them an entire 40 minutes like we did against Temple [last week]."

Senior guard Monique Govan is a bit blunter. Check that, a lot blunter.

"Duquesne is not going to get anything," she said. "Everybody knows what they've got to do, everybody knows the importance of this game. They're not getting any points. Number 5 [Aiga Bautre] isn't going to get any points, she's not going to score anything on us.

"We're going to come out and shut them down, because we owe them from this year and from last year. Everybody's ready. Everybody knows what has to be done, so everybody is going to go out and do what they need to do."

But of course, the defensive-minded Minutewomen have to be the ones to establish the tone if this reversal-of-fortune thing is going to work.

"I think it's going to be important to hold them, to defend them, because they already think they can come out and play another 41-16 at the half," Dacko said. "We'd better come out and establish ourselves defensively, take care of the ball, and really make the extra pass on offense. We've got to come out with confidence, and I think we will. It's do or die right now."

Think is an understatement in this case, however. Govan, for one, seems to already know where this storied season will lead next.

"I already told [my teammates] that we've got to beat everybody, and that's what's going to happen," Govan said.

SOFTBALL from page 8

Sortino said. "Georgia is more than a formidable team. We held a very strong offensive team to four runs.

"It was obviously heartbreaking to lose to them in the bottom of the seventh inning, but I thought we did well to score against them."

Sortino is looking for the Minutewomen to build off some of the success they have had so far and put some wins together this weekend.

"This weekend we're hoping to improve on what we've already done, and I think we will," Sortino said.

"The pitching needs to be a little bit more consistent than it was this past weekend, we need a little better timing at the plate and we need to play good, consistent defense. Hopefully we're moving toward an opportunity to play this weekend and have some decent weather and a dry field."

Minutemen finish up regular season tomorrow with Dukes

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Now, almost three days removed from its most painful and bitter loss in recent memory, the Massachusetts men's basketball team is still steaming about the foul called with 3.6 seconds on the clock in Tuesday night's game that gave Dayton two free throws and eventually a one-point win.

Numerous television replays airing over the last few days – most of which have emanated from local Ohio news stations – show little contact between UMass' Rashaun Freeman and the Flyers' Warren Williams on the play in question, which saw Williams dribble towards the baseline and into trouble amidst UMass defenders before the foul was whistled.

Even Williams himself admitted the foul "... wasn't anything big," in the Dayton Daily News, the same paper that used the words "lucky" and "shaky" to describe the call in various headlines.

Yet, regardless of the significant implications the loss may or may not have on the rest of UMass' 2004-05 season, what head coach Steve Lappas saw from his team in the locker room following the game gives him reason to believe that such adversity may bring his team together heading into Saturday's 2 p.m. season finale against Duquesne at the William Mullins Center.

"After that game, the team was as mad as I've ever seen them. They were furious," Lappas said. "They were yelling and screaming, but it wasn't about the ball call or how we got robbed. It was about getting back on the court on Saturday and wanting another crack at Dayton and the tournament.

"As a coach, it was great to hear because they weren't lamenting what happened, they were just talking about Saturday and were so mad that they just wanted to get back on the court again."

The Minutemen will return to the court without their senior captain, however, as Lappas indicated Anthony Anderson is officially out for the season – something that will

Regular season comes to close this weekend

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

It's been a long and exhausting college hockey season; all of them are.

But this season has been especially tough on the Massachusetts hockey team, which has battled through a horrific injury bug, long losing streaks and the absence of any favorable bouncing pucks.

With some of that still haunting the Minutemen (12-20-2 5-15-2 Hockey East), their regular season finally comes to a close this weekend as they play a home-and-home series with Northeastern (14-15-5 9-9-4 HEA), which begins tonight at the Mullins Center before shifting to Matthews Arena in Boston tomorrow night. The puck will drop at 7 p.m. both nights.

Tonight is also Senior Night at the Mullins Center, and UMass' seven seniors (Dusty Demianiuk, Jeff Lang, Craig MacDonald, Sean Regan, Peter Trovato, Tim Vitek and Tim Warner) will all be honored in a ceremony before the game.

Before that, though, UMass coach Don Cahoon had some praise of his own for his graduating class.

"They were the first group of kids that committed to come to this school when the program was really not doing very much, and they were willing to put their footprints in the sand and get involved in something that was really unknown," Cahoon said.

"In general terms, they became a very important complimentary piece to a couple real good teams. They've done a good job of maintaining good credibility that does some great things away from the rink... The hockey program and coaching staff is indebted to these kids and we'll be looking to these kids to be involved with our program into the future."

KAREN WINGERD/COLLEGIAN

Tim Vitek will be one of UMass' seven seniors to play their final game at the Mullins Center tonight.

In the only meeting between the Minutemen and Huskies this year, Northeastern held off UMass 2-1 in Boston on Feb. 3, the Maroon and White's last game of a seven-game winless streak (0-6-1) that began with a 4-3 loss at Lowell on Jan. 7.

UMass lax plays first home game of season tomorrow

By Bob McGovern

In collegiate athletics, streaks carry a lot of weight.

Last year, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team was on a streak of its own, winning five straight games from March 23 to April 17, when it met Yale and Ned Britt. The Bulldogs won that day, 9-8 in double overtime off a point-blank shot from Britt which sent the Minutemen reeling.

Now, almost a year later, the sting has dulled to a mere memory for UMass coach Greg Cannella, as he and the Maroon and White face Yale tomorrow at 1 p.m. for its first home game of the 2005 campaign.

Cannella remembers the game vividly as he and the Minutemen dropped the next two games, and watched as they fell from postseason contention and any chance at a winning record. Several UMass players also remember and are coming into this one with a little added incentive. Cannella is pleased to see this intensity and hopes that they can use it as a positive throughout the season.

"I think you're better off with a chip on your shoulder for anybody. In college athletics, you need a chip, you need an edge, whatever it is, you need it there," Cannella said. "I hope we have that chip for the entire year. I think playing someone that beats you helps, but I think going out there and trying to be the best team out there is the best kind of motivation."

In their first game of the season, the Minutemen did a solid job at shutting down Hofstra's offense, while out-shooting the Pride 43-31. UMass was led by an impressive effort from Sean Morris, who had four goals on 11 shots and an assist in the game. The Minutemen had four other goal scorers with; Jeff Zywicki (3), Chris Doyle (2), Brian Iacovina and Gene Tundo (1).

Part of the fuel behind last Saturday's offensive explosion derived from the aggressive play from Dane Collins on face-offs. Collins took 11 of the 22 opportunities he faced, which caused continuation in the offensive momentum. Cannella is emphasizing the importance of the face-off this season and has his face-off men working overtime to perfect the timing.

"We stress them a lot, we do them all the time during practice. Coach (Chris) Gabrielli works with those guys and does a great job, he helps us out a lot and does a pre-practice with these guys." Canella said.

Tomorrow's game will be the first time the Maroon and White have played at Garber Field since it defeated Rutgers 9-5 on May 8, 2004. Canella is sure that being home will be exciting for is team and believes just playing on Garber is a reward in its own right.

"I think they enjoy playing on Garber Field, so any chance they can get to play a college lacrosse game here on Garber Field is a great opportunity," Cannella said.

Although they are the away team, Yale has experience on the sidelines that exceeds most of the Minutemen.

Second-year Bulldog coach Andy Shay was an assistant for UMass under Canella for four years. During his tenure with the Minutemen, he went on to win two ECAC Championships and three New England crowns.

UMass will be Yale's first opponent during the 2005 season, and are the first ranked opponent that the Bulldogs have started a season against in the last eight years. Shay, who was heavily involved with the Minutemen's defense during his time in the Pioneer Valley, is concerned with the fast-paced offense that UMass has developed.

"UMass is a strong team with an ability to score goals in bunches," Shay said. "We have to control the ball, win face-offs and dictate tempo in order to be successful. This will be a great challenge for a young squad."

A-10 opens up today

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team has one last chance to salvage its season as the Minutewomen travel to Washington, D.C. to compete in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

UMass (13-14 6-10 A-10) will take on Duquesne (10-17 5-11 A-10) today at 2 p.m. at the Charles E. Smith Center in first round action. If the Minutewomen defeat Duquesne, they will play Xavier (19-8 13-3 A-10) Saturday at 2 p.m. in the quarterfinals. The semifinals will take place on Sunday, and the championship game will be aired on ESPN2 at 5 p.m. Monday night.

The Minutewomen would like another shot at Xavier, the team that started their current five-game losing streak with a 65-55 win on Feb. 13, but first they must take care of business with the Dukes.

UMass will not have to look far for motivation in today's game. Duquesne handed UMass a 63-53 loss at the Mullins Center on Jan. 21. The Dukes blew UMass out of the gym in the first half, outscoring the Minutewomen 41-16. Duquesne also ended the Minutewomen's season last year in the first round of the A-10 Tournament with a lopsided 73-44 win.

"We owe them a lot," redshirt junior Katie Nelson said. "Earlier this year we had a really bad first half, so hopefully we'll come out ready to play. They also beat us by a pretty good amount last year in the first round, so we have some motivation coming into this game."

UMass coach Marnie Dacko believes her team will perform better this time around against Duquesne.

"It's another opportunity for us," Dacko said. "Duquesne got the best of us in the first half, and we came back in the second half and played pretty good basketball. We've just to make some adjustments."

Duquesne shot 53 percent from the floor in the first half. The Dukes cooled to 25 percent in the second half but were able to hold off UMass and escape with a 10-point win.

If the Minutewomen are to advance today, they must limit the leading scorers for Duquesne, guard Aiga Bautre (15.2 ppg) and forward Loui Hall (13.4 ppg). Bautre and Hall each had big games in the matchup earlier this season, as Hall led all scorers with 18 points and Bautre contributed 15.

"Bautre is a very good shooter, and she got a hot hand," Dacko said. "Hall had a good game against us, too. They just shot phenomenally well in the first half."

Two weeks ago it seemed highly unlikely that UMass would be playing a first round game. The Minutewomen had a secure hold on the second seed in the A-10 East and would have had a bye in the first round of the tournament if they kept that seed. But UMass lost the final five games of the sea-

Duquesne a tough foe for UM

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

After settling for a No. 3 seed in the East division in the Atlantic 10 Tournament, which begins today, the Massachusetts women's basketball team has drawn a foe that quite simply has had its number in recent years.

Although they lead the all-time series on their opponent, the 10-17 Duquesne Dukes (UM holds the advantage 19-16), the Maroon and White have dropped three straight to the Dukes, including four of the last five, the last coming in coach Marnie Dacko's first season at the helm in 2002-2003. The Minutewomen had the paint dominance of current WNBA star Jen Butler on their side in that 77-68 win, but have been looking for consistency down low ever since.

At times it seems as though they've found an answer to the virtually irreplaceable, but that's besides the point. The road to the A-10 Finals goes through a certain Pittsburgh school that has given them a lot of trouble in the last two meetings.

DU ended UMass' injury-plagued 6-22 campaign in 2003-04 by serving up the Minutewomen their worst defeat of the season, a 77-45 pounding at the hands of a 50-percent effort from the field and four Dukes reaching double-figures. It was the closing chapter to a season where the shelf was empty depth-wise, but even with a more stockpiled bench in 2004-05, the Dukes once again owned UMass.

On Jan. 21, Duquesne came, saw and conquered at the Mullins Center, cruising out to a mind-boggling 41-16 halftime lead en route to a 63-53 downing of a Minutewomen squad that was just starting to gain momentum over winter break.

That's merely the tip of the iceberg, however. The Minutewomen are losers of five straight following a 52-30 defensive thrashing of Dayton three weeks ago that saw them at 13-9. UMass is now 13-14, but this week it's been as if they are 0-0, starting anew with a clean slate.

They're practicing with a level of confidence that's uncharacteristic of a team that's lost six of their last seven. Be it frustration or maybe just the realization

Sortino's crew struggles early

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

High expectations have been put on the Massachusetts softball team, and thus far it is hard to determine just how good it will be.

There have been many factors that have contributed to the relatively slow start for UMass (1-4).

First, the Minutewomen have played some of the best teams in the country, as three of their first five games have been against nationally ranked opponents.

While this has certainly led to some of the early struggles, UMass coach Elaine Sortino believes there is another reason why her team isn't quite clicking yet.

"We just have to get the opportunity to play," Sortino said, in reference to the five rainouts already this season. "Our defense has been dropping fly balls. Dropping fly balls cost us big in the Georgia game and in the South Carolina game. That's something the outfielders aren't going to do, but I can't hit fly balls in the gym.

"The field conditions have just been slop and mud. It's not good for sliding and trying to manufacture runs. That whole element of our game still has yet to be tested."

Obviously this week's storm wasn't welcomed by Sortino and her squad, as this has made practicing outside nearly impossible.

"Depending on how cold it is, we can't practice outside," Sortino said. "This game is all about throwing and receiving the ball, and if your hands are freezing, it's tough to throw."

The Minutewomen will look to improve on their record this weekend as they head to Boca Raton, Fla. to participate in the Doubletree Worth Invitational.

UMass will face Florida International and Florida Atlantic in a doubleheader on Saturday.

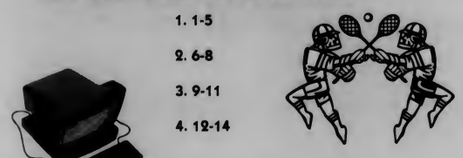
The Minutewomen will play Bethune-Cookman Sunday morning and will play in either the consolation or championship game of the tournament in the afternoon.

While these teams may not be as prominent on the national radar as some of the teams UMass has faced this year, they are teams that Sortino expects to be ranked in the South region as the year goes on. Sortino believes that they are all capable of providing tough games this weekend.

"There's nothing weak about the schedule," Sortino said. "I think all three of these teams can sneak up on anybody. They're in a better place than we are because of opportunity and weather. But I think they're in a similar stature as we are in terms of the kind of teams they are. I think they're going to be tough games."

The Minutewomen went 1-3 last weekend in the NFCA Leadoff Classic in Georgia, losing to No. 16 Georgia 4-3, No. 17 Nebraska 3-1 and South Carolina 6-1.

UMass picked up its first win of the season against Cal State Northridge, 2-1. The Minutewomen seemed on their way to another win on Sunday, as they led San Diego State 5-1 in the third inning, but rain caused the game to be cancelled in the third inning.



"I thought we did some really good things,"

SAMBA presents Brazilian Carnaval

By Juliana Leal
Collegian Staff

The Brazilian samba rhythm struck a chord with UMass students and Amherst community members who attended the Brazilian Carnaval on Saturday in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium.

The Auditorium was decked with balloons, masks, palm trees and other tropical themed decorations, most of which were created by members of the Student Association for the Multicultural Brazilian Alliance (SAMBA) and volunteers at the Craft Center.

Carnaval opened with dinner provided by UMass catering. Salpicao (mayonnaise, potatoes, and ham salad), Brazilian risotto, chicken, and fried plantains were served.

"The food was really great," said Benjamin Rose, a UMass senior. "I had never had Brazilian food before and it was definitely a welcomed change of pace."

The night proceeded with a presentation on the history of carnaval and the different ways it is celebrated in Brazil. Pictures were shown on a projector screen depicting colorful parades and people crowding the streets during the five-day festival.

SAMBA officer Barbara Rosemberg narrated the event. She explained that carnaval is a celebration that precedes the Catholic observance of Lent.

Treme Terra, a drumming group accompanied by female dancers, was the first performance of the night. The women danced to the Afro-Brazilian rhythm of the state of Bahia in white and blue costumes adorned with beads and seashells.

"The drummers delinitely kicked off the night with their hot beats, bringing everyone onto the dance floor to shake things up with the dancers," said Jennifer Kim, junior Communications major. "They were my favorite part."

SAMBA members led the crowd off their seats and onto the dance floor while the men of Treme Terra delivered heart-thumping drumming. The dancers returned to the floor, this time in carnaval costumes from Rio de Janeiro including feathered headpieces with sequined tops and skirts.

"They had so much energy and kept everyone dancing and clapping for them," said Athena Vasanos, senior Legal Studies major. "It was so wild and fun. I had never seen anything like that before."

"People were a little hesitant at first, but once the dancers came out, everyone got up. It didn't matter if you knew how to samba or not, everyone was just having a good time," said Hugo Lallo, a junior Classics major.

The night proceeded with a dance performance by Bruno Silva, a Brazilian dance instructor from Cambridge, and his group. They presented choreographed dances to the most popular carnaval music of the northeast of Brazil. At the end of their show, Bruno and his partners taught the last choreography to the crowd.

In true carnaval spirit, the night was only warming up. Styllus, a band comprised of Brazilian musicians who perform throughout New England, was the next act. They played a mix of Brazilian sounds from a Bahian beat to reggae and pop rock.

"The band was definitely a success this year," said Rosemberg. "Last year we had a lot of dance performances. Tonight we wanted to concentrate on exposing the crowd to more and different kinds of music, and allow them to take over the floor."

The night's hosts emphasized that carnaval lasts "all night long," and guests were able to get a taste of a true carnaval experience. More dancing carried on to the sound of DJ D. Martinez, who spun reggae, hip hop, Latin and techno beats. The night ended at 1 a.m.

The Office of African Latino Asian Native American Affairs (ALANA), the Arts Council, the Multicultural Student Services, Middlesex Family Practice, Student Activities Cultural Enrichment Fund, the Student Government Association, and the Vice Chancellor's Office of Student Affair all sponsored the SAMBA event.

Stabbing occurs at UMass fashion show

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A brawl inside a fashion show at the University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom may have resulted in the stabbing of a UMass football player late Saturday night, according to eyewitness reports.

Sources said the altercation took place inside a fashion show after-party sponsored by "Soul TV," a registered student organization that promotes artistic programming for UMass students. Unconfirmed reports said the light took place between a group of men from Springfield and a few UMass students.

Multiple witnesses have said a UMass football player identified as "J-Mart" was slashed in the face by a knife during the altercation. However, no one would divulge his identity.

The fight caused the party to turn to chaos, according to Monique Jemmott, director of the fashion show.

"It was very chaotic," Jemmott said. "At the time, even the police couldn't figure out who was involved in the stabbing."

Apparently the fight occurred about 15 to 20 minutes into the party. The after-party was originally scheduled to be held in the party hall at the top of the Campus Center, but due to an unexpected high number of attendees, the party was relocated to the fashion show's location at the Student Union Ballroom.

The ballroom was cleared for about 45 minutes between the end of the fashion show and the start of the party, Jemmott says she and her staff didn't anticipate the high number of people in attendence.

"Our biggest mistake we made was that we didn't search the people who were coming back in," Jemmot said.

Because Soul TV did minimal promotion of the event, organizers only expected less than 300 people to attend. However, about 500 people showed up, reaching the ballroom's capacity only 30 minutes after the event had started.

After the light broke out, police used pepper spray, rubber bullets, and K-9 units to control the crowd, according to witnesses.

"People were saying it's just like the sixties because the police treated the situation like it was riots," said Alex Demosthene, a Daily Collegian photographer who was taking pictures of the fashion show. "There was a lot of confusion."

Jemmot complained that the police used pepper spray just outside the doors of the ballroom, the same location where innocent bystandards were trying to escape the violence of the brawl.

"Anyone who went outside was hit with pepper spray," she said.

An unidentified witness outside the event says there were many people who were visibly trying to catch their breath and crying.

"I saw a guy carrying a girl over his shoulder... She was coughing and gasping. She was like choking and crying," the witness said.

Jemmott says no one from Soul TV knows why the fight took place. But she added the fashion show "went beautifully."

She also said that the show made more money than any other event this semester, according to Tickets Unlimited.

UMass Police have not released any information on the stabbing as of press time, but did say they will release information to the media today.

Curry Hicks Cage hosts shootout

By Jonathan Vega

The Atlantic 10 Shootout was in town last Thursday at the Curry Hicks gymnasium at the University of Massachusetts. The tournament began at the University of Dayton, in Dayton, Ohio on February 2nd and ended on March 3rd at UMass.

This is the 5th year that the intercollegiate tournament has been held, according to Kathleen Cloran, an event coordinator for the Atlantic 10.

"[The Atlantic 10 Shootout] has been getting bigger and bigger each year," said Cloran. Cloran and her contingent from the Atlantic 10, with local support from UMass Sports Management students Benjamin Brown, Leslie McGovern and Lindsey McCarty coordinated the Shootout competition's logistics.

"You have thirty seconds to shoot on the court. The court has a bunch of spots and each spot is worth a certain number of points. Also, you have two people on a team and they must alternate between shots, " said Brown. "You can't shoot from the same spot so you gotta keep moving."

The shooting competition lasted three hours and was the last stop for the Atlantic 10 Shootout caravan that has been crisscrossing the country for a little over a month now.

Ben Rosenfeld and Brian Kamuda won the shootout in the men's division and Rochelle Hess and Diana Shih took the women's division.

Both winning teams received all expenses paid airline tickets to any United States destination in the lower 48 states.

The flights are provided by USAirways, a sponsor of the Atlantic 10 Shootout.

"Brian and I are both managers of the [UMass] basketball team and we shoot everyday here at Curry Hicks and at the Mullins Center, so it all paid off," said Ben. "I have been trying to visit my girlfriend in Australia for a while now, and at least now I can get to Los Angeles or San Francisco and save some cash. Thanks A 10!"

GEO holds picket against University

By David Fonseca
Collegian Staff

Graduate students at the University of Massachusetts held a grade-in and picket inside the Campus Center on Friday morning to express their dissatisfaction over recent contract negotiations with the school.

The students set up tables along the Campus Center Concourse where some picketed and others graded course materials, in an effort to show the importance of their work at UMass.

Contract negotiations between the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) and the University have been ongoing since the spring of 2004. Among the issues on the table are are stipend raises and benefits for GEO eligible graduate students.

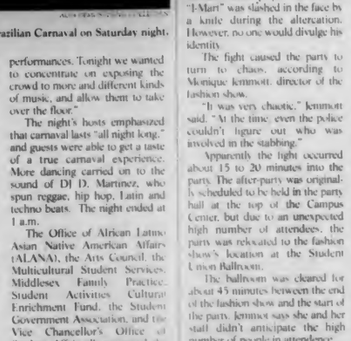
Negotiations have stalled however, with the GEO refusing to accept what it considers an unfair and regressive contract.

Under the new contracts, GEO members would face increased health and child care costs. The University is also proposing raises of one percent, two percent and two percent over the next three years, which GEO members believe won't be able to keep up with the increased fees and rising inflation.

Inflation for the past year was estimated at 3.5 percent, as measured by the consumer price index for the Northeast Urban Region.

"We need to see some sort of real wage increase, which could come in a lot of ways; it could come in the form of wages, it could come in the reduction of fees," said GEO organizer Amanda Plumb. "We need to see our health care protected. Right now it is affordable, a lot of our members are on a sliding scale where they don't have to pay anything and we need to make sure it stays affordable, they're trying to make it so no one can afford it."

Susan Chinman, a labor relations specialist from UMass spoke briefly on the concerns expressed by the members of GEO.



"Please know that the University is working very hard to achieve a contract with GEO that satisfies both parties' interests and concerns," she said, but was unwilling to comment further, stating that the University would rather do the bargaining at the bargaining table.

UMass has also declared that it would no longer provide same sex domestic partner health coverage to those who live in Massachusetts starting next year, a decision that GEO members feel has been handed down directly from the state house.

"We've been bargaining for a year and this is the first time they've introduced this idea. I think it's something that the state is putting pressure on," said Plumb. "It doesn't make any practical sense...

When grad students come here, they're adults, they have partners that they are with, they're committed to that. Maybe they move here with someone from another state and we want to ensure that their partner will be covered. We don't want anything taken away from our members."

"It doesn't even seem like an economic decision," added Amanda Dove, a graduate student in Sociology. "It's like, okay, now we're going to dis-

Journalist questions U.S. troops' actions in friendly fire attack

By Angela Doland
Associated Press

ROME — Left-wing journalist Giuliana Sgrena claimed American soldiers gave no warning before they opened fire and said Sunday she could not rule out that U.S. forces intentionally shot at the car carrying her to the Baghdad airport, wounding her and killing the Italian agent who had just won her freedom after a month in captivity.

An Italian Cabinet member urged Sgrena, who writes for a communist newspaper that routinely opposes U.S. policy in Iraq, to be cautious in her accounts and said the shooting would not affect Italy's support for the Bush administration.

The White House called the shooting a "horrific accident" and restated its promise to investigate fully.

Without backing up the claim, the 56-year-old journalist said she believed it was possible she was targeted because the United States objected to methods used to secure her release.

"The fact that the Americans don't want negotiations to free the hostages is known," she told Sky TG24 television by telephone, her voice hoarse and shaky. "The fact that they do everything to prevent the adoption of this practice to save the lives of people held hostage, everybody knows that. So I don't see why I should rule out that I could have been the target."

Sgrena, of the daily Il Manifesto, said she knew nothing about a ransom payment, and no details have emerged about how authorities won her release. An Italian Cabinet minister said money likely changed hands.

U.S. officials object to ransom payments or negotiation with kidnappers, claiming that only encourages further hostage-taking.

The shooting has fueled anti-American sentiment in a country where people have deeply opposed the war in Iraq but it did not this weekend provoke mass protests like those that have drawn tens of thousands of people into the streets.

At least 10,000 people, however, lined up in the rain to pay their respects to Nicola Calipari, the agent who died trying to shield Sgrena from the American bullets.

Draped in an Italian flag, his casket lay in state at Rome's Vittoriano national monument which houses the tomb of the unknown soldier. A state funeral was planned for Monday and Calipari has been awarded the competed this Saturday at halftime during the Minutemen's basketball game against Duquesne.

This Saturday's shootout winners, Kristine LeBlanc and Josh Donovan, will move on to the national co-ed Atlantic 10 shootout championship.

The Semifinal round of the shootout tournament is set to begin on March 11 in Cincinnati, Ohio at the U.S. Bank Arena.

The UMass campus co-ed shootout champions will compete against 12 participating campus coed winners for $10,000.

According to the Atlantic 10 Web site, UMass had 346 participating teams, making it the largest of all the Atlantic 10 campus tournaments.

The University of Rhode Island was 93 teams behind the University of Massachusetts.

A staggering 4,932 total students entered the tournament at all participating universities in three possible categories: men's division, women's division and coed division.

"Last year we had about 250 teams, and this year we are expecting close to 350 teams. That's a pretty good jump," said Brown. "We did something new this year called a Group Challenge where we had a prize of $500 for anyone who signed up the most number of teams for the Shootout."

According to Cloran, the Shootout involves 12 Atlantic 10 member universities including George Washington University, University of Dayton, Temple University and the University of Massachusetts to name a few.

Brown pointed out that without the support of local and national sponsors the event would not have been as successful as it was.

Brown thanked the Shootout's local and national sponsors for making the event happen.

Local sponsors included: the Daily Collegian, Herrell's Ice Cream, Bueno y Sano and Domino's Pizza.

National sponsors that are affiliated with the Atlantic 10 Shootout include the following: Microsoft's XBOX, USAirways, Pontiac, GMAC Financial, Firestone and Fuze tropical drinks.

criminate."

The GEO has also filed suit against UMass for failure to bargain in good faith by not providing them with information they feel is crucial to the bargaining process.

"When unions go into bargaining they are entitled to certain information so that they can bargain. We asked them for information last Spring which they have still not given to us," said Plumb. "They're just being really obstructive."

"We basically have no faith in them right now," said GEO Vice President Jed Murr.

The University has also recently set March 30th as a deadline for the GEO to either come to terms or forfeit raises retroactive to January 2nd. The average GEO member would lose $150. "They probably just want to see us accept these regressive contracts and get it done with by the 31st," Murr said of the new deadline.

Plumb said the GEO plans to continue to negotiate until they get they receive a fair contract, regardless of any deadlines.

"We're gonna keep bargaining until we get a good contract. We're not gonna be scared into accepting a bad contract for what might $150 more for our members. We want a good contract and we're not gonna take a little bribe from them," she said.

Calipari was struck in the temple by a single round and died instantly, the ANSA news agency reported, quoting doctors who did an autopsy.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Sunday the shootings were a "horrific accident," saying President Bush called Italian Premier Silvio Berlusconi to offer condolences and promise a full investigation.

"As you know, in a situation where there is a live combat zone, particularly this road to the airport, has been a notorious area for car bombs, that people are making split-second decisions, and it's critically important that we get the facts before we make judgments," Bartlett said on CNN's "Late Edition."

The U.S. military has said the car Sgrena was riding in was speeding and Americans used hand and arm signals, flashing white lights and warning shots to get it to stop at the roadblock.

But in an interview with Italian La 7 TV, Sgrena said, "There was no bright light, no signal." She also said the car was traveling at "regular speed."

The shooting was a setback for Berlusconi, who has kept 3,000 Italian troops in Iraq despite the public opposition at home, and both sides appeared to be moving swiftly to contain the damage.

Reilly decides to oppose abuse statute

BOSTON (AP) — Attorney General Tom Reilly, reversing his earlier stance, said he will support legislation to eliminate the 15-year statute of limitations for sex-abuse crimes against children.

"A predator of a child should never be out of the reach of the law," Reilly said in a telephone interview with the Boston Sunday Globe. "If a prosecutor can make a case, and there are victims who are willing and able to make that case, the law should not stand in their way."

The recent trial of former priest Paul Shanley was a factor for Reilly, who described the prosecution of Shanley as "a very important case."

Reilly met with the victim in that case, and on the day of Shanley's sentencing to 12 to 15 years in prison, the courtroom was filled with alleged Shanley victims who said they couldn't press charges because of the statute of limitations.

"When someone is brave enough to come forward and testify and confront their abuser, they should not be prevented because of any technicality in the law," Reilly said.

In Shanley's case, the then-priest left the state in 1990, stopping the clock on the statute of limitations. After his arrest in 2002, his case became a public example of the problems of prosecuting sexual abusers in cases dating back decades.

Morrison right to open dialog with Gargano

At a meeting of the Student Government Association last week, SGA speaker Mark Morrison told senators that he had opened a dialog with Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano.

At a Nov. 17 meeting, the Senate voted "no-confidence" in Gargano after he refused to release specific information requested by the SGA. Gargano was found by the Senate to be, among other things, lacking in his ability to serve the University of Massachusetts campus in the way it needed to be served.

The fact that such a "heated debate" ensued at the meeting last week shows that several members of the SGA still lack confidence in Gargano and are not eager to resume talks. Until these attitudes change, the SGA will remain a stagnate organization that is more consumed with its own pride and fondness for bickering than it is with serving the student body.

Morrison admits that the SGA needs to open dialog with Gargano if the two are to work together, since the Vice Chancellor has no reason to be the one to instigate a meeting between the two. Unfortunately, other members of the SGA have yet to accept this important conclusion.

It is up to the students to begin to repair the damaged relationship between the SGA and Gargano. Students have rights, but they must remember their roles in the university setting.

Administrators will continue to make decisions that affect the student body, but it is up to the students to take control of situations that they deem unfit or unfair. Simply cutting ties and not acknowledging the other side of things is pointless and futile.

Until students take a more proactive role in the student/administrator relationship, things will continue to develop much in the same way they have been.

Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Jeff Napolitano criticized Morrison for the initiative he showed by talking with Gargano, saying the matter is a "Senate issue." It may very well be a Senate issue, but the lack of willingness to work things out on behalf of the Senate seems to require that outside parties step up and do what they can before things get worse.

For example, Morrison feels the Senate is somewhat responsible for the recent fee hike, because the Senate was not involved with the passing of the housing budget.

"The housing budget got passed without our consent, so we are partially responsible for a fee increase," Morrison was quoted as saying in the Mar. 3 article in the Daily Collegian.

This is just one example of how the SGA is failing the student body by "looking out for their best interests." They might have "no confidence" in Gargano, but it becomes hard for the students to have confidence in the SGA if they simply cut certain ties with the administration and fail to give their input (input that should have the best interests of the students in mind) on several key issues on campus.

Morrison took an important first step last week by opening dialog with Gargano. Grudges are too commonly held in politics, locally, nationally and internationally, and the SGA cannot let past experiences get in the way of present negotiations that deter from the betterment of UMass' future.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

UMASS MUST LISTEN TO COMMISSION REPORT

As a parent of a graduate, and soon-to-be graduate of UMass Amherst, I'm deeply concerned about the findings of the Commission on Campus Diversity. It is troubling to learn that many current students of color would not recommend UMass Amherst for their siblings when the University needs to be attracting more minority students.

A public university should be inspiring its students to help society tear down the walls created by racism and other forms of prejudice that separate people in our communities, schools, social institutions and places of employment. What issue could be more important for the University to address than prejudice and small mindedness?

All who care about UMass should read the Commission report. It is a wake-up call for people to take action to address the pervasive problem of racism. According to the Southern Poverty Law Center, the numbers of hate groups and young people attracted by the proliferation of hate websites are growing at an alarming rate.

Those of us from the dominant, privileged, white race must learn about the insidious nature of racism from the victims and then become their allies by speaking out against racism wherever it occurs. As one student pointed out, "this is a problem with white students, not with students of color."

The report challenges everyone in the UMass community to recognize that one of the most important functions of education is to connect people from different countries, cultures, religions, races and socioeconomic classes. UMass needs to create ways for students and faculty to have dialogues sharing their backgrounds, experiences, ideas, opinions and beliefs in order to understand and appreciate the diversity of society and the world. People don't know each other, don't trust each other, may fear and hate each other. Thus, the conditions for violence and war may take root.

Perhaps the most important recommendation in the report is the suggestion by a student that all students, staff and faculty receive "training" that focuses on how to live and work in a multi-cultural society. At the very least and for almost no cost, UMass can create opportunities for every member of the UMass community to participate in diverse, safe and respectful Listening Circles where they will begin to empathize and understand the pain of the victims of racism and other forms of prejudice and discrimination.

When my son, who recently completed Peace Corps service in Ghana, was a freshman at UMass, his white roommate made a thoughtless remark to an African American student which caused such hostility in their dormitory that he didn't feel safe and considered dropping out.

I called the Dean of Students and suggested that the University institute a relationship skills program for all freshmen that would help to create and maintain peaceable dorm communities where all students would feel respected by others regardless of their differences. I volunteered my services as a professional youth development trainer. I never heard that progress was made in this area of need, but my offer still stands.

I sincerely hope that you and the rest of the administration will not delay in taking remedial action in response to the findings and recommendations of this commission. I especially hope that everyone will take seriously the concerns and suggestions offered by the students.

ALANA SUPPORT PROGRAMS OVERLOOKED

As an Advisory Board member to one of the ALANA support programs, and a student that has benefited from the services by those programs, I would like to address the ignorant comment made recently by Brain Long in the Daily Collegian.

As the report from the Commission on Campus Diversity notes, the ALANA support programs have evolved to provide essential services for students that have been inadequately provided by this University. However, Brian Long would not know that as in his tenure as a student at this University, he has not visited any of the support programs.

Each of the ALANA support programs addresses individual cultural needs of the population that they service; just like the Athletic Department addresses the needs of athletes and the Commonwealth College addresses the needs of honor students.

Furthermore, the composition of the student body served by the ALANA support programs is more diverse than that of many schools/colleges/departments within this University.

The lack of leadership, as the Commission clearly stated in its report, comes from the UMass Amherst administration. "... There is absence of a clear and strong message that diversity and inclusion are central priority for the Amherst campus."

I encourage the general student body to find out more about the needs of the ALANA students and be more supportive, rather than make general unsustainable comments.

Middle East transparencies

Ramzi Kanazi

Objectivity: a construction, inexistent when covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Transparency — perhaps the next best thing — also remarkably absent from the relative discourse. Let me continue this column with an attempt of the latter. I'm Palestinian. I believe that the Palestinians are unfairly and unfavorably represented in nearly all general aspects of American government and society. Furthermore, reporting of the conflict is disproportionately biased in favor of the state of Israel.

I hope that helps. I hope you appreciate it too. I'm sure I've ruined any future prospects for employment with Fox News or for membership in SAFI. I'm trying to hold my tears back...

Many groups call for objectivity when reporting on subjects relating to the Middle East, yet few call for transparency. One particular organization covering this topic is CAMERA, the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America. It is a media-watch group that claims to be "devoted to promoting accurate and balanced coverage of Israel and the Middle East." The balance on their website is not so noticeable.

One would be hard-pressed to find criticisms by CAMERA concerning bias against Palestinians in the media. I could not find a single instance while browsing their site, even while checking publications known for their slander against Arabs like the New York Sun and the Wall Street Journal. Apparently, according to CAMERA, the only problem with Middle East coverage in the media regards anti-Jewish, anti-Israeli or anti-American reporting.

One of the cofounders of CAMERA, Dr. Charles Iacobs, also happens to be president of the David Project. The website of the David Project claims to promote a "fair and honest understanding of the conflict in the Middle East," but it is a Zionist organization, one that promotes a pro-Israeli perspective on the situation. Contrary to their claims, the members of the David Project have little interest in fairness and honesty; instead, they wish to promote their agenda.

They do, however, advance token overtures to Arabs, but as a smokescreen, covering the explicit blame that they place on the Arab world for the conflict.

Another organization, Campus Watch, which frequently uses CAMERA material, is endorsing a film that the David Project produced and helped create. Daniel Pipes founded Campus Watch. He is a proponent of a bill that would cut funding to schools considered promoters of "anti-American" or "anti-Israeli" perspectives. He keeps a running tab on a number of professors whom he opposes, and he is frequently described by academics as a McCarthyite.

There are problems with bias in American institutions. They exist on both sides, but the extent to which one sees bias for the Palestinians is overwhelmingly shadowed by the bias against them and convincingly surpassed by a partiality for Israel.

The film, entitled Columbia Unbecoming, attacks Columbia professors in the Middle East and Asian Language and Cultures department for apparent biases against Israel and America. Columbia Unbecoming asserts that a number of professors in the program promote their position using methods like intimidation. It has prompted a symposium at the University.

As both sides argue against each other, one must notice the antagonizing party. They are a bunch of Zionists who are critical of the department at Columbia! Natan Sharansky, Martin Kramer and Alan Dershowitz, the three featured speakers at the symposium are all unabashed Zionists who obstinately argue that ideas like a bi-national state, promoting equal status for both Palestinians and Jews, are tacit examples of anti-Semitism. Dershowitz, a Felix Frankfurter Professor of Law, ostensibly argues that he is interested in a fair solution to the problem, though he is often regarded as anti-Arab. Ironically, the topics of the event include academic freedom, integrity and objectivity. That's like creating a committee to debate bipartisan politics made up entirely of Democrats.

To be fair, their goal is ostensibly altruistic (though inherently ethnocentric and exclusive). There are problems with bias in American institutions. They exist on both sides, but the extent to which one sees bias for the Palestinians is overwhelmingly shadowed by the bias against them and convincingly surpassed by a partiality for Israel (right, remember my claim for transparency earlier).

While it is true that scholars are less susceptible to Israeli bias, most of America is not. The rest of the country, unfortunately, is trying to penetrate the academic world to teach it about objectivity through non-academic institutions that aim to protect governments — not people. CAMERA, Campus Watch and the David Project are all non-academic entities that are working to influence the academic curricula while pandering to Israel. These organizations currently operate under the guise of objectivity, something that they clearly do not exhibit. As students, we must watch for organizations like these and demand transparency.

Common decency among men

Becky Martins

What has happened to the male species aged 18-22? Have they developed commitment phobias that disallow the chance of relationships forming in their lives? Is it an archaic practice to simply take a girl out or spend time with her and expect nothing but her company in return? When getting to know someone, has it become acceptable to have motives of only 'getting with her,' instead of caring about what she really offers as a person? Obviously, not every man on this campus, or of the college age, is guilty of these things. But in my experience, it is becoming an increasingly harder task to meet a genuine person.

During my years spent thus far at UMass Amherst, I have heard it all. There are the guys you meet who are conveniently single at the time of introductions, but of course, have girlfriends we later find out about. There are those who possess ridiculous ideas of how to be with someone, sayings things like "everybody cheats these days, right?" Some girls are even labeled "prudes" or my personal favorite, "shady," if they actually have morals and do not to sleep with everything that walks. Essentially, with each passing semester spent at UMass, I wonder "what am I doing wrong?" in regards to my love life. But maybe it isn't me and there is an explanation for my lack of luck.

We may want to get things out of our system, since in a few years, we will all be looking for our lifetime partners. But why be completely closed-minded to the idea of getting to know someone?

First of all, let me just make clear; I am not here pointing fingers. Yes, I may appear to be making generalizations, but truly, they are only observations, which for the purpose of this column, I have related to a specific gender. I know guys exist who still appreciate a woman for who she is and actually care to get to know her. When in relationships, they stay faithful. For that matter, they are even interested in dating. I have even met those who are at the other end of the spectrum, or in other words, the overly-emotional type. For some reason, these small populations of men stay in touch with their feelings and always come across head-over-heels way too soon. Yet, sadly, they always seem to be the ones we see as just friends and will never look beyond our platonic bonds.

What I am sick of hearing, is the phrase "guys suck" whenever I am around any group of girls. I'm tired of always having to think the worst of someone before I get to know them, since my trust in people has completely diminished. I hate watching movies; when girls are taken out on dates and left with just a simple goodnight kiss. Honestly, I believe dating has becomes a lost art of sorts during college. I understand these years are a time when we meet new people, try new things and do not always want to feel tied down. We may want to get things out of our system, since in a few years, we will all be looking for our lifetime partners. But why be completely closed-minded to the idea of getting to know someone?

Normally, this isn't my style of writing. Call me Carrie Bradshaw if you must, since I suddenly feel like the columnist from Sex & the City. But, in recent weeks especially, I have felt the need to vent about my frustrations, as well as many of those other things females of the college age are experiencing. I am not a die-hard feminist, but I believe something needs to change in regards to many people's behavior. I guess in this column, all I really can offer is my advice.

To fellow women who know what it feels like to be hurt, cheated on, disrespected, etc. hopefully you can relate to my thoughts. I have learned from past experiences, we must not search for something meaningful. If it is right, it will come to us. In the meantime, independence is something we must all strive for.

And to the particular guys who are the reasons behind many college girls' misery, it's time to act like men. The coincidentally common trend of playing women for your own personal and selfish amusement has gotten old. If you are looking to be original, be genuine. Granted, there are women out there who are no better and give the rest of the gender a bad rep, but like you all, not everyone is the same.

If people just took the time to consider others for more than just physicality, Valentine's Day wouldn't be such a lonely holiday, our college years could produce more meaningful bonds than just hookups and we could have more faith in what our love lives would entail in the future. But until this happens, I guess I am just another bitter girl looking for Mr. Right in all the wrong places.

ON THE ROAD WITH AMOS LEE

By Dan DeLuca
Knight Ridder Newspapers

PHILADELPHIA — Amos Lee is going places. So many places, in fact, that he has nowhere to call home.

"I've been on tour for the last year," said the soulful, 6-foot-2 singer-songwriter, back in Philadelphia for a quick breather this month before the March 1 release of his self-titled debut album on Blue Note. "I don't have a place."

Ever since Norah Jones came calling a year ago, "have guitar, will travel" has been the abiding philosophy for Lee, 27, who grew up in the Philadelphia area.

Then last March, Lee gave up his apartment in the city, quit his part-time job tending bar at the cozy Tin Angel nightclub and hit the road, opening for his Blue Note label-mate before big crowds who had no idea who he was. Since then, he's rarely been in Philadelphia for more than a few days at a time, so he crashes at a downtown hotel.

In between touring Europe and the United States with Jones last year — playing almost 100 dates in total — Lee found two weeks in July to record his 11-song debut in New York, produced by Jones' bassist (and boyfriend), Lee Alexander.

The album is a lot like Lee himself: easygoing, amiable, and hard not to like, but with a seriousness lurking beneath the surface. Its earthy, inviting soul-folk sound pulls together the influence of artists from the early 1970s, his favorite period of music, such as soul singers Donny Hathaway and Bill Withers, and songwriters John Prine and James Taylor.

The album has become a calling card that has Lee constantly on the move. He spent last month back in Europe on a promotional tour. The first week in March, he'll play three shows in New York, do "Late Night With David Letterman" (March 2), then launch into two months of shows, opening for Bob Dylan and Merle Haggard in Seattle (March 7).

Bill Eib, who manages Lee, first saw him in 2002. Demos were recorded, showcases were performed, and interest from major label behemoth Universal was generated.

"I think they wanted to turn me into some slick R&B dude," Lee said. "It was very enticing. They take you to Trump Plaza (in Atlantic City) and get you a massage. They act like you're really important, when you're not. Blue Note never did that. They said: 'We dig what you're doing, but we can't promise anything.' I liked that."

Before making a deal, Eli Wolf, head of artists and repertoire at Blue Note, whose roster has expanded beyond its jazz roots to include Van Morrison and Al Green, saw Lee perform several times. So did label chief Bruce Lundvall, who had signed Jones.

"The first time I saw him, he did a lot of covers, and he was really charmingly irreverent on stage," Wolf said. "The next time, he performed as a duo and he did all these original songs I hadn't heard before. And the next time, he had a 10-piece band that was like a funk-soul revue. Every time I saw him, I realized the more depth he had."

After Lee was signed to Blue Note, Jones heard a demo at the record company office and brought it home for Alexander to hear. "Something about his voice grabbed me," the bassist said. "It's something I get from Norah's voice. As a singer, it's the most important thing: I believed what he was saying."

When Jones needed an opening act last year, Lee seemed the perfect fit. Alexander got to see Lee on stage every night in Europe, before they came back to New York to record. "Some nights he'd be playing to not even half a house, and he wasn't fazed by it. He would take the awkwardness and make it a motivating factor. He always had a connection with the local audience."

"Amos Lee" is Alexander's debut as a producer, and the album invites the listener in with an uncluttered, spacious feel reminiscent of Jones' albums. "I didn't really know him that well," Alexander said. "But I felt like I was his best friend. And I wanted to make sure that his first record wasn't overproduced."

Lee had opened for Dylan in 2003, when Dylan's manager, Jeff Kramer, needed a warm-up act for a show in Bushkill, Pa., and called Eib, an old friend, for help. Recently, Lee's manager sent an advance CD to Kramer, and soon the call came, offering Lee the opening spot on the Dylan-Haggard tour.

The young singer admits to being flabbergasted by his good fortune— he just finished reading Dylan's "Chronicles, Vol. 1," which he called "amazing," and is an ardent fan. But he's resolved to keep his head on straight.

"I feel like the music I make has a lot of integrity," he said. "I know it does. It's an honest record, and that's all I tried to do. I just want to be a working musician and play songs for crowds of people, because I love playing more than anything. It beats sitting around. It beats anything."

Like the succinct topic sentence of a smart musical essay, the title of the first cut on singer-songwriter Amos Lee's quietly auspicious debut elegantly presages all that is to follow.

It's a gentle, soulful rumination called "Keep It Loose, Keep It Tight." And for the rest of the album, that's exactly what Lee, producer Lee Alexander, and the assembled musicians, who include Norah Jones and old-school Philly soul cellist Larry Gold, do.

"Amos Lee" (Blue Note, 3 out of 4 stars) keeps it loose _ warm and informal, with an intimate soul-folk sound that's first cousin to Jones' jazzier vibe. And it does keep it tight, with crafty, economical songs that stay in the rhythmic pocket and call attention to Lee's expressive, feathery tenor.

Lee's songs often seem slight at first, but they subtly reveal themselves with repeated listening. The raw wound of "Seen It All Before" is cushioned by Devin Greenwood's surging Hammond B-3. The sprightly twang of "Bottom of the Barrel" recalls John Prine at his most wryly optimistic. And Gold's string arrangement provides a dark undercurrent to the cautionary tale "Soul Suckers" in which Lee nonetheless displays his inherent romanticism: "Nothing is more powerful than beauty in a wicked world."

"Amos Lee" is not going to slay anyone on first hearing. But it's the kind of album that nearly everyone will like, at least a little bit. And it announces the arrival of a singer who seems built for the long haul.

Missouri man watches every movie on the AFI list of 100 greatest American films list of essential novels and started reading.

He put that project on hold when he discovered the first AFI list issued in 1998. That was the 100 Greatest American Films project with "Citizen Kane," "Casablanca," "The Godfather," "Gone With the Wind" and "Lawrence of Arabia" holding down the top spots.

"I realized I'd seen maybe 25 of these great movies," Leach recalled. "I didn't know who Grace Kelly or Humphrey Bogart were. I'd never seen a silent movie."

He devoted that summer to renting and watching old movies. With his three sisters moved out and his parents both working, he had the family home in Arnold, Mo. (just south of St. Louis), to himself.

"I saw 75 movies in six weeks. Sometimes I'd get up at 4 a.m. and watch a movie, then see two more in the afternoon."

He found most of the titles he needed at local video stores and at libraries. Once he drove 45 minutes into St. Louis to rent a copy of Al Jolson's "The Jazz Singer."

"I cocooned. Dropped out. Didn't date. Didn't go out at night.

"People would call up and say, 'Whatcha doing?'

"'I'm watching Birth of a Nation.'"

Click.

Two years went by, and Leach, his mission accomplished, enrolled at the UMKC School of Pharmacy.

One day, though, he was visiting a Blockbuster Video store and saw a sign about the latest AFI list.

"I didn't realize they were doing this every year," he said. "All of a sudden I'm like, 'Oh, no, I've got another 200 films to catch up with.'"

Now as soon as the latest AFI list is issued, Leach scans it for titles he hasn't seen and devotes the next few weeks to filling the gaps.

And when he's done, he sets new goals. He has worked his way through Entertainment Weekly's 100 Greatest Movies of All Time. He has created his own must-see lists: the films of Paul Newman or Walt Disney's animated features. And he only recently discovered Westerns.

"If Colin doesn't have a list, he goes into a funk. It's like a depression," roomie Darrin Dillingham said. "But as long as he's got a list he's go, go, go."

There are other lists in Leach's life. For several weeks he got up each morning and cooked a different type of omelet from a list of recipes he compiled. Another time he decided to buy and sample every type of fruit juice available in Kansas City groceries.

Colin Leach works out while watching a movie at his home in Waldo, Mo., as he tries to complete his goal of watching all of the movies on the American Film Institutes list of the top 100 films, of all time.

Asked where this behavior comes from, Leach said he traced it back to his last year at MU and the deaths of two close friends in separate auto accidents.

"At first I was drinking a lot, staying out all night. Then I got sort of philosophical. I decided that life's short. If you like something, drown yourself in it."

Of course, Leach hasn't liked every movie he has seen. Some older movies struck him as insufferably corny.

But he makes himself watch the whole thing. No fast forwarding.

"By your fourth film of the day, things get pretty gruesome," he said. "You have to force yourself to pay attention."

Over time, though, a curious osmosis has occurred.

"The more movies I watch, the less critical I become. Now I just sit back and soak it up. I always find something that validates the time spent.

"At first my attitude was, Well, I'm going to watch all these stupid old movies ...'

"But I found that they were more story-based than today's movies, more heavy on dialogue and with fewer special effects. More attention to the characters."

Leach says he really doesn't have favorites.

"How do you compare Braveheart to Forrest Gump'? It's like looking at two supermodels. They're both great in their own way."

But when pressed, Leach said he was especially blown away by "Casablanca," the Judy Garland version of "A Star Is Born" and anything with Grace Kelly or Audrey Hepburn, "these fantastic women I'd never seen before."

He feared silent film would be boring but was delighted by the work of Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton.

Still, he says, he enjoys the feeling of accomplishment more than the actual act of watching the movie.

"I really enjoy talking about movies. It's a great conversation topic.

"And watching old movies is a nice way of figuring out how the world came to be the way it is. If you watch an old movie, you can see what the people who made it and watched it were thinking."

Recently he has pulled Dillingham and Howitt into his marathon movie-watching binges.

"I feel bad for these guys," he said. "I've created monsters. I really should keep this madness to myself."

But he won't. He's looking forward to June, when the AFI announces its list of the 100 greatest movie quotes. There are bound to be some titles on it that he hasn't seen.

The performers of the 'Neo-future'

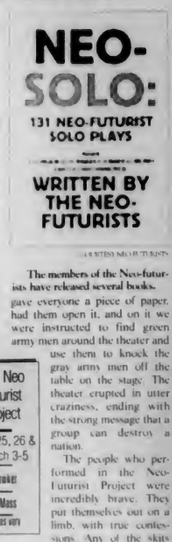
By Jennifer Hubbard
Collegian Correspondent

The Neo-Futurist Project helps to give a new meaning to the common idea of theatrical performance. It is truly a one of a kind experience.

Throughout the shows entirety, one can never tell just exactly what will happen next, not even the performers. The price of admission was cheap. What each person attending would pay was a role of the dice literally. Students rolled one die, everyone else rolled two, but either way, no one paid more than 12 dollars for this show.

The show begins informally. Students on a stage were talking and dancing to music. The performers then announced that they will now drop papers from the ceiling that have all 26 letters of the alphabet written on them. Each letter of the individual letters has the name of a skit written on it.

Audience members would run, grab a piece of paper, and bring it over to one of the cast members, who will then tack it to the wall in the order they are given.



All skits performed were written and learned by the cast members in just 11 days. The cast has absolutely no prior knowledge as to what order they will be performing them. The skits range from jokes, to confessions, to real life social commentary, to dealing with out of control emotions. When the papers were dropped, the whole theater tears out of their seats and actually become part of the show they've come to see. It is truly interactive theater.

Many of the skits included this same sort of active audience participation. In one such skit, the performers grabbed the audience members, gave them hugs and had them dance on the stage with them. The skit was titled "PDAs."

In another, the performers gave everyone a piece of paper, had them open it, and on it we were instructed to find green army men around the theater and use them to knock the gray army men off the table on the stage. The theater erupted in utter craziness, ending with the strong message that a group can destroy a nation.

The people who performed in the Neo-Futurist Project were incredibly brave. They put themselves out on a limb, with true confessions. Any of the skits had the possibility of going wrong and causing the actors to suffer some great embarrassment, but the cast performed everything anyway.

One especially striking skit was about Adam and Eve. One performer told the story, and as she was doing this, clothes were flying onto the stage. It started with shoes, then socks and progressed to pants and shirts, and then finally on the stairs we see two of the performers. They were standing there naked down to their undergarments with blindfolds on. Even with the blindfold, that took incredible bravery on their part. I highly recommend this spontaneous show. It was a great experience

Taskmaster takes on the challenge to complete AFI movie list

By Robert W. Butler
Knight Ridder

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Some men are determined to climb Everest.

Others vow to read every Shakespeare play.

Colin Leach made a pledge to himself to watch every movie listed on the American Film Institute's annual "100 Greatest" list.

So far that's around 600 films. There's some duplication among the seven AFI lists, which are built around the categories greatest American films, greatest heroes and villains, greatest comedies, love stories, heart-pounding movies and movie songs.

If the average movie has a running time of 1 hour and 45 minutes, that's about 105,000 hours Leach has devoted to absorbing old movies. But he can afford it. The 30-year-old pharmacist requires only three or four hours of sleep a night and often arises at 2 a.m. to pop an AFI-honored movie into the DVD player.

"I'll get up at 6 or 7, and Colin will have been awake for three or four hours," said Josh Howitt, one of Leach's roommates. "He's already on his second movie."

Last month Leach completed his quest, at least for now, when a 16mm print of Harold Lloyd's silent 1920s comedy "The Freshman" was screened at a meeting of the Kansas City Independent Filmmakers Coalition at the Westport Coffeehouse. The film isn't available on home video; Leach got the print from a public library in Florida. It was the one AFI-listed movie that he'd been unable to find.

The guy is a movie nut, right?

Well, that's the curious part.

"I'm not obsessed with movies," Leach said over a burger at a restaurant not far from the house he shares with two other young pharmacists. "My obsession is with completion."

In fact, before he launched his film-watching effort Leach was at best a casual moviegoer. Even today he knows almost nothing about film history or film theory. He rarely turns on the TV except to watch a film. He and his roommates don't subscribe to cable.

And he doesn't have a state-of-the-art home theater. Usually he watches movies on a 32-inch TV screen while pedaling away on the stationary bike in his living room.

What he's really into is setting goals.

"Once Colin starts something," Howitt said, "he can't sleep well until he finishes it. If it were the 100 worse movies of all time, he'd have to see them all."

After graduating from the University of Missouri-Columbia almost a decade ago, Leach realized that as a math-and-science type he knew virtually nothing about literature. So he found a

Katie Nelson, and a handful of baskets down low from Tamara Tatham.

Despite a 16-point performance from forward Aiga Bautre, the Dukes never came within a shooter's range of making it a close game, never narrowing the gap closer than 11 points before falling 67-52.

"We knew we had to come out and be strong," Nelson said. "The past couple games we haven't come out very strong and we knew we were going to have to put two halves together. I think we did a good job of putting the ball in the basket at first, and then playing good defense. They didn't shoot the ball as well as they did last game."

For the third time since Jan. 28, all five starters reached double-figures for UMass, with Nelson (17 points) leading all scorers on the day. Freshman Kate Mills racked up 14 to go with seven rebounds, while UMass's other stellar frosh, guard Pam Rosario, finished the day with 12. Forwards Brooke Campbell (7 rebounds) and Tatham threw down 10 on the afternoon.

DU's Loui Hall (six rebounds) matched Bautre's team-high 16, while Nicole Sinclair (six rebounds, five steals) chipped in with ten.

The Minutewomen closed out the 2004-2005 season with a second-round loss at the hands of a well-rested Xavier squad that turned the tables of UMass almost as quickly as the Minutewomen had done to the Dukes not 24 hours ago.

A-10 Player of the Year finalist Boothe got her double-double average (22 points, 10 rebounds), as was expected, but ultimately it turned out that Suntana Granderson (14 points, three 3-pointers) was the X-factor in Saturday's game. Coming into the game, UMass had been allowing an average of five treys per game by their opponents, but the Muskies went beyond that — they totaled five from beyond the arc in the first half alone.

Xavier went 8-for-23 from three-point land on the day.

"Granderson was unbelievable," Dacko said. "We try and play a man, and then she hits those three's and we have to adjust. We weren't able to give Katie any looks, we weren't able to give Pam any looks, and we missed a bunch."

Senior forward Brooke Campbell had 10 points and seven rebounds against Duquesne in the A-10s.

Underclassmen ready to shine

MOVING ON from page 8

In the Xavier game, the inexperience of the Minutewomen showed as they were dominated by a more seasoned team. Next season UMass won't be considered inexperienced as much of its core players return, including four of the starting five.

The only major loss for UMass is senior forward Brooke Campbell. Campbell was named a third team All-Conference selection and was also named to the All-Defensive team. Campbell was fourth in the A-10 in both rebounds (8.4 pg) and steals (1.22 pg).

Although UMass will be without Campbell, its young players will come back next season with more experience and that should lead to more wins for the Maroon and White.

The other big factor will be the recruiting job Dacko does. The team currently has a solid outside threat in Rosario, two capable post-players in Mills and sophomore Tamara Tatham and a steady point guard in junior Katie Nelson, all whom are coming back next year. What the team is sorely lacking is a player with the ability to create her own shots.

Whether Dacko is able to find such a player on the recruiting trail remains to be seen, but one thing is certain. The Minutewomen are not satisfied with merely advancing one round in the A-10 Tournament.

"We're looking forward to next year," Tatham said. "We know we're going to make a difference in the tournament."

UMass forward Tamara Tatham averaged nine points and five rebounds during the 2004-05 campaign.

game, but was replaced by Maxwell at the point.

Collins received his first start for UMass and grabbed a steal during the first possession of the game. Collins would play for three minutes and admits that there was some added excitement in getting his first Division 1 start.

"I'm not used to getting myself that ready for a game. It was a little weird and kind of went by in a blur," Collins said.

In his first full-time role as point guard since high school, Maxwell put together an impressive effort. He had 12 points and six assists in the game, including four rebounds.

Maxwell played 38 minutes in the game and may be forced to put in extra time throughout the post-season with the absence of Anderson.

"I had no choice but to be comfortable. It's a lot different than playing point in high school." Maxwell said. "I felt comfortable enough to know that I could lead us to a win."

UMass coach Steve Lappas was pleased with he way his sophomore duo, Lasme and Maxwell, played together. Lappas believes that both players should be up for Most Improved Player in the conference this year.

"He (Lasme) has to be one of the most improved players in the league. The problem is Maurice Maxwell is one of the most improved players in the league, too," Lappas said. "We take him for granted, but he has really improved. I'm worried that they're going to split the vote. One of them should be the Most Improved Player. I hope Stephane is because I think Maurice will make one of the All-League teams, and he deserves it."

coming up, and they beat us too and Albany [on March 15], so we've got a list of teams to take down. We've got a lot of revenge going around so it should be good."

The Bulldogs were able to provide a brief scare a few minutes later in the third quarter when they had a two-man advantage. David Schecter scored to make it an 8-3 game, and midfielder Dan Kallaugher picked up the ensuing face-off, marched downfield and hit Seth Goldberg, who scored just six seconds after the previous Yale goal to cut the lead to 8-4.

It was the only goal for Goldberg, who led the Bulldogs with 32 scores last year, and Cannella said that shutting him down was a primary focus.

"He's an excellent player, a guy that has had some goals against us and led the team in goals last year, so anytime you face somebody like that, you try to shut him down... Matt Garcia was guarding him throughout the game and did a really good job."

The Minutemen responded to the quick flurry of Yale goals and never allowed the Bulldogs to get closer than that four-goal margin.

Crimson down Minutewomen

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team was defeated 12-7 by Harvard Saturday at Jordan Field in Cambridge.

The Minutewomen came into the contest with a 1-1 record, looking to notch a victory against a team that was playing its first game of the season.

Harvard struck early when junior Alfie Kaveney scored unassisted just 31 seconds into the game.

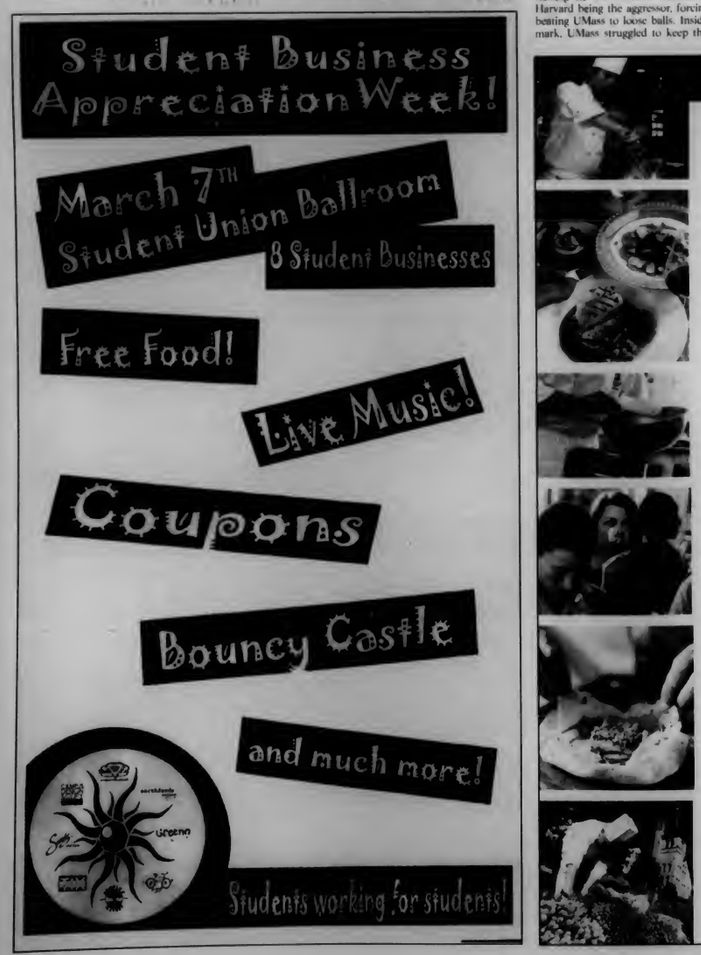
However, UMass answered with back-to-back goals by junior Lindsey Cassell (28:54 left in the first) and sophomore Shelley Boyle (21:35).

However, Harvard senior Elaine Belitsos two goals in the span of one minute to put UMass down 3-2 and send it into an inescapable downward spiral.

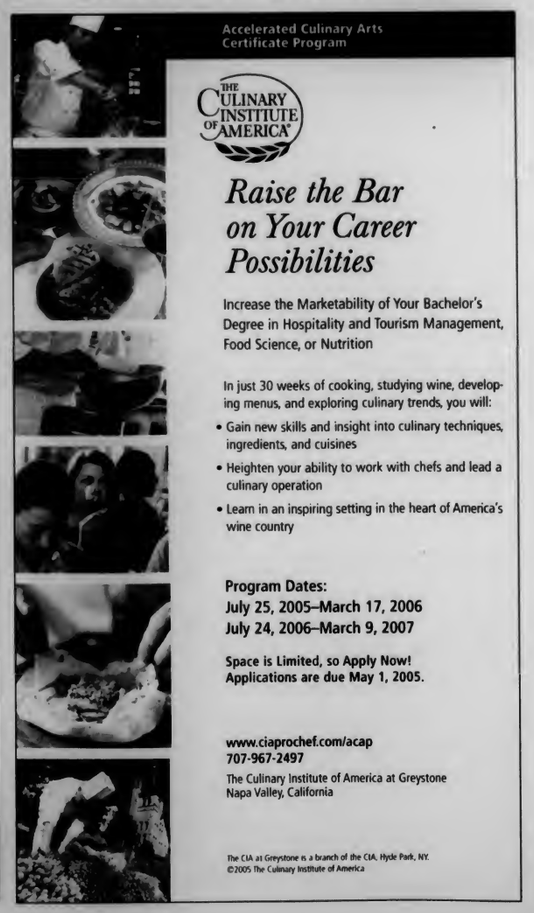
After Belitsos' two goals, Harvard scored the next four, putting the Minutewomen down 7-2 at halftime. UMass was held scoreless for the last twenty minutes of the first half, with momentum being held firmly on the Crimson's side.

While the Minutewomen came out of the gate playing well (2-1 lead after 10 minutes) and not turning the ball over, the tables turned quickly with Harvard being the aggressor, forcing turnovers and beating UMass to loose balls. Inside the 20 minute mark, UMass struggled to keep the ball out of its own zone as Harvard controlled possession for most of the half.

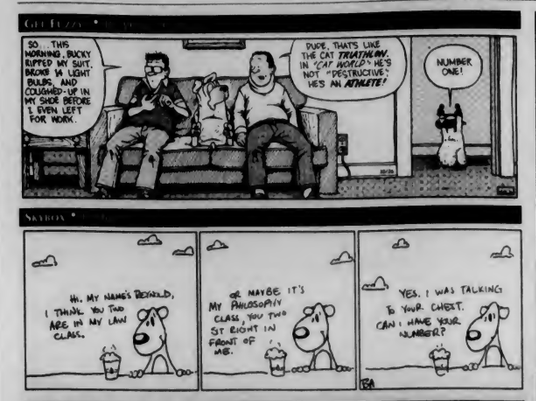
With Harvard leading 7-2 at the half and in the middle of a 6-0 run, the Minutewomen had to do something to quell the Harvard attack. Freshman Kathleen Typadis provided a hope for UMass as she knifed through the defense scoring unassisted just 13 seconds into the second half to cut the lead to four. Harvard struck back a mere 12 seconds later with a goal by Belitsos.



Typadis responded again with another unassisted goal 1:50 seconds later, bringing UMass to within four again.



Four goals was as close as it would get for the rest of the game as Harvard always seemed to have an answer. Belitsos tallied back-to-back goals for the second time in the game (coming at 24:13 and 23:47 left in the second half) to put the Minutewomen down by six.



UMass continued to try and chip away at the lead, but Harvard always had a play to end the momentum for the Minutewomen.

Harvard's Caroline Hines finished the game with a tremendous seven assists, followed by an equally impressive performance by Elaine Belitsos, who recorded six goals on the day.

UMass freshman Kathleen Typadis finished with four goals, all in the second half. In the three games this season Typadis has scored 10 goals, and has averaged four points per game this year.

UMass survives Duquesne

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

All eyes were on Stephane Lasme as he stood at the free throw line in complete and utter silence.

With 13 second left, the Massachusetts men's basketball team (16-11 9-7 A-10) was up 67-64 against Atlantic 10 rivals Duquesne in its last home game of the season. Lasme was fouled in a desperate attempt to stop time and calmly dropped both free throws en route to a 69-64 victory.

Duquesne	64

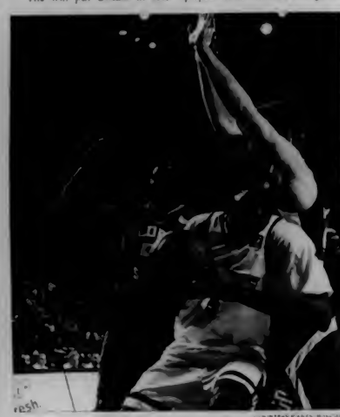
The win put UMass in sole possession of third place in the A-10 East, setting up a first round match up in the Atlantic 10 tournament against LaSalle on Wednesday in the U.S. Bank Arena in Cincinnati, Ohio at 2 p.m.

Lasme was flawless from the charity strip throughout the game, tying a school record while going 14-of-14. He finished with 16 points and 11 rebounds and was an aggressive force against an undersized Duquesne (8-21 5-11 A-10) frontcourt.

"I think he's one of the most improved players in the league. Defensive wise he got a couple bad calls against him but he still played hard," UMass swingman Maurice Maxwell said. "He can get to the line and knock down free throws now. His concentration, focus, and how hard he plays- you can't really measure that."

The Minutemen led by seven going into the half, but allowed the Dukes to come firing out of the gates, led by Bryant McAllister. McAllister hit jumpers on consecutive possessions, putting the score at 37-34, in favor of UMass.

There were two lead changes in the second half, with the Dukes taking the lead at the 15-minute mark. After a foul by Rashaun Freeman, there was a media timeout on the floor. On the ensuing play, Duquesne guard Chauncey Duke nailed a three slating the score at 41-39 in favor of the Dukes.



The lead was short-lived as Lasme went to hit four consecutive free throws over the next two possessions giving the Minutemen a 43-41 edge. UMass would not trail again and would lead by as much as 12 points in the half.

Pacing the offense for Duquesne was the outstanding play of McAllister and senior point guard Martin Osimani. McAllister had a team-high 14 points, while Osimani was the offensive organizer, dishing out seven assists.

Although it was senior day for UMass, the elder statesmen were banged up and received a combined 11 minutes of playing time. Chris Chadwick and Tim Collins both started for the Minutemen, while captain Anthony Anderson sat in street clothes as he battles an ailing back which will keep him out or the rest of the season.

Chadwick had a stomach virus coming into the game and could only put in eight minutes. He scored two points in the

Minutemen crush Bulldogs

By Jeff Howe

Through two games this season, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has operated like a finely tuned machine.

UMass (2-0) has breezed through two wins behind a suffocating defense and a very solid offense that was once again led by Sean Morris on Saturday in the team's 12-6 victory over Yale (0-1) at Garber Field.

The Minutemen used a six-goal spurt between the second and third quarters to break a 2-2 tie and seal the victory, allowing the 643 fans in attendance to go home happy after braving through a bitterly cold wind during the UMass home opener.

Yale	6

The Maroon and White will take the field again on Wednesday at Harvard at 3 p.m. and will resurface at Garber on Saturday at noon against Stony Brook.

Morris followed his four-goal performance against Hofstra with a hat trick on Saturday; Jeff Zywicki and Brett Garber each tabbed in with a pair of goals.

Garber, a sophomore who everyday walks onto the field that is named after his grandfather Richard, scored his first two goals since his three-goal outburst on May 1 of last year in a loss to Syracuse.

"We were playing well as a team, and I just came out here to do the best I can and help out the team, and I put a couple in," Garber said. "I just go out there and play everyday. It's nice to get two goals. It feels good. It gives me a lot of confidence next week and the weeks on."

UMass coach Greg Cannella, who isn't one to spotlight his players on an individual level, did find some gratification in Garber's effort.

"He's a real hard worker," Cannella said. "It's great to see guys that work that hard and care about it that much succeed."

"It's good to see some of those other guys score," Cannella said in regards to the five Minutemen who tallied their first goals of the year. "You think about Zywicki and Morris, and I know they finished with some goals, but Jamie Yaman scores, Pat Larmon scores, Brett Garber scores; that's what picked the team up, when the guys that aren't supposed to score, score; because I know Yale wasn't counting on those guys scoring."

Another first for the Minutemen on Saturday was a save. Goalie Bill Schell didn't record any saves against Hofstra in the season opener, but managed to stop 12 shots, seven of those coming in the second half.

The Bulldogs tried offsetting the UMass attack by starting the game with long, drawn-out possessions to limit the Maroon and White's offensive scoring chances, and it was an effective strategy through the first 20 minutes of the game.

But with the scored knotted at 2 in the second quarter, the Minutemen flexed their muscles and broke the game open.

Bret Caretsky, a junior transfer from Maryland, drove from behind the right side of the net and whipped a left-handed sidearm shot past freshman goalie George Caralides to give UMass a 3-2 edge with 11:23 to play in the opening half.

Two minutes later, Morris pushed the lead to a pair when he crossed behind the net, wrapped around the left side and beat Caralides for his first goal of the game.

Gene Tundo recorded his second of the year with 4:47 to play in the second quarter, and Larmon ran to the cage uncovered and fired a laser to the top-right corner of the net with 1:12 remaining to extend the UMass advantage to 6-2 heading into intermission.

Just 2:40 into the second half, Morris used a stutter-step to get around his defender and got off a quick shot to beat the Yale goaltender and give the Minutemen a five-goal lead.

The six-goal run, UMass' longest of the young season, was capped off just under two minutes later when Tundo found a cutting Andrew Recchione in front of the Yale net, and Recchione capitalized ▪ push the lead to 8-2.

"Last year they beat us, so we had a little revenge on our minds," Morris said. "We've got Harvard

BOSTON - In a span of 48 hours this weekend, the Massachusetts hockeyteam showed that it can either be a dominant, dark-horse candidate for the Hockey East Tournament, or a limping, overmatched also-ran.

The good came Friday night, when the Minutemen beat Northeastern 2-1 at the Mullins Center, but the bad and the ugly came the next night In Boston, as the Huskies walked all over UMass to the tune of an 8-3 NU victory.

Northeastern	1

The Minutemen finish their regular season schedule with a 13-21-2 overall record, and are 6-16-2 in Hockey East play. As the No. 8 seed, they drew top-dog Boston College for the quarterfinal round of the playoffs, which begins on Friday at Chestnut Hill. The best-of-three series will be played on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday if necessary, all at Boston College.

Northeastern	8
UMass	3

The Huskies (13-6-5, 10-10-4 Hockey East) finished sixth, and will play their three-game set at New Hampshire.

Friday night's game was the first UMass win over a Hockey East opponent in almost a month, dating back to the 3-1 win at Merrimack on Feb. 5.

The Huskies had two excellent chances to open the scoring in the second period, but Jason Guerriero's wrister from the blue line hit the crossbar with 9:45 to go, and he had a goal disallowed after knocking the puck in with his skate 45 seconds later. Kevin Jarman broke the deadlock 1:39 into the third period when he followed James Solon into the zone, and jumped on the rebound from Solon's shot, slipping it past NU's Adam Geragosian to make it 1-0.

Stephen Werner followed up with 7:16 to go, getting another rebound off of Zech Klann's wrister and poking it home to give the Minutemen a 2-0 advantage. Goaltender Gabe Winer held on to that advantage for almost the whole game, but his bid for a fifth career shutout was spoiled by Guerriero, who blasted a slap shot at the buzzer. The puck crossed the goal line an instant before the final tenth of a second ticked off, giving Guerriero a rare hockey buzzer-beater.

It was too little, too late for the Huskies, but they more than made up for it the next night at home. Northeastern jumped out to an early 2-0 lead on goals from Guerriero and Brian Esner, and responded to a Minuteman goal with 8:58 left in the first period by scoring two more, one from Tim Judy with a minute to go in the first, and one from Mike Morris 1:14 into the second.

The Minutemen woke up and began to rally, with goals from Werner and Marvin Degon making it 4-3 at the end of the second.

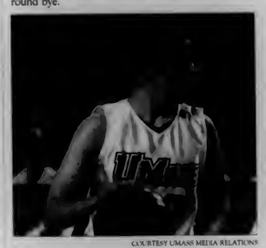
WASHINGTON — After opening up the Atlantic 10 Women's Basketball Tournament last Friday with a vengeance-driven 67-52 pounding of the Duquesne Dukes, the Massachusetts women's basketball team realized the significance of the all-important first round bye.

Having played A-10 West seed No. 2 Xavier Musketeers evenly through the first 15 minutes of the game, XU All-Conference forward Tara Boothe finally got loose on the inside and out, allowing Xavier to blaze out a 13-2 run to close out the first half. The Minutewomen never recovered, coming no closer than 14 through the remainder of the game en route to a 69-46 loss.



"Boothe got her average today [game-high 22 points] in 28 minutes," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "She's a great player, she had fresh legs, and I think our kids have to understand the value of the bye, why we play for the bye, and how critical it was to win one of those last four conference games down the stretch."

But given the fact that the Minutewomen (14-15) were losers of five straight heading into last weekend's tournament, and had seen their once-sure first round bye get overtaken by a an 8-19 URI squad (the worst team to ever achieve a first-round bye in A-10 history), Friday's game was a change from the ordinary.

Moreover, they did it against a Duquesne (10-18) team that had pummeled them by a total of 140-107 over the last two meetings. UMass controlled this game from the opening tip-off right until the final buzzer of the game, starting the game off with a 21-5 run on a pair of 3-pointers from Pam Rosanio and

As many tried to escape the frigid 30-degree weather, the Massachusetts softball team (3-6) traveled to the substantially warmer Boca Raton, Fla. to face off in the Doubletree Worth Invitational last weekend.

Throughout the two-day tournament, the Maroon and White saw two shutouts and two games decided by one run. The Minutewomen are back in action Thursday as they take part in the Speedline Invitational in Clearwater, Fla.

The team's first game of the Invitational was against favored Florida-International, which was ranked No. 22 in the nation coming into this game.

Coming off of a 14-strikeout game the previous weekend, senior Barb LaFogg picked up where she left off. Lafogg allowed three hits and struck out 12 batters in the Minutewomen's first shutout win of the season.

Offensively, it was junior playmaker KJ Kelley who recorded the first hit of the game, doubling to center field and allowing senior Hillary Puglia to score.

With veterans Kelly and Puglia taking action first, the remaining scores were brought in by two sophomores and a freshmen.

Sophomore Amanda Morin drove in freshman Lauren Proctor and sophomore Candice Molinari recorded an RBI to cap the game. The UMass offense managed three runs against FIU senior Amanda Nealer, who holds multiple records for the Golden Panthers, including the most all-time strikeouts.

After shutting out one Florida team, the Minutewomen were shutout by another later that day, losing 5-0 to Florida Atlantic.

Throughout the seven innings, a steady stream of FAU batters crossed home plate as the offense that scored three runs earlier on Saturday did not manage one. This marks the second shutout that UMass has lost this season.

The following morning against Bethune Cookman, UMass built up a sizable lead going into the seventh inning, as it was won 6-2. Kelly homered in the first inning, giving the team an early edge and LaFogg allowed five scoreless innings, despite giving up seven hits.

Senior Denise Denis tripled to drive in a run. Sophomore pinch runner Michea Holness scored and Proctor managed to get home as the team continued to accumulate runs in the fourth inning. Bethune Cookman rallied in the bottom of the seventh, however, scoring five runs against junior pitcher Jenna Busa.

The loss sent UMass into the consolation game where they once again met FIU. The Minutewomen had flashbacks of the previous day, going scoreless in the first five innings. With Busa holding FIU to one run, the Golden Panthers grasped a small lead going into the sixth inning. In the bottom of the sixth, with two outs, the lineup featured two freshman and Denis.

After freshman Stacy Cullington was hit by a pitch, Proctor hit a single to get onto base.

Dacko looking to the future

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON - When the season ended for the Massachusetts women's basketball team on Saturday, there was very little time spent dwelling on what could have been. Instead, the Minutewomen began looking towards next year.

The season ended for the Minutewomen (14-15) when they lost 69-46 to Xavier (20-8) in the quarterfinals of the Atlantic 10 Tournament in Washington, D.C. After the game, UMass coach Marnie Dacko expressed her disappointment about the season coming to an end, but she was already looking ahead to what could be in store for her young team.

"I didn't want to give up on this year yet," Dacko said. "But I have to be optimistic for next year. We've got to look to the future and building this program. These kids have to come out ready to go. It's no longer this season. It's next year now."

Such an attitude is necessary in college athletics because if a coach doesn't keep an eye on the future, the program cannot be consistently competitive. And consistency is exactly what Dacko is seeking.

In Dacko's three years at the helm, the Minutewomen have been up-and-down. In her first season, UMass finished 14-14 but fell to 6-22 last year. Dacko brought UMass back to respectability this year, but the season certainly can't be labeled as a success.

The Minutewomen squandered a first round bye in the conference tournament by losing their final five games of the season, and finished with a losing record for the second consecutive year.

Dacko attributes the Minutewomen's inability to secure the bye to their inexperience, and she feels losing out on the bye cost them because they did not have fresh legs for Xavier after playing a first-round game.

"They have to understand how critical it would have been to win one of those games down the stretch."

There were some bright spots, though, as UMass was able to rebound from its late-season skid to win the first conference tournament game of Dacko's tenure. That win came against Duquesne, 67-52, in the first round on Friday.

The team showed its potential in the win over Duquesne (10-18). Freshmen Kate Mills and Pam Rosanio, who were both named to the conference All-Rookie team, were two of the key contributors in the win, contributing 14 and 12 points, respectively.

Student-run businesses get recognized

By Matthew Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Most college students have enough trouble properly balancing their social life with their schoolwork. So it's hard for many to believe that there are college students that actually run their own businesses. But, with the help of the Center for Student Businesses, over 140 UMass students having been making believers out of those doubters for over 30 years.

All eight of the UMass student-run businesses assembled inside the Student Union Ballroom yesterday, kicking off the first annual "Student Business Appreciation Week".

Established in 1975, the CSB has provided services and support to student-run businesses while insuring their stability and long-term survival.

The CSB is set in place in order to help students develop the skills needed in order to be successful in running a business. Through their work in the cooperatives, students are given a hands-on approach to learning and understanding the skills needed in order for their business to survive.

MEGAN BENTEIRA / COLLEGIAN

Eight student-run groups gather in the Student Union Ballroom yesterday, to kick off 'Student Business Appreciation Week'.

Of the eight student-run businesses at UMass, five are located within the Student Union building: People's Market; Tickets Unlimited; Campus Design & Copy; Bike Co-op and Earthfoods. The other three, Sylvan Snack Bar, Greeno Sub Shop and Sweets and More, are located in the residential areas around campus.

Collectively, the businesses generate over $750,000 in revenues and employ over 140 students under the guidance of the CSB staff.

All of these businesses are run in the cooperative management style. This means that each employee of the business is given the title of "co-manager", allowing the student to have a real influence on the decisions made in their business. The number of co-managers employed in a certain business ranges anywhere from five to thirty students.

Oddly enough, none of the 140 students that work in these businesses are business majors. But they are not left without help, each of the eight businesses are assigned business majors to consult them in the inner-workings of the company. Nine consultants from the UMass School of Management are spread out between the 8 businesses. While the consultants do not have the final say in how the businesses run, they can advise the co-managers and help push them towards making a profit.

When Ronak Dave', consultant for Greeno's Sub Shop, was first introduced to Greeno's, they were losing nearly $4000 a month.

"I looked at their numbers and I noticed that we were purchasing our products at the wrong price, certain companies had jacked up their prices and we never adjusted to it. We were also selling our product at such a low price that it was nearly impossible for us to make any profit," said Dave. "So during our meetings with the co-managers, I would sit down and show them the numbers and advise them to change their purchasing and pricing. This way we, as consultants, can work with the people that have a direct access to chang-

UMPD searching for stabbing suspect

UMass Police are currently looking for one suspect in the stabbing of a UMass student early Sunday morning outside the Student Union Ballroom, according to UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

The stabbing took place during an after-party of a fashion show, which was hosted by Soul TV, a UMass registered student organization that promotes artistic programming.

Police say the male victim received a stab wound to the neck during the fight. Amherst Fire Department transported him to Holyoke Hospital where he was treated and released.

Eyewitnesses said the stabbing victim was a member of the UMass football team, but police would not confirm the victim's identity.

According to police, a fight erupted inside the ballroom around 12:30 a.m. before a group of people spilled outside the ballroom, where two officers stood detail. Police used pepper spray to diffuse the situation.

"There were about 30 people who were actively engaged in the fight," Archbald said. "That's when we used the pepper spray."

The group of 30 then split up into at least three smaller groups, who continued assaulting each other, said police.

Meanwhile, police claimed there was still a fight going on inside the ballroom that had not stopped. During this fight, an individual was allegedly kicked in the head.

Monique Jemmott, a UMass student who was director of the fashion show and the after-party said the chain of events happened very quickly.

"It was very chaotic," Jemmott said. "By the time I realized what happened, people were fleeing out the door."

According to witnesses, innocent bystanders attempting to flee the ballroom were subjected to inhaling pepper spray as they exited through the front doors. However, police defended their use of the spray, saying it was needed to protect the safety of the two officers.

The party took place after a successful fashion show, according to Jemmott, who said the show "went beautifully."

Bush appoints new U.S. ambassador

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — John R. Bolton, a tough-talking arms control official who rarely muffles his views in diplomatic niceties, was chosen Monday by President Bush to be U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Senate Democrats immediately assailed the nomination, arguing that it didn't make sense for the president to pick a diplomat who has sometimes been critical of the world body at a time when mending fences with the international community was imperative. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Bolton's selection sent "all the wrong signals."

Anticipating a possible fight over confirmation — in 2001, Bolton was approved for his current post over the opposition of 43 Democratic senators — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "Through our history some of our best ambassadors have been those with strong voices." She mentioned former U.N. ambassadors Jeanne Kirkpatrick and Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

In his tenure, Bolton has angered officials in North Korea and China with his hard-edged approach. In fact, the Pyongyang government, furious with his comments, refused to negotiate with him.

Bolton, whose career has included posts in the administrations of President Reagan and the first President Bush, promised to work closely with members of Congress to advance Bush's policies and said his record demonstrated "clear support for effective multilateral diplomacy."

Mindful that he, like the president, has sometimes questioned the relevance of the United Nations, Bolton said, "Working closely with others is essential to ensure a safer world."

Rice praised the international organization as she announced Bolton's selection.

"The United States is committed to the success of the United Nations, and we view the U.N. as an important component of our diplomacy," she said.

She said Bolton "knows how to get things done," citing his work in nullifying a U.N. resolution that equated Zionism, the philosophic underpinning of a Jewish state, with racism, and in organizing 60 countries to curb the spread of dangerous weapons.

U.N. Secretary-General Koli Annan, who was alerted in a telephone call from Rice in advance of the appointment, said through a spokesman he looked forward to working with Bolton.

"I don't know about what previous biases he may bring here," said spokesman Stephane Dujarric. "We have nothing against people who do hold us accountable. On the contrary, I think we do want to be held accountable."

COURTESY OF

John R. Bolton

Foreign Relations Committee roundly criticized Bolton.

John Kerry, D-Mass., said that if Bush were serious about reaching out to the world, "why would he choose someone who has expressed such disdain for working with our allies?" Kerry, the unsuccessful 2004 presidential candidate, said Bolton's nomination "carries with it baggage we cannot afford."

Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said Bolton's "antipathy to the U.N. will prevent him from effectively discharging his duties as our ambassador."

Confirmation hearings are expected to be held next month.

Last month, in a strongly worded speech in Tokyo, Bolton lashed out at China for not stopping its munitions companies from selling missile technology to Iran and other nations the United States considers rogue states.

Two years ago, Bolton denounced North Korean leader Kim Jong Il as a "tyrannical dictator" and described life under the ruler as "a hellish nightmare."

A North Korean spokesman fired back that "such human scum and bloodsucker is not entitled to take part in the talks" on North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

In his current post as undersecretary for arms control and international security, Bolton, 56, has traveled frequently in the past four years, mostly to try to halt the spread of dangerous technology.

A-10 Shootout names co-ed winners

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

The four coed team finalists of the Atlantic 10 Shootout competed for a chance to win $10,000 at the Atlantic 10 coed championship shootout that is being held the U.S. Bank Arena in Cincinnati, Ohio, this Saturday.

The University of Massachusetts shootout finals were held during halftime of the UMass Men's Basketball game against Duquesne.

Last Thursday, the four-team finalists began with 346 other male, female and coed teams which vied for a shot at the $10,000. Only coed teams are considered for the opportunity to compete in the Atlantic 10 national shootout competition for the prize money.

According to the Web site of the Atlantic 10, atlantic-10.org/shootout/, the University of Massachusetts coed champions, Josh Donovan and Christine LeBlanc, will move on to face twelve teams from competing Atlantic 10 conference universities from across the nation.

The four-team finalists who competed on Saturday are: Josh Donovan and Christine LeBlanc, Alex Lonczak and Angela Castado, Alex Rolfe and Ellen Cushing, finally Zach Cohen and Julee Goldberg. Josh Donovan and Christine LeBlanc won the shootout defeating Zach Cohen and Julee Goldberg in the final round, 14 - 9.

Men's Division shootout winners are Ben Rosenfeld and Diana Smith; women's shootout winners are Rachelle Hess and Diana Smith. All first place divisional shootout winners received free airline tickets to any USAirways destination in the lower 48 states. USAirways was generous enough to donate the 1st place Atlantic 10 Shootout prize.

Kathleen Cloran, who is an Event Coordinator and Director of the Atlantic 10 Shootout, has made the shootout at UMass a tremendous success. Cloran has been on the road since Feb., 2, 2005 making the shootouts happen at participating universities which include: Temple University, the University of Dayton, the University of Rhode Island, Fordham University, LaSalle and the University of Massachusetts, Amherst. Sports Management students Benjamin Brown, Leslie McGovern and Lindsey McCarty coordinated the shootout competition's logistics

Boeing forces out CEO because of new scandal

By Dave Carpenter
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Boeing Co. CEO Harry Stonecipher, brought back from retirement 15 months ago to boost the aerospace manufacturer's tainted image, has been forced out because of a new ethics scandal involving an affair he had this year with a female company executive.

In a stunning announcement that left the exact circumstances behind the ouster unclear, Boeing said Monday the 68-year-old president and chief executive officer had resigned at the board's request a day earlier for improper behavior while carrying out the consensual relationship.

Chairman Lew Platt said the affair by itself did not violate the code of business conduct at the company, where a string of defense scandals has raised questions about the way Boeing obtains its lucrative contracts. But an internal investigation that started because of an employee's complaint discovered "some issues of poor judgment" involving Stonecipher, who is married.

Platt refused repeated requests to be more specific and did not identify the female executive, whom he said remains with Boeing.

"The board concluded that the facts reflected poorly on Harry's judgment and would impair his ability to lead the company," he said.

Chief financial officer James Bell, 56, will serve as acting CEO until a successor is found but is not a candidate for the permanent job, the company said. Analysts named Boeing executives Alan Mulally and Jim Albaugh as possible choices, along with 3M Co. CEO James McNerney Jr., who is a Boeing board member. Mulally heads Boeing's Seattle-based commercial airplane business, and Albaugh heads its more than $30 billion-a-year defense business.

Boeing insisted the move has nothing to do with its operational performance or financial condition. Bell even praised "Harry's forceful leadership" as leaving the company in strong shape.

Wall Street took the news in stride. Boeing shares, which had been trading at 3 1/2-year highs, dropped 8 cents to close at $58.30 on the New York Stock Exchange.

"Boeing's primary customers, the airlines and the Pentagon, are still going to keep on buying Boeing's airliners and weapon systems based on performance and price, not on palace intrigues," said Robert Friedman, senior aerospace defense analyst for Standard and Poor's.

Nevertheless, the emergence of another ethical flap is an embarrassing jolt to a company that had been trying to put two years of scandal behind it.

Stonecipher's predecessor, Phil Condit, resigned Dec. 1, 2003, as a result of the defense contracting controversies that ultimately sent two Boeing executives — ex-Air Force procurement official Darleen Druyun and chief financial officer Mike Sears — to prison.

Analysts appeared split over the decision to get rid of Stonecipher.

R.I. Attorney General sues Keyspan Co.

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — Rhode Island's attorney general on Monday sued energy company Keyspan over its plan to build an expanded liquefied natural gas terminal in Providence, the latest round in a debate over who can decide where the facilities should be located.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court by Attorney General Patrick Lynch asserts that Rhode Island should have the right to decide whether Keyspan can add to its LNG facility in Providence. Keyspan filed a federal lawsuit last month asking the court to decide how the state Coastal Resources Management Council should treat its application for the Providence terminal.

Lynch's suit argues states should be allowed to reject a proposal based on underwater sovereignty issues.

"A regulation cannot and will not preempt (Rhode Islanders') ownership, their title to the seabed of Narragansett Bay," Lynch said.

Keyspan spokeswoman Carmen Fields said the company would not comment on pending litigation.

The lawsuits underscore a battle between state and local leaders and energy companies over whether the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has exclusive power to determine where LNG terminals are located.

FERC supports the plans to expand the Providence facility, and to build an LNG terminal in Fall River, Mass., and in Long Island Sound off the Connecticut coast.

New England lawmakers have said the proposals create security concerns and could impede some vessel traffic and fishing in waterways. Many municipal leaders also have objected to the plans.

"We started our tour in the middle of January and this is our 12th and final stop," says Cloran, "winners are going to have fun competing at the Atlantic 10 men's basketball conference on March 11th in Cincinnati."

"The winners of Saturday's finals will receive an all expenses paid trip to Cincinnati to shoot in the finals. They even have their food paid for," says Brown. "They should have fun!"

Runners-up in Saturday's shootout received Spaulding Atlantic 10 Conference basketballs.

Cloran points out that, "the events have run really smoothly, we've had great sports management interns here helping us with the logistics so everything has been running really well."

According to Brown, Saturday's shootout had teams shoot from designated areas in thirty-second rounds. No teammate could shoot twice in a row and each shot had to be from a different location. Shot locations around the three-point line were weighed from 5 to 8 points while successful shots from the in the free-throw zone were given 2 to 4 points, respectively. Any successful layups give the scoring team one point.

Brown added that sponsor support, "really made the event as great as it is."

According to Cloran, the tournament has been growing each year. UMass had the most competing teams out of any participating school with 346 registered teams.

Fights claim dozens of lives in Baghdad

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Guerrillas launched a series of attacks in Iraq on Monday that left 31 people dead and dozens wounded as the country took its first major step toward forming a government whose most crucial task will be dealing with the insurgency.

Bulgaria said one of its soldiers killed in Iraq on Friday was likely hit by friendly fire from coalition troops. The shooting came on the same day as U.S. troops lined on a car carrying Italian journalist Giuliana Sgrena, wounding her and killing an Italian intelligence officer who negotiated her release from insurgents.

Al-Qaida in Iraq purportedly claimed responsibility in an Internet statement for much of the bloodshed — violence in and around Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, where 15 people died. Another car bomb killed 12 people in Balad, southeast of Baqouba.

The Baqouba assaults included a car bomb, three roadside bombs and small arms attacks three checkpoints, one of them just south of Baqouba in Muradiyah, said police Col. Mudhalar al-Iubbori.

U.S. Maj. Ed House said a suicide car bombing outside a police station there killed nine people and wounded 17. The dead included the bomber, two police, three soldiers and three civilians.

In another attack near the city, a group of about 20 insurgents in five vehicles attacked an army checkpoint with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, killing five Iraqi soldiers. The troops fought back, killing one of the attackers. Nine people were wounded, House said.

Militants also fired a mortar near the blue-domed governor's office, but no one was hurt, said a spokesman for the U.S. 42nd Infantry Division, Maj. Richard Goldenberg.

Another car bomb exploded outside the home of Iraqi army Lt. Col. Mohammed Abdul Mutaled in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, killing 12 people and injuring 21 others, said the city's police chief, Ayad Ahmed. Hospital officials said most of the casualties were bystanders. Iraqi security forces are frequently targeted by insurgents.

Student Business Appreciation Week kicks off annual event

ing the way the business is run.

In order to share the workload and the responsibilities that come with running a business, the students are split up into a long list of committees. These committees deal with a wide array of issues including advertising, bulk ordering, customer service, employee diversity and more.

The common perception would be that eight businesses running in such a small area would create an enormous level of competition. But according to Rosemary Schmidt, director of the CSB, the tight quarters only bring the students closer to each other.

"The People's Market sells certain items like coffee and bagels, while Earthfoods in solidarity with People's Market, sells soups and salads, or basically anything that People's Market doesn't sell. This way they're not in competition with each other, they're actually supporting each other and working together," said Schmidt. "Learning to work with the businesses around you is nearly as important as learning how to run a business itself. By working together, the students get a lot more done than they would by just trying to make their business the best."

Alvin Gonzalez, co-manager of Campus Design & Copy, also thinks its essential for each of the eight businesses to work as one.

"We all try to keep in touch with the businesses In and outside of the Student Union, like Sylvan Snack Bar. Normally it would be difficult for me to keep in touch with a business that's all the way out in Sylvan. But because of our bond with them, I'm able to work alongside them," said Gonzalez. "Because Sylvan, like everyone of all of the other student-run businesses, needs fliers in order to advertise, they come to us. And because we also need to advertise, Sylvan lets us put up fliers in their area. We feed and live of each others success."

Although all of these students gain a enormous amount of satisfaction from working in these businesses, do have feel their share of stress in balancing school and work.

"I think all of us understand that we are students first, but there are times when it's difficult to balance: like finals," said Gonzalez. "All of these jobs are very time consuming. We have to design and produce our own advertising, work the cashiers and in some cases prepare and sell the food."

According to Jen Turner, the CSB's program coordinator, the biggest accomplishments of the student-run businesses is the transformations of students that wouldn't even consider becoming involved in a business, into employees that truly love their businesses. "I've learned so much from working in our business," said Brad Giguere, co-manager at Sylvan Snack Bar. "This was something I'd never thought I'd do. And it's turned into something that I really enjoy being involved in. I don't know what I'd be doing without it."

Syrian anger fuels Beirut demonstrations of thousands

By Hussein Dakroub
Associated Press

MDEIRIEJ, Lebanon — Syrian soldiers loaded trucks with furniture and other supplies Monday and drove east from the Lebanese mountain posts they have held for decades, the first signs of a redeployment to Lebanon's Bekaa Valley announced by the leaders of the neighboring nations.

The pullback began as more than 70,000 Lebanese shouting "Freedom! Sovereignty! Inde-pendence!" thronged Beirut in the biggest demonstration yet of anti-Syria anger that has fueled recent street protests. Washington rejected the redeployment as insufficient.

Syrian President Bashar Assad and his Lebanese counterpart, Emile Lahoud, met in Syria's capital, Damascus, to outline plans for shifting Syrian troops closer to the Syrian border by the end of March. But they were vague on the timing of a complete withdrawal from Lebanon.

Lacking a timeline, the plan was unlikely to satisfy the Lebanese opposition and the international community, which have demanded that all 14,000 Syrian soldiers leave the country.

At least 70,000 people — some estimates put the figure at 100,000 or more — demonstrated in downtown Beirut, waving Lebanon's cedar-tree flag and thundering, "Syria out!"

"Yes, for withdrawal to the Bekaa, but, yes, first to the full withdrawal behind the Lebanese-Syrian border," opposition lawmaker Walid Fido told the crowd.

The protesters marched to the site of a Feb. 14 bombing that killed former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and touched off the angry but peaceful street protests that drove Lebanon's pro-Syrian government to resign a week ago.

Many Lebanese accuse the Syrian government and their former government of responsibility for Hariri's death. Both deny any involvement.

Foes of the Syrian presence are calling for demonstrations to continue. One group raised a banner Monday reading read, "Today we have one target: To liberate our land."

But in a sign of the divisions in Lebanon, the militant Islamic group Hezbollah urged a counter-demonstration Tuesday to show loyalty to Syria and denounce international interference.

Syria has had troops here since 1976, when they were sent as peacekeepers during Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war. When the war ended, the troops remained and Syria has dominated Lebanon's politics since.

The United States, France, Russia and the U.N. Security Council have firmly demanded that Syria withdraw all the troops and stop interfering in the affairs of its smaller neighbor. Washington wants a full withdrawal of Syrian soldiers and intelligence agents before Lebanese parliamentary elections expected in April and May.

Thousands of Lebanese citizens demonstrate in the streets of Beirut, shouting and waving signs of their president. Demonstrations were fueled by anti-Syrian anger.

Settlement through 'Gazafication'

Yousef Munayyer

The Gaza Strip is the world's most densely populated spot. With a million and a half people living under occupation in the tiny 15 mile strip, Gaza is the world's largest prison. Israeli colonies have been established in Gaza and the colonists who live there total nearly 8,000.

Many commonly refer to the colonies as "settlements" and the colonists as "settlers," but that is a fundamental falsity which perpetuates myths and misconceptions about the land and its people. Gaza and the West Bank, which Israel occupied illegally in 1967, were not wild frontiers. Yet this has been the myth that Zionism created and the remnants of that policy exists today in the language of the conflict. "Settler" is a perfect example of this.

At the heart of the foundation of the Zionist movement was the need for the Jewish people to have a national home, and they considered Palestine the solution. They referred to it as "a Land without a people, for a people without a land." Of course this is also not true and on the eve of the creation of the state of Israel the Jews in Palestine were not nearly a majority. The native inhabitants however, were ignored at the beginning of the Zionist movement and we still see this today.

Palestine was not unsettled and it was not just some desert land roaming with Bedouins. Still "settler", the euphemism, is chosen by speakers in the dialogue to whitewash the colonialist reality. There are also plenty of other places to settle down outside of the occupied territories, but those are not the locations of choice for the religious zealots.

The 8,000 colonists in the Gaza Strip are a gigantic headache for the State of Israel. To look benevolent, the Israeli Prime Minister decided he would work to dismantle the colonies. At least that is what he is saying. He faced extreme resistance, much of which came from inside his own party. In my last trip to Israel I was struck when I noticed that the only political advertisements in sight read "Sharon is wrong."

From a realist's perspective it does not make sense to tie up military forces and police for the sake of protecting 8,000 religious fundamentalists among 1.5 million Palestinians. Still, this presents a bigger problem.

The colonists that are in Gaza are few in number; however the bigger issue are the hundreds of thousands of colonists in the West Bank. Is Ariel Sharon willing to tell the colonists in the West Bank that they have to leave? Will he be able to dismantle the colonies of Ma'ale Adumim and Ariel, which each have populations four times the amount of the all colonists in Gaza?

With the amount of pressure Sharon has been facing from the religious extremists in Israel it is unlikely that he could even consider such a move. While the colonies in Gaza only cause headaches and serve little if any political purpose beyond a minor bargaining chip, the colonies in the West Bank are crucial to Israel's interests.

The Jerusalem enclave, which is now grown greatly to the point where it is its own region, effectively splits the West Bank in two. The colonies in the Jordan River valley, though smaller, still allow Israel territorial control of whatever comes into the West Bank from Jordan and it is not likely to give that up. Also, the colonies in the northwest of the West Bank further divide the Palestinian population and give Israel control of a very valuable resource in the area: water.

Considering all of this, it is safe to say that Israel has no realistic reason to give up the colonies. Attempting to dismantle them would cause a tremendous rift in Israeli politics and keeping them only serves a variety of purposes which Israel can use to squeeze the life out of the Palestinians.

In the Middle East, particularly in regards to the conflict in Palestine, policy is easier to identify by actions than by words. Though disengagement is the word of the day, the policies of decades have been occupation and acquisition.

What Israel seems to be saying, or aggressively hinting at, is that a contiguous, viable, and sovereign Palestinian state is not an option. Instead the plan is "Gazafication"; that is the creation of tiny, isolated, and controlled Palestinian territories defined by realities on the ground like colonies, guns, and walls.

This process can only lead to a one-state final solution. Whether Israel, the controlling party, decides to make this one state for Jews by gradually isolating the Palestinian population or one state for everyone by respecting the rights of individuals on a human and non-religious level is yet to be seen.

Steroids in MLB are here to stay

Dan McDonnell

Steroids, Human Growth Hormone, Amphetamines, these are just a few of the performance enhancing drugs used by professional athletes, most notably baseball players.

Major League Baseball has recently started a testing policy for performance enhancing drugs. They claim that they are planning to clean up what is now considered to be somewhat of a dirty game. Big name players such as Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi, and Gary Sheffield have been linked to steroids over the last year or so (fitting that two of those names happen to be Yankees. Go Figure. Cheaters).

Major League Baseball is at an all-time high in popularity in the present. Fenway Park has already sold out nearly every game for the entire season, and Spring Training just started about a week ago. An entirely new fan base has gained interest in the sport. Baseball is once again becoming the biggest sport in the country.

The biggest reason for this new interest in the sport is the home run. After the players' strike in 1994, people lost interest in the sport. Then in 1998 the big home run chase between Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa happened. Who would catch Roger Maris' 61 home runs? Would they both surpass Maris? Who would pass him first? What will the new record be? The answers in order: both, yes, McGwire, 70 (which was eclipsed just a few years later by Bonds).

During and after the 1998 season, baseball became huge. Everyone was interested. Now today we have the steroids controversy that is starting to shed light on a problem with the national pastime. More questions have come to the forefront.

How long have steroids been a part of baseball? Who exactly is using steroids? Will the game ever really be clean again? Was it ever really clean in the first place? Is Jose Canseco right with his accusations in his new book or is he just bitter towards a sport that he could have become a god in but wasted his time relying on steroids and weightlifting instead of actually perfecting his baseball skills (or lack thereof, see: blooper reel with Canseco giving up a home run off his head)?

Here's my own personal answers to those questions: a long time (at least 20 years), almost everyone, not a chance in hell, too hard to tell, and more truth than lies.

Canseco has thrown out a lot of names in his book. He has brought the issue to a new level. Now people are concerned as to how much of his book is factual.

Steroids will stay because they cause more home runs, which cause more interest in the game, which causes higher ratings, which inevitably means more money for Major League Baseball. More money for baseball means no true banning of steroids.

Personally I haven't read the book yet so I can't tell you exactly how I feel about it. From what I have heard through friends and ESPN, I think he's come pretty close to the truth.

Steroid use is running wild through baseball. People need to learn to accept that fact, because it is a fact. It's not just guys like Bonds and Giambi. It's also the guys that you never hear about like a backup catcher for the Pirates who nobody even knows his name.

And I hate to break it to you all but steroids aren't going anywhere. The new testing policy is a sham. It's just a way for baseball to say that their athletes are clean. They'll test guys like Pokey Reese who no one would even expect to be on the juice. They'll punish a no name rookie that warms the bench for the Brewers just to say that MLB will not stand for steroid use.

Now why do I think steroids will stay in the game?

Like I already said, baseball's popularity is at an all-time high, and it's because of the home run. The home run has become one of, if not, the most exciting event in all of sports. Think of your own personal reaction when Manny Ramirez or David Ortiz strolls up to the plate. You're on the edge of your seat.

Then at every swing and foul tip you're thinking, "ooh just missed that one, he's got the next one though." Then comes that next pitch and Ramirez connects sending the ball towards the Cask 'N Flagon. You're now jumping up and down giving high fives around the room to your friends.

And it's because of a home run. How often do you get that excited about a sacrifice bunt with no outs in the 8th inning? Unless you are a diehard baseball guy like me the answer is almost never.

Steroids will stay because they cause more home runs, which cause more interest in the game, which causes higher ratings, which inevitably means more money for Major League Baseball. More money for baseball means no true banning of steroids. Bottom line.

But then again, seeing the ball clear the Green Monster isn't going to cause complaints. And again, would you rather see a home run or a sacrifice bunt? It's like that old commercial with Greg Maddux and Tom Glavine. "Chicks Dig the Long Ball."

A worthwhile investment

Stacy Kasdin

I'm writing this with a 102 degree fever, a sore throat, and a plan. We have University Health Services on campus, which is very helpful. I called them so they could tell me I was doing everything right: drinking a lot of orange juice, taking a lot of Advil, and getting a lot of rest. Those more ambitious, or in more pain then myself could even go down and get checked by a real life doctor if they'd like. UHS is definitely a great thing to have on campus when you're sick.

Another good thing to have on campus when you're sick are the C-Stores. I was lucky. I have friends with cars who went out and bought me juice, soup and a thermometer. Those who aren't so lucky can send someone down to the C-Store to pick up any provisions they might need. They're so close that if you're in dire need you could even make the trek yourself. Sometimes it's nice to get some fresh air when you're sick anyway. However, there is one thing this campus is lacking: a collection of grandmas. They could designate a dormitory just for the grandmas, with a 24 hour hotline for students who are sick, need help with their laundry, or just need a hug.

As I said, I have very nice friends who went to the supermarket and got me some Progresso chicken noodle soup, but everyone knows that nothing beats Grandma's chicken noodle soup. I remember when I had to stay out of school for a week in kindergarten with the chicken pox and Grandma's chicken noodle soup was all I would eat. She stayed with me the whole week, soup on hand, as well as coloring books, games and videos. No matter what anyone says you are never too old for a game of Parcheesi with Grandma.

In fact, it might be a good idea to station a couple of grandmas in each freshman dorm to help ease the way into living on your own. Sort of like how they put a female counselor in the little boys cabins at the camp I went to when I was younger, to take care of the boy's inevitable homesickness for Mom. There would be a lot less freshman year starvation with grandmas around, and a lot less pink clothing that was white when it went into the washing machine.

With grandmas in the dorms, we could even do away with the dining commons ... It would be like having Thanksgiving every day.

It would be beneficial to the grandmas as well, because if their grandchildren had gone away to college, grown up and moved away, or if they didn't have any grandchildren they would still feel very needed, as I'm sure living on a college campus they would be busy all the time. If we could find some who were, in their age, starting to have difficulty hearing, they wouldn't be kept awake by how noisy the dorms can be at night. However, if they are anything like my grandma was, they'll probably get plenty of sleep during the day while the students are away at class.

With grandmas in the dorms we could even do away with the dining commons. I'm sure many of them would be more than happy to cook up dinner for us kids so they could personally make sure we were eating healthy. Of course there are those of us who rarely go down to the dining commons due to a variety of reasons, but when there is Grandma-food right in your very own dorm, well who could resist that? It would be like having Thanksgiving every day.

Grandmas would definitely be a worthwhile investment for the university. The majority of them would most likely be receiving social security checks, so they wouldn't need huge paychecks, and they would certainly earn whatever they were making with all the help they would be providing.

If there were Grandmas on campus I might not be sitting here with four blankets piled on me, and two half empty bottles of pills out on the desk. I might be tucked into bed with a nice bowl of soup, "The Little Mermaid" in the VCR, and a kiss on the forehead. Demeaning? Maybe, but I'd sure be happy.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A CLOSER LOOK AT EATING DISORDERS

I want to thank the Daily Collegian for publishing the article in the March 2, 2005 edition entitled, "Recent studies show eating disorders rising in males." As the article points out, eating disorders in men are on the rise.

Another form of eating or body image disorder affecting men that was not mentioned in the article is a condition called Body Dysmorphic Disorder (BDD), sometimes referred to as "reverse anorexia."

People with BDD are abnormally preoccupied with a real or imagined defect of their physical appearance. For example, someone with BDD may think their nose is too long or their legs are too fat, which may lead to depression, obsession, and anxiety.

A more specific form of BDD is called Muscle Dysmorphia, which typically is characterized by an excessive preoccupation with body size and muscularity. Individuals (usually men) with this condition are convinced they look scrawny (even if by most objective standards they are quite large and muscular) and are driven to work harder to enhance their physique.

Some characteristic behaviors may include: giving up social opportunities that you might have otherwise enjoyed specifically because of a perceived need to work out; having your work outs interfere with your job or school; frequently eating special diets, such as very high-protein or low-fat diets; or using large amounts of protein or other food supplements to improve your muscularity; spending a lot of money on special foods or dietary supplements such as protein powders, amino acids, creatine or other substances that are advertised to boost muscularity; taking drugs (either legal drugs like androstenedione or illegal drugs like anabolic steroids) to make yourself more muscular; continuing to work out even when you have an injury because you were afraid that if you stopped you would lose muscle mass; frequently measuring your waist, chest, biceps, etc.

What's more, a great source of information on BDD and Muscle Dysmorphia is the book "The Adonis Complex: The Secret Crisis of Male Body Obsession" by Harrison Pope, Katharine Phillips, and Robert Olivardia.

In addition, there are resources on this campus, such as UHS medical staff, UHS Health Education, and Nutrition Services, the latter offering counseling and education for individuals for a variety of eating concerns including food allergies, stomach problems, eating disorders, diabetes, high cholesterol and weight control. They can be reached at 577-5314.

MAKE ATHLETES EARN THEIR KEEP

I am writing about the condition of the student recreational facilities on campus, most specifically the physical education Boyden Building (I do not go to Totman at all, because I am resident of Southwest, although I am told that it is worse than Boyden).

Boyden's fitness facility is unbelievably sub par at its best. It is a small crowded area with hand me down equipment from the very advanced athletes gym above it. Living in the northeast air conditioning is not a necessity, but Boyden has the worst air circulation system ever. It is so cramped and so hot one cannot bear to be in there for too long sweating off everything they have.

The quantity and quality of the machines is sorely lacking, while the demand is high the supply and quality is very, very low. Something needs to be done about it, and fast. You cannot find dumbbells anymore because there is only one rack of them for everyone to use.

I understand that this school is suffering from budget cuts and we cannot even afford real professors, rather we just beat graduate students into submission and force them to teach and give them credits for doing so.

However, we are part of a Division 1 athletic program that has no major national sports teams. We get no revenue from any team at this school what so ever. The most exciting game for football was when people went to see fireworks against Colgate. The most exciting game for basketball was when an on the way down UConn team was upset by an inconsistent marginal UMass team playing in a conference as weak as the America East. Our hockey team is the biggest disappointment I have seen and does not deserve the money and attention the school pays it.

The long and short of this story is this: stop giving all the money to the athletic programs so they can wear Nike and Under Armour and workout in the nicest facilities. I, like many other non-athletes, pay tuition and a hell of a lot of it for a public state school while some of these athletes pay nothing to go here. The athletes get the best facilities and equipment and do not produce any money or national attention for the university. Many students pay a lot of money to go here and are given the short end because they go to a school trying to become a major athletic power. Football is weak here and does not need to move up to.

Start using my money for more teachers and better facilities for me to use, not so you can improve marginal athletic programs. I have to pay for college, like most students here, so start making scholarship athletes earn their keep by making money for the school rather than just having it dumped on them by a mismanaged university.

Smith Presents 'After Mrs. Rochester'

Jean Rhys is remembered for both talent and condition

By Jared Demick
Collegian Correspondent

Last weekend, Smith College's Theater Department finished performing the unique and densely layered "After Mrs. Rochester", a play that explores the relationship between life and art. Written by playwright Polly Teale, it centers on the troubled life of Jean Rhys, the famous Creole author. Rhys wrote "Wide Sargasso Sea", a prequel to Charlotte Bronte's masterpiece, Jane Eyre, where she tells the life story of Mrs. Rochester, the infamous and mysterious madwoman in the attic.

Armed with dizzying shifts in narration, the play interweaves parts of Rhys's own life with sections of Jane Eyre. By doing this, the play explores the astonishing parallels between Rhys and Mrs. Rochester, revealing why Rhys found this character so compelling.

A middle aged Rhys initially acts as a guide as both she and the audience watch a younger version of herself grow up. The parts from Jane Eyre appear whenever the young Rhys opens the novel. Also, throughout the whole play, Bertha Rochester lurks on stage, representing Rhys's mental illness, repressed desires, and inspiration.

In Jane Eyre, Mrs. Rochester grew up as Bertha Mason in the West Indies. She was married off to her brother's business associate, Edward Rochester. Rochester took her to his estate in England where her mental illness got progressively worse. She eventually became so unmanageable that she was locked in the top floor of the estate with a nurse to watch her. Towards the end of the novel, she burns down the house and commits suicide.

Rhys herself grows up in the West Indies, part of a disintegrating aristocratic family. Under the watch of a severe mother who is tortured by her family's loss of social position, she is sent to a convent. While at the convent, Rhys is sexually abused by a visiting uncle which initiates a life of botched relationships with men. Her parents eventually send her to a boarding school in England where she is ostracized as a crude colonial. In her despair, she quits school and becomes a chorus girl. It is during this lonely time that she begins to depend on men for money and emotional stability. After a series of rocky relationships, she has a child that she doesn't want.

All of her pain and disillusionment inspire Rhys to begin writing. When one of her husbands is put into jail for fraud, Rhys encounters the famous British author Ford Madox Ford who takes an interest in her writing. Ford and Rhys eventually have a troubled affair which ends bitterly. Amidst this turmoil, Rhys becomes an alcoholic and her mental illness begins to worsen. At this point in the play, Bertha becomes fused with Rhys as the two say the same lines and Bertha gives voice to Rhys's repressed thoughts.

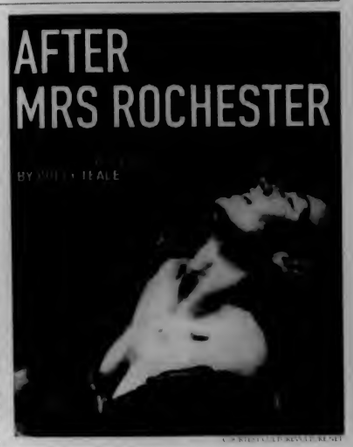
After a while, Rhys marries a literary agent who manages to get her work published. While this is a positive event in her life, reviews of her work are bad and Rhys becomes violent and delusional. After a prison sentence, she attempts to finally come to terms with her phantom and begins to talk to her.

However, only after she reaches middle age does she begin to write down the story of Bertha Rochester. In one of the final scenes, the middle aged Rhys writes while Bertha begins to reenact the scenes of Rhys's earlier life. Thus, the connection between her life and her art is complete as Bertha's story becomes her own.

Overall, the performance itself was a mixture of both good and bad.

Most impressive was the commanding stage presence of Erica Anderson who played Bertha. Anderson managed the capture the tortured emotions that were tearing both Bertha and Rhys apart. The wild and sensual unpredictably of her performance lended force to the notion that the structure of Western society was driving both women out of their minds. While the rest of the cast wasn't as strong, no complaints can be made as they faced some difficulties.

First of all, there were two understudies in the performance attended. While this gave the play an unsure feel, the cast managed to compensate well in what can be a devastating blow to a show.



Second, there was only one male cast member, Brooks Reeves. Reeves had the responsibility of playing no less than ten roles. This was both a clever and awkward directorial decision.

While it was a tangible way of showing how Rhys tended to view all men as the same, it also tested the audience's patience since it was hard to visualize one man playing all these roles.

However, Reeves does deserve credit for managing to juggle the number of roles he had. The performance as a whole nicely caught on to the almost slapstick humor in the play which was a welcome relief from the bleak subject matter. However, the cast had a hard time fully engaging the audience with the depth of pain present in the play.

While the casting was a little rocky, the set design was impeccable. The stage was a colorful room with vines hanging over the walls. This room was surrounded by a pool of water which acted as a river at times. The lighting was enticing and the music, written by a Smith music professor, Raphael Atlas, really enhanced the mood of the show.

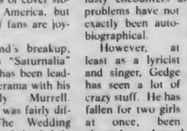
In the end, the cast and crew deserve recognition for choosing to do such a difficult, unconventional play. It took real determination and creativity to put on a show like this and if they didn't always manage to hit their mark, the performance we witnessed proved that they were a promising group pregnant with potential for making some wonderful theater.

Amherst gives tribute to the talented, yet troubled Jean Rhys in a play based on her tumultuous life.

The Wedding Present finally returns after eight years

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Correspondent

When music writers look back at this decade 2004 will probably be remembered as the year of reunions and comebacks, a time when everyone from The Pixies to Prince came out of the shadows, or bitter breakups, to sell out stadiums.



Reunions used to be looked upon as cheap cash-ins but, now fans of long broken-up and estranged bands look forward to possible reunions as a real, and celebratory hope (one need look no further then the recent announcement that Dinosaur Jr. will be getting back together for more proof). So far 2005 has been looking just as good as the past year, from the aforementioned mentioned Dinosaur Jr. reunion to "Take Fountain", the first album in eight years from David Gedge's influential indie-pop outfit The Wedding Present. By any count, The Wedding Present, probably won't be playing huge stadiums or getting millions of cover stories, at least in America, but their loyal cult of fans are joyous, regardless.

Since the band's breakup, following 1996's "Saturnalia" frontman Gedge has been leading the band Cinerama with his girlfriend Sally Murrell. Cinerama at first was fairly different from The Wedding Present, grand and loaded in orchestra and horns, rather then distorted guitars but by 2002's "Torino" Gedge was combining his love of classical music and film scores with his desire to thrash and rock. "Take Fountain" may be under the Wedding Present name but it is very much the next logical step from "Torino"

Those familiar with Gedge's work know that he seems to have been with more women than Wilt Chamberlain, but they also know that most of Gedge's lusty encounters and ensuing problems have not exactly been autobiographical.

The Wedding Present makes a triumphant return after eight years of silence. Gedge fuses familiar genres into a fan favorite.

However, at least as a lyricist and singer, Gedge has seen a lot of crazy stuff. He has fallen for two girls at once, been cheated on, cheated on his girlfriend, been the bad guy that sleeps with a taken girl, had a boozy night with a girl that he knows he won't care for in the morning, done everything within his power to make a girl leave him, and taken part in bondage.

And those are just some of the songs on "Torino". What Gedge's fans love about him is that lyrically he can be blunt and frank, all the while sounding intelligent and classy. This is a man who sings about girls who don't wear underwear, other guys staring at his girlfriend's breasts, and asks his girlfriend what was more thrilling: cheating, or the song Gedge wrote about it. Once again, that only covers a few songs from one album. Gedge's lyrics are also known for being full of realism, detail, and emotion. While his character can be sleazy in some songs he easily maintains the image of a nice, smart, sensitive, and classy British guy (though perhaps a lot of that has to do with his full, elegant voice).

While a lot of the above section rings completely true for the songs on "Take Fountain" there is one major difference; Gedge is telling less tales of his exploits with women and spends a lot more time on the hard stuff, namely his breakup with Murrell that caused him to disband Cinerama and reform The Wedding Present. "Take Fountain" opens with the eight-minute epic "Interstate 5", one of Gedge's best songs to date, which finds him debating whether to drive away from his problems or stay close "in case you suddenly remember I'm alive".

About half-way through the guitar-heavy song, he launches into a soaring bridge and then relaxes into a string-and-horn-drenched spaghetti-western outro, perhaps the perfect combination of everything great about The Wedding Present and Cinerama.

"Interstate 5" serves as the perfect track to show fans of both bands that Gedge is still in top form, and that the future looks bright. The next few tracks are a bit lighter. "Always The Quiet One" is a snappy pop jingle about a quiet girl that Gedge can't quite manage to really talk to. "I'm From Further North Then You" has a few lyrics that are downright funny. In it Gedge discusses a good one night stand that somehow became a terrible relationship. "I admit we had some memorable days," Gedge declares, then clarifies, "but just not very many." He remembers looking up at the sky with the girl, and how he "couldn't help but stare" at her red bikini but in the end he acknowledges that "we both need more, we can't ignore how unhappy we were."

Songs like "Mars Sparkles Down On Me" and "Don't Touch That Dial" (released originally as a Cinerama single) find Gedge getting more romantic, melancholy, and mopey. It's not for everyone but it is earnest in the best of ways and it's very clear that Gedge is neither in a songwriting funk nor on auto-pilot.

Every song on "Take Fountain" is a winner and Gedge fans, especially those that loved "Torino" will be very happy with the result. Additionally there is more than enough here to win over new fans. Those looking for something Morrissey-esque but not nearly as drippy, and more rocking, are bound to love The Wedding Present as is anyone who wants Britpop with a touch of elder statesman class. Based on musical prowess, songwriting, and influence The Wedding Present reunion should be making as many headlines as The Pixies. Regardless of the lack of press attention and reunion hubbub "Take Fountain" is a present in-and-of-itself.

success this year, as Spiess and Pozar are lead the Minutewomen in the number one and two spots in the singles order.

After the long break during the winter months the Minutewomen hit their stride on Feb. 5 in Ithaca, N.Y., when they narrowly defeated St.John's 4-3. It was their fourth win in a row to start the season.

The next day, however, Syracuse ended UMass' run by handing the Minutewomen a 5-2 loss. On Feb.18 and 20, the Minutewomen dropped two more matches to Columbia (5-2) and Seton Hall (5-2) at home.

After the last match on Feb. 20 the Minutewomen had some time to recover from their mini-slump, as their next match was not until March 5. The Minutewomen did take advantage of the time off. In their first match after the break they defeated the University of Maryland at Baltimore County 5-2, and then beat Binghamton that same night, 4-3 in Ithaca, N.Y.

In the UMBC match Spiess, Pozar, junior Dorothy Iwanowicz, senior Sasha Edelstein and junior Iana Bartolotti all won their singles matches in convincing fashion — a successful rebound from their three game skid.

The two victories on March 5 brought the UMass record to 6-3 before they were defeated by Cornell the next day 6-1.

Louisville transfer Michele Spiess has had an impressive first year thus far, posting a singles record of 14-3. Spiess was named Atlantic 10 Performer of the Week in the fall, after losing only 13 games in 16 sets on her way to the Eastern Collegiate Invitational singles title. Spiess is currently ranked 29th in the northeast region. She was 19-10 in singles play her freshman year at Louisville.

The trip to Ithaca on March 5 was the start of a nine game road trip for the Minutewomen. This Sunday the team will travel to Boca Raton, Fla. for the start of a four matches in four days stretch. The Minutewomen will be playing Lynn, Tennessee-Chattanooga, Army and Rutgers during this stretch. They will return home on Mar. 30 against Rhode Island after two matches in Pennsylvania against Temple and Richmond on Mar. 24 and 25.

been an apt defensive compliment to the offensive production of Rashaun Freeman. Freeman has averaged 15.3 ppg this year, good for sixth in the A-10.

Lappas is pleased with the was Freeman and Lasme have played together thus far this season and feels that the two have fed off each other throughout the year.

"They have both improved over the year and play well together," Lappas said. "I think they both understand what we need to do out there and they do their best to get there."

UMass didn't exactly end the season on the best note, dropping two of its last three games. The Minutemen lost to Temple (Feb. 26) and Dayton (March 1) on the road before defeating Duquesne in their final home game of the season.

However, after suffering a 53-52 last second loss to Dayton, the Minutemen came off the court in a fit. Lappas believes that the frustration of the loss has and is serving as fuel for UMass as it tries to make a run at the conference tournament.

"I think the emotion from Dayton is going to carry us for awhile. I think they are fired up for the tournament and they are going to give a great effort. " Lappas said. "All tournaments are stressful, we just have to be ready and do what we have to do."

Over the course of the season, swing men Maurice Maxwell and Artie Bowers have developed a relationship that has helped the Minutemen. Everyday in practice the two workout together and pair up for drills.

The two have averaged a combined 20 ppg. between them and are first and second in total assists.

"The two of them have a great relationship, they are both sophomores and they have a good chemistry and enjoy playing together." Lappas said. "In the last couple of weeks we have definitely seen that relationship grow."

UMass will be missing to players on the bench this week, with Olivier Lamoureux and senior captain Anthony Anderson staying behind. Anderson will miss the rest of the season with a injured back and Lamoureux is redshirting this season and will stay behind to do schoolwork.

Senior point guard Chris Chadwick will be making the trip even though he is suffering from a bad "chest cold." Chadwick did not practice yesterday, but Lappas believes that he will be ready come tip-off tomorrow.

Strawberry instructs Mets

By Mike Fitzpatrick
Associated Press

PORT ST. LUCIE, Fla. — Decked out in a Mets uniform for the first time in 15 years, a smiling Darryl Strawberry strolled into the dugout and flexed his left biceps.

"Don't I look great?" he said, laughing.

And with that, the greatest hitter in team history was welcomed back to the Mets, where his roller-coaster of a career began with such promise.

Strawberry arrived at spring training Monday to serve as a guest instructor for a few days, working mostly with major and minor league outfielders.

Trim and fit just five days shy of his 43rd birthday, he looked as if he could still turn on an inside fastball and send it soaring off the right-field scoreboard at Shea Stadium. In fact, he's younger than backup first baseman Andres Galarraga, who will turn 44 in June.

But Strawberry said he isn't looking to jump in the batting cage and start taking swings anytime soon. He's content to be retired — and thankful to be alive.

"It's not about me, it's about who I can help," he said. "It's these guys' time, it's not my time. My time is over."

What a time it was, though. Drafted No. 1 overall in 1980 out of Crenshaw High School in Los Angeles, Strawberry rocketed to the major leagues and was the NL Rookie of the Year in '83.

Blessed with awesome power, graceful speed and a beautiful swing, he was soon compared to Hall of Famers such as Ted Williams, Hank Aaron and Mickey Mantle.

Those kinds of expectations are tough to live up to, especially in New York, but he might have had a chance to do it had his career not been derailed by drugs, alcohol and a string of arrests for everything from tax evasion to allegations of beating his wife.

The Mets of the mid-to-late 80s were extremely talented on the field and excessively wild off it. They owned the Big Apple back then — not the Yankees — and Strawberry partied hard, right along with his teammates.

"It probably was all true. We were probably a bunch of crazy guys. But let me tell you one thing: When we stepped on that field, we were all business. We were a team and we picked each other up," he said.

He helped New York win the '86 World Series, but left to sign with his hometown Dodgers after the 1990 season and hadn't donned a Mets uniform since.

"It was a real tough separation," Strawberry said. "This is where everything happened for me. My best days of playing were here.

"There were probably times when I hated it, but I loved it, too," he said. "When I left to go play in L.A., it was boring. I wasn't being booed."

In truth, Strawberry had his share of big seasons. He made eight All-Star teams, finished runner-up to Kirk Gibson for the 1988 NL MVP Award and is still the Mets' career leader in home runs (252), RBIs (733) and runs scored (662).

But he's been granted one second chance after another — in baseball and in life.

Suspended from the majors three times for cocaine-related problems, he resurfaced with the Yankees and played on three championship teams from 1996-99, hitting 24 homers in only 295 at-bats in '98.

He survived painful operations for colon cancer, winning new fans with his inspirational comeback.

He disappeared for four days from a drug treatment center, then turned up again after friends feared he was dead.

And after all the hype when he first came up from the minors, he received only six Hall of Fame votes this year, his first — and last — on the writers' ballot.

"I should have had better years, now that I look back on it," he said.

Mostly, Strawberry's story is a cautionary tale of what might have been, and now he wants to share what he's learned with young players.

"I truly know talent," he said. "Don't make some of the mistakes I made because you have to pay a price for everything."

Wearing his familiar No. 18 beneath a blue windbreaker, Strawberry shagged flies on a practice field and signed autographs. He chatted with Mets slugger Cliff Floyd and served as a cutoff man during drills.

"It's a start," Mets general manager Omar Minaya said. "With a lot of new stuff going on, it's always good to remember the past."

Darryl Strawberry, who spent time with the Yankees and Mets, is being used as a guest instructor for the Mets during spring training.

Following a winter of adoration, Red Sox players still are their noisy boisterous selves, perhaps even more so with the addition of former Yankee David Wells.

"Now New Yorkers can't chant '1918!' anymore," Wells said.

For more than eight decades, the Yankees piled it on, winning 26 World Series titles to Boston's zero. Now Red Sox fans are puffing out their chests with pride.

A sampling of the T-shirts on fans:

"From Cursed to First."

"Hey Yankees ... Who's Your Daddy now?"

Kevin Millar looked ahead to the home opener, a celebration of the mighty moment last October.

"The rings will probably be the best, the ultimate," he said.

Millar also voiced support for Giambi, who appeared to enjoy his time signing autographs for and speaking with fans near the Yankees dugout on the first-base side. A young girl gave Giambi a white bear, and he gave her his batting gloves.

He signed the cover of Red Sox Magazine, with Tim Wakefield, Mike Timlin and the World Series trophy on the cover.

"That's a Red Sox hat, Jason," one fan said.

"That's all right," Giambi replied before signing it.

Someone threw him a dollar bill, and he autographed that, too.

"He treats people and respects people more than any other superstar I've been around," Millar said.

Illinois not worried about loss

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

CHICAGO — So much for the 29 straight wins the Fighting Illini piled up over the last four months, their double-digit victory margins and their dazzling shooting stats.

One loss — and on a last-second shot, at that — and top-ranked Illinois isn't quite so impressive anymore.

"The radio talk shows in Chicago this morning make me sick," Purdue coach Gene Keady said Monday. "They're upset Illinois didn't go (unbeaten). That's ridiculous. Twenty-nine and one is unbelievable."

It's not just callers in Chicago who are dogging the Illini, though, after Sunday's 65-64 loss at Ohio State spoiled their bid for a perfect season. Illinois kept its No. 1 ranking in this week's poll with 48 first-place votes and 1,725 points, but 22 voters went for North Carolina, a team with three losses.

Some are wondering whether Illinois could lose out on a No. 1 seed in the NCAA tournament if it doesn't go deep in the Big Ten tournament, which begins Thursday at the United Center. Illinois has a bye in the first round, and plays the winner of Michigan-Northwestern on Friday.

"It's hard for people to realize, but this is not going to impact them greatly. They did not turn into mere mortals today, nor were they invincible before," Minnesota coach Dan Monson said. "They weren't going to get carried away if they went undefeated and they're not going to collapse if they didn't. I think you're going to see business-as-usual Illinois on Friday."

The Illini were trying to become the first team to go through an entire season undefeated since Indiana in 1975-76, and their start was the best since UNLV opened 34-0 before losing in the 1991 Final Four. They hadn't lost since falling to Duke in the NCAA regional semifinals last March, and had a margin of victory of almost 19 points. They routed then-No. 1 Wake Forest and snapped Wisconsin's 38-game home winning streak, the longest in the country.

But the Illini never really got a powerhouse's respect, with plenty of skeptics wondering when — not if — they were going to lose.

"Everybody's waiting for us to lose, saying they think we're not the best team in the country," Dee Brown said last month after the Illini beat Wisconsin for a second time. "Watch TV, they'll show you, they'll tell you. The No. 1 team? It's not us."

Part of it is Illinois' makeup. The Illini don't have a big inside presence, making them seem vulnerable to teams that do like Kansas (Wayne Simien) or North Carolina (Sean May). They have a multitude of weapons with all five starters averaging in double figures, but no one "star."

They don't even have a cool nickname like Michigan's Fab Five or the Flyin' Illini, the school's last Final Four team.

The Big Ten doesn't help much, either. The conference isn't as strong as it was a few years ago, when it had two Final Four teams in back-to-back seasons. Only Illinois, No. 13 Michigan State and No. 23 Wisconsin are ranked, and the conference will be fortunate to get five teams in the NCAA tournament.

Compare that with the ACC, which has three of the top five teams in the country. Or the Big East, which has five teams in the top 25.

"Illinois was doing something that so few have done," Michigan State coach Tom Izzo said. "I still love that team. I still think they've got a chance to make a big-time run in every tournament they play in."

And, ultimately, that's the only thing that matters.

Since the start of the season, Illinois has had the same goals: be the Big Ten champions, get a No. 1 seed in the NCAA tournament and win the national title. Matching the 1975-76 Hoosiers would have been an added bonus, but it was never the Illini's priority. They insisted they weren't overwhelmed by the attention that grew with every victory, and they scoffed at the notion they should lose a game before the tournament to reduce the pressure.

But Sunday's loss leaves them little choice but to refocus.

"I hope they got a taste of defeat and what it feels like. We haven't had that in 12 months or whatever it was, since the Duke game," coach Bruce Weber said. "Maybe we need to taste that again. Be humbled a little bit. Maybe it'll do some good. I hope it will."

UMass has rematch with LaSalle

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team is trying to do something different tomorrow. Something it hasn't done in the last two years.

That something is winning in the first round of the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Tomorrow at 2 p.m. the Minutemen will face LaSalle at the U.S. Bank Arena in Cincinnati. UMass defeated the Explorers in their last meeting in a 69-66 overtime game on Feb. 19 in Philadelphia.

The Minutemen would have played Duquesne (who they played in the last game of the season on Saturday) had LaSalle beaten Temple on Saturday afternoon. UMass coach Steve Lappas is pleased that he does not have to face Duquesne so soon, but implied that this preference has nothing to do with the talent of the teams.

"In all honesty I would rather play somebody else, rather than someone we just beat. It's not a matter of who I think is better or worse," Lappas said. "I would just rather not let them come back at us when it's so fresh."

In their last meeting with the Explorers, the Minutemen had trouble holding on to the ball, committing 16 turnovers in the game, as opposed to LaSalle's eight. Part of UMass' struggles were caused by Explorer guard Jermaine Thomas, who had a career game with 18 points, a block, and a team-high three steals.

Thomas had to pick up the offensive gap left by All-Conference forward Steven Smith, who was relegated to 12 points on the afternoon, eight points less than his league-leading 20.3 points per game (ppg).

Smith was shut down by UMass forward Stephane Lasme, who is currently second in the league in total blocks with 69. Lasme had four blocks while grabbing a team-high 13 boards.

Lasme has made huge improvements since last season and has

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 6

Sophomore guard Artie Boers gives up for a shot against Richmond on Jan. 29. Bowers averages 8.2 points per game this year for the Minutemen. UMass travels to Ohio tomorrow to take on LaSalle in the first round of the A-10 tournament.

Track finishes strong

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

The indoor track season officially came to an end for the Massachusetts women's track team this weekend at the Reggie Lewis Track and Field Center in Boston. Only three Minutewomen qualified for the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championship, junior Elisabeth Budd (500 meters), senior Christina Huff (60 meters), and freshman Kristen Bakanowski (pole vault).

The University of Pittsburgh dominated the event by scoring an impressive 26.75 points to runner-up Bucknell University's 13. None of the Minutewomen earned its team any points, but still showed that they could compete with some of the best in the country and had strong personally showings.

Budd placed 14th by running one of her fastest times all season in the 500 meters (1:15.99). Huff had to adjust from her usual event of 55 meters to 60 meters, which didn't seem to have an effect on her as she ran one of the fastest times in UMass history with the time of 7.83 seconds in the semi-finals.

In her first ECAC Championship freshman standout Kristen Bakanowski didn't place first as she's grown accustomed to in recent events as she cleared the same height as 11 other women, but technically came in 16th place due to her amount of attempts. Bakanowski offered her words of reflection from her biggest meet so far and on her first season as a whole.

"Yeah, it was a really good experience, I huff I believe set the school record. Budd ran one of her fastest times, and I opened at 11'8" which is really high because half the girls no heighted," Bakanowski said, "I learned that I can compete with the other girls and not to be as nervous next time I go."

The three women in Saturday's events had been improving all season and gaining confidence, which should please Coach Julie LaFreniere going into the outdoor season that starts up on April 2, when they compete in the Southern Connecticut State Invitational.

The indoor season was one of rebuilding, improvement and inconsistency occasionally highlighted by some big performances by athletes like Huff and Bakanowski. A lot of newcomers stepped up to give the program promise, while seniors offered led and taught the team's youngsters through a solid work ethic.

"[The seniors taught me] to work as hard as you can as a freshman and sophomore because four years goes by really quickly," explained Bakanowski, "and you don't want to regret slacking off, so you really have to figure out what the most important thing for yourself and go for it."

Looking forward to next year, the Minutewomen look to build on the success of their freshman sensations and bring in more similar athletes in order to return the program to the top, where it was for much of the 1990's. The 2005 had some special individuals, but overall the team didn't have enough depth or versatility to be where they wanted to be.

"All of the girls on the team are really dedicated and work really hard," said a proud Bakanowski, "We had a lot of good freshman come in and hopefully in the next few years our team will grow and become stronger."

Sox fans taunt Giambi

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Jason Giambi provided most of the juice when the Red Sox played the Yankees on Monday night.

The New York Yankees designated hitter and symbol of baseball's steroids problem arrived at the second annual hugely overhyped exhibition game, gave a mass interview, took batting practice and signed autographs for 25 minutes.

Then, as two men behind the plate screamed "Steroids! Steroids! Steroids!" in the fifth inning, he sent a pitch from John Halama over the fence in right-center field for his first home run of the spring.

Patrons at City of Palms Park were polite during batting practice, then booed when he was introduced and again before he singled sharply to right field in the first inning.

"Come on, Juicy!" one loud fan yelled.

"Let's go Balco!" chanted a group of four, referring to the laboratory in the federal investigation of steroid distribution.

Before he popped out in the third, the two men behind the plate screamed: "Steroids!" and "Waste of Money!"

In the stands, someone held a sign that read: "Jason Do You Have Milk." The word "Milk" was crossed out and followed by "Juice?"

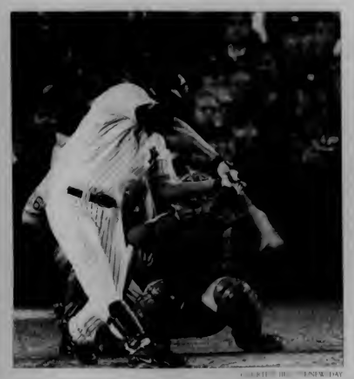
And there was the by now obligatory gibe at Alex Rodriguez: "A Rod is a Choke," one sign read.

During Giambi's first three games of spring training, he was received warmly. But two of those were at Tampa's Legends Field, where the Yankees are based, and one at Lakeland, where New York fans were as numerous as Detroit supporters.

Giambi was prepared to face the Red Sox Nation.

"It's Yankees-Red Sox," he said before the game. "I got booed before, I'm sure it will be no different."

Giambi was one of only a handful of Yankees regulars who made the two-hour bus ride for the split-squad game, the first reunion of the rivals since Boston upset the usual order last October, becoming the first major league team to overcome a 3-0 deficit in a postseason series. The Red Sox beat New York for the pennant, then swept St. Louis for their first World Series title since 1918.



Last spring, there was a big buzz for New York's game in Fort Myers. Aaron Boone's 11th-inning homer off Tim Wakefield had beaten Boston in Game 7, and the Yankees acquired Rodriguez, the AL MVP, from Texas after the Red Sox failed.

With A-Rod, Derek Jeter and New York's entire regular pitching staff back in Tampa, the hoopla was down a notch. The uniform numbers of the starting pitchers totaled 156, with Abe Alvarez (79) starting for Boston against Chien-Ming Wang (76). Neither figures to be at Yankee Stadium when these teams play the major league season opener on April 3 or at Fenway Park when the World Series flag is raised eight days later.

Along with the $5.67 commemorative pin and Yankees-Red Sox tic-tac-toe game and chess set, there was plenty of merchandise marked "World Series champions."

The changed attitude of the perennial underdog was noticeable even at the entrance to the Boston clubhouse, where a photo of the Red Sox at the

Tennis seeks momentum

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team has put together a solid season so far. The team's schedule is divided up into fall and spring, having matches in October and then continuing them in February with about two months in between.

The Minutewomen — after the first two matches were delayed due to weather — faired well in their fall appearences, starting the season out with a convincing three game winning streak.

UMass hopes that its first half triumphs can carry over into the spring season.

On Oct. 1 UMass swept crosstown rival Amherst College, winning all seven of their matches. The Amherst College women's team went to the division three nationals championship last year and was ranked second in the country for division three teams.

Finishing up the second of the two delayed games to start the season, the Minutewomen were dominant again, beating the University of Connecticut 6-1 on the road. UMass ended their fall schedule with another solid win on the road, winning every one of their matches, defeating Williams College 9-0.

The fall season ended their for most of the players, but a few moved on to the ITA East Regional at Levy Pavilion on the University of Pennsylvania campus on Oct. 25.

Both sophomore transfer Michele Spiess and freshman Masha Pozar competed in the East Regional. Spiess won her first two matches (beating Albany's Courtney Michels and Richmond's Beatrice Grassi), but was defeated in her third, ending a solid run. Pozar and Spiess competed together in the doubles event but lost their first match.

This year's team is made up of nine players, including three freshmen, one sophomore, four juniors and just one senior. Numbers wise, the underclassmen have already made a substantial impact on the team's

B.C. not concerned with trophy

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Al Skinner has what other coaches envy: A 24-3 record, two all-Big East players on the roster and an us-against-them snub to motivate his team in the conference tournament.

If only he were interested.

"If that's what's going to motivate you, then you shouldn't be playing," Skinner said of the Big East's failure to schlep a trophy to the team's regular-season finale at Rutgers. "You've got to bring your own motivation."

Boston College is leaving the Big East for the Atlantic Coast Conference next season, a decision that created no shortage of bad feelings among fans, players and officials of the jilted league. But dealings remained essentially cordial until BC athletic director Gene DeFilippo told reporters on Sunday the league was "petty" for giving regular-season co-champion Connecticut, but not BC, a trophy at its finale.

"Our players and coaches had absolutely nothing to do with Boston College's decision to go to the Atlantic Coast Conference," DeFilippo said. "If the Big East has problems with me, let them take it out on me."

Big East officials denied that they were out to get Boston College, noting that they were only in Storrs, Conn., to honor UConn's Jim Calhoun and Syracuse's Jim Boeheim, who each picked up his 700th victory. UConn officials asked them to bring the trophy in case the Huskies won.

"We have never presented a trophy at an away venue," Big East spokesman John Paquette said Monday.

Meanwhile, DeFilippo has gotten over the slight, or at least decided to accept it. He declined requests for comment on Monday.

There was some disappointment about the trophy situation, but today the mood at BC is all about happiness," spokesman Chris Cameron said.

"We're Big East champions with a No. 1 seed in the tournament and we're ranked seventh in the country. So life is good at Boston College."

Nothing motivates coaches and athletes more than disrespect, even Bill Belichick felt the need to play the card while the Patriots were on their way to a third Super Bowl victory in four years.

"Fuel to the fire," said Craig Smith, one of two BC players named to the all-Big East team on Monday.

Boston College was scheduled to leave on Tuesday for New York, where they'll get their trophy at a banquet. The tournament starts Wednesday, with BC getting a bye until Thursday as a No. 1 seed; the Eagles will play West Virginia or Providence.

"It bothers us and motivates us," Jared Dudley, the other all-Big East selection, said of the trophy flap. "We do think everybody's against us.

"We know they don't want us to win the championship in our last year, but that's what we're going to do."

Skinner said he understands the rule about trophy presentations at away games, and he thinks the controversy could have been avoided if someone had told BC beforehand.

But he'll take a pass on using it to fire up his team.

Wilson recommends law school merger

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

After receiving an impromptu positive recommendation from President Jack Wilson yesterday, the University of Massachusetts is one step further with merging with the Southern New England School of Law, creating the first public law school in the state.

"This is a surprise," said Ryan Benharris, UMass alumni and current SNESL student. "I didn't think there would be a decision until next week, but it looks like Jack Wilson was just so excited, he came out with it."

According to Benharris, The Massachusetts Board of Higher Education hired private inspectors to interview SNESL students, faculty members and sit in on classrooms. The inspectors, comprised of deans from other public law institutions in the country gave an overwhelming positive recommendation to the Board.

"[The inspectors] looked over the entire proposed idea and gave their recommendation," Benharris said, "and it was pretty glowing."

Wilson reported the findings at Middlesex Community College yesterday during a budget hearing.

"The report substantiates our case very strongly," Wilson told the Associated Press. "They identify no significant obstacles."

Benharris also mentioned that although the news was surprising, he had a good feeling that the recommendation would have been positive.

"The [recommendation] was surprising," he said. "The content of it was not. UMass has done everything perfectly."

According to the Associated Press, the panel of six, "conducted a month long review" of the facility located in Dartmouth. The final decision, however, will come down to a vote that is slated to take place on March 31.

"We are very hopeful the board will vote to approve the law school," Wilson told the Associated Press.

"President Wilson has been behind [the merger], he is one of the frontrunners and he has had nothing but positive influence," Benharris said. "he has been a tremendous friend and he has the most admiration for this school."

According to Benharris and the Associated Press, the potential merger has been under harsh criticism from other private law institutions because the institutions claim that UMass and SNESL will not uphold its contract to keep the facility in Dartmouth.

"Personally I think that [the private institutions] are trying to scare taxpayers and smear misinformation in the newspapers," Benharris said. "This is really unfortunate and disappointing."

Benharris also added that Massachusetts, one of only five states that does not have a public law school, is a state that should have one because of all the important lawmaking decisions.

"I mean, look at the gay marriage law that was passed," he said. "It turned the elections results, and it was in Massachusetts."

UMass President Jack Wilson gives a positive recommendation about making a Massachusetts first ever public law school.

Psychology Ph.D. added to UMass

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

A new Ph.D. concentration has been created by the Psychology department at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. The doctoral program is concentrated in "The Psychology of Peace and the Prevention of Violence." According to the Psychology department, "[the program] aims to draw on a broad range of psychology and related fields."

Robert J. Lifton, who is an expert on violence and genocide, discussed "Psychology, War and Peace: America's Struggles with Violence" to a packed audience in Memorial Hall, on campus this past Monday. The talk was intended as an inaugural event in honor of the new Ph.D. program in the psychology of peace and the prevention of violence at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

Lifton is also a lecturer of psychiatry at the Harvard Medical School and established author of more than 20 books regarding anything from cults and mind control to the death penalty and atrocities committed by Nazi doctors during World War II.

Lifton's lecture addressed concepts and lessons that can be learned from survivors of past violence and genocide. Lifton also touched on problems with the Bush Administration's foreign policy in a post 9/11 nation as survivors of violence.

President Bush, according to Lifton, gave specific and deliberate meaning to Sept. 11 by declaring a war against terror. However, "at the same time there were others who were stumbling toward an alternative survivor mission which had to do with seeking to understand some of the sources of 9/11."

"[Opponents to a war on terrorism] certainly considemn [9/11] as a 'crime against humankind' according to the Nuremburg definition of the term; but [desire] limiting violence to tracking down perpetrators as opposed to an amorphous worldwide war against terrorism.

"The defeat in Vietnam led to a preoccupation with first regaining and then maintaining American military power. So here is an opposite survivor mission, not restraint, but reassertion of American power, as can be seen in America's involvement in two gulf

Icy artist chisels a chilly Southwest winter scene

By Matthew Belliveau
Collegian Staff

A cold wind blows through the Southwest campus of the University of Massachusetts. A few students, who look like they're too cold to enjoy Southwest's "Winter Wonderland" celebration, are gingerly walking towards their classes or dorms. Suddenly, their attention is turned to the sound of chainsaw nearby. Curious, chilled students forget about finding warmth and begin to watch Derek Henry fashion a sparkling sculpture out of frozen water.

The art of ice carving is nothing new. It began with French chefs more than 200 years ago. The first ice sculptures were basic designs used as functional holders to keep food cold during service time on elaborate buffets. In Japan, ice carving is a full-time profession; sculptors carve wood in the summer and ice in the winter. Both are directly responsible for bringing ice sculpting to the height of recognition that it owns today, as well as introducing this art to the American culture.

Ice sculptures can range from large scale pieces, requiring the fusing or blending of several blocks in order to create massive sculptures, to small-scale pieces, typically known as decorative supports for dishes, or "handiwork." These structures generally require advanced skills and special equipment.

There are two kinds of ice used in ice sculptures: basic canned ice and "crystal clear" ice. Crystal clear blocks can cost two or three times more than canned ice. This is ice that is free of the cloud or snow in the center of the block. The level of a block of ice's clarity determines its quality. The clarity of the ice depends on how the ice is made; the more time spent circulating the water during the freezing process, the clearer the ice.

Henry, who has been professionally ice sculpting for over 10 years, loves the art of transforming a block of ice into nearly anything in imagination.

Most ice sculptors, like Henry, begin practicing the art in the same setting, the kitchen.

"I used to work in the kitchens of hotels and restaurants. Whenever an ice carving was ordered, I would set them up on the table and prepare it for the ice carver. I would decorate the ice in the kitchen, put the light behind it," said Henry. "And after doing a bunch of those, I said to myself, 'Gee, I'd really like to try that.'"

An icy Minuteman stands in Southwest after being carved by artist Derek Henry.

Derek Henry, ice sculptor poses in front of his frozen masterpiece during Southwest's "Winter Wonderland Celebration." Henry has been sculpting for over 10 years.

Henry then met up with Steve Rose, a master carver. For two years Henry worked under Rose as his apprentice, learning the craft through hands-on experience.

"Working as an apprentice for Steve, instead of just watching him work, he had me working right along side him," said Henry. "I would cut the blocks of ice in half, he would scribe what he wanted to cut on the side of the block and I would "rough-cut" that. And as I cut, he would teach me certain tricks and tips towards cutting correctly. And eventually, I was out cutting on my own."

Watching up close, ice sculpting may seem simple, but creating this art is harder and more complicated than it looks.

"I begin with a block of ice, normally 20' by 10", about 40" high. And then I draw on a piece of paper what I want to carve, like a swan. Then I go to the icehouse and freeze the drawing onto the ice, this gives me my outline."

The preliminary drawing is the first step to a successful ice carving. It will enable the ice carver to proceed with a faster, easier, technically more accurate and more beautiful ice sculpture while conserving the amount of ice used in the sculpture. All of the great sculpting masters of time

Eisen speaks on Israel-Palestine conflict

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

The Five College Israel Activism Conference, which featured Israel Defense Forces spokesman Miri Eisen talking to students of the current state of the country and its ongoing heated relationship with Palestine, was showcased on Sunday.

A slide show was also given by Birthright members, a group of Jewish University of Massachusetts students who had visited Israel for ten days during the winter break.

"I hope that people from all backgrounds can learn of Israel and realize the importance of strong support for it" stated Matt Hoffman, student and lead organizer of UMass Student Alliance for Israel, a registered student organization.

Many organizations supported the conference, which was designed to educate students about Israel and Palestine relations and help them get politically active about it. Among the groups participating were Hasbara Fellowships, UMass Amherst Hillel, Israel Campus Roundtable, Stand with Us, Hamagshimim and Birthright Israel.

Eisen, who has spent most of her life in Israel and was a correspondent during Operation Defensive Shield, a large military operation done by Israel Defense Forces to rid terrorists from the West Bank, revealed Yassar Arafat's and his money trail in Swiss banks on "60 Minutes." She spoke of disengagement Israel will be experiencing with Palestine this summer July 20 to Aug. 30 after people living in 22 settlements of the Gaza Strip are moved out of their homes due to orders by their government.

"These people live in 22 settlements there," stated Eisen. "People who were instructed by their government to build homes and live there. After living 25 to 30 years of their lives there they are now being told by Ariel Sharon to move."

Touching upon the possibility of two separate states of Israel and Palestine, Eisen added she is "hopeful, with moderate expectations." She pointed out Sharon is the only Israeli Prime Minister who while in office suggested publicly for two independent states. At the same time, Eisen explained he is the one pushing for this massmigration of the people of the Gaza Strip from their dwellings, places he pushed for to be established in the 1980's. She told the group of students 15,000 Israelis signed petitions opposing this summer

Prison fire claims dozens of inmates

By Peter Prengamen
Associated Press

HIGUEY, Dominican Republic — A prison fire that killed 134 inmates, one of the deadliest in Latin American prisons, has cast a harsh spotlight on conditions in this country's cells.

The Dominican Republic has the most overcrowded jails in the Western Hemisphere, according to U.N. figures, and the fire early Monday in the eastern city of Higuey happened at one of its worst.

The cellblock where the blaze broke out — known as the Vietnam block — was said to be so packed, inmates were sleeping on top of toilets. To make matters worse, the inmates had guns and knives and easy access to drugs, another notorious feature of prisons here.

"It is hell on earth," said Domingo Porfirio Rojas-Nina of the Dominican National Human Rights Commission said of the Higuey prison. "It is unfit for human beings."

Officials gave varying numbers for the overall population of the prison, a confusion illustrating some of the problems with the system. But there appeared to be at least 178 inmates in the block, which had a maximum capacity of 25.

The government ordered an investigation of the fire, which began during a fight among inmates over who would control their drug trade. Guards said when they went to open the door, they found it blocked.

Bodies were later found "piled up on top of each other" at the door, where the inmates died trying to escape, chief firefighter Nestor Vera said.

Alexander Sanchez, 28, was one of the few to survive.

evacuation.

"There are dramatic changes taking place," Eisen commented. "This settlement comes out of a bloody, four and a half year war between the two peoples. We're talking about a harsh reality. This is about two separate peoples who feel the need to be separated from one another."

Speaking of this "harsh reality," she described the relationship between the two groups.

"They don't trust one another," Eisen added. "Palestinians especially despise Israelis, hatred is expressed in Palestinian books, television, radio, etc. telling them how to treat them."

Members of the various organizations expressed their thanks for Eisen's visit.

"I think [Eisen] is a fantastic speaker, very eloquent," said Lori Hoch, campus coordinator of Hasbara Fellowships. "I'm very happy with the turnout on a Sunday morning. We've had 50 people register so far for the conference."

More events were promised throughout the day at the Israel Activism Conference. At 5 p.m. at the Hillel House, dinner and an Israel Fair took place, where organizations got to speak more with students. Following that, Remedy, who has collaborated with Wu-Tang Clan and Subliminal, an Israeli rap group performed as well.

Southwest chills with ice

have started with drawings before even attempting a three dimensional piece.

The next step involves the cutting of the ice block. In order to cut the full three hundred-pound block of ice down to a more manageable size, ice carvers use an electric chain saw. However, most of the work will be done by hand using various types and shapes of ice chisels.

Ice Chisels are the most common tools for carving ice. They come in different sizes and shapes. Smaller-sized chisels have short handles and the larger-sized chisels have long handles. The best are produced in Japan, although Germany is also known for producing high quality chisels and other tools.

After the block has been chiseled down to a workable size, the carver then begins creating his sculpture.

"If I'm creating a swan, I'll start carving the swan one dimensionally. After I have finished it's first dimension then it's just a matter of turning the swan from side to side, slowly giving it shape, until I have created a three-dimensional swan."

Working together with teams of other ice sculptors Henry has created some of New England's largest ice sculptures.

"In 1991, I worked with a team and sculpted a huge dinosaur for the "First Night" celebration in Boston, the next year we went even bigger and created a medieval castle," said Henry. "The biggest thing I've done by myself was the "First Night" celebration in Gloucester. The theme of the night was musical instruments, so I made a "three-piece band". I had a dolphin playing a baby grand piano, a sailfish playing a bass fiddle, a seal playing the trumpet with a penguin orchestrating the whole band."

The ideal temperatures for outdoor ice sculpting are high 20s during the day and in the teens during the night. Anything colder would prevent visitors from enjoying the show.

"Cold weather only hurts the crowds, but the ice cuts easier the colder it gets. And of course the warmer the weather the worse the ice cuts. So as ice carvers, we just have to deal with the cold. That's why most of us try to cut in a freezer, that way it's just cold enough to keep the ice crisp, but not cold enough so that we're miserable."

But according to Henry, all of the hard work and pain is worth it in the end.

"You can make a good living in this profession, but you really have to hustle your work. It's extremely important to get out there and push your product," said Henry. "But once you make a name for yourself, it's easy to make money."

But, due to recent developments in computer ice carving, money may soon become harder to earn.

"A lot of it is computerized now. There is a machine that holds the ice while a computerized router, that is told through a computer what to cut, cuts the ice. They produce nearly flawless work in half the time it take me to make a sculpture," said Henry.

But the crowds don't come to watch computers make an ice sculpture. They want to hear the chainsaw, they want to see the ice fly, and they want to watch Derek Henry create whatever he imagines.

Prison fire kills hundreds in Dominican Republic

"When they finally opened the door, we all tried to get out but we didn't all make it, some got trampled to death," said Sanchez, 28, in jail for beating up a man in a dispute over a woman. He has been waiting two years for his trial.

Just 26 prisoners were rescued, said National Police Chief Manuel de Jesus Perez Sanchez.

Among the 134 dead were two Americans from Puerto Rico convicted of cocaine trafficking. Two other Americans, likewise from Puerto Rico, were among 18 inmates injured, officials said.

The riot began with an earlier disturbance in which one inmate was shot and wounded, said the national prison director, Gen. Ramon de la Cruz Martinez.

Guards broke up that fight, but soon after prisoners began rioting, setting fire to their bedding.

Enrique Wilano, 27, a survivor hospitalized with a gunshot to his shoulder and cuts to his face, said some gang members continued fighting as the fire grew into an inferno.

"They didn't want us to leave. Everybody who tried to get to the door got shot or hit with a machete," Wilano said.

Scores of relatives gathered outside the jail.

"I just want to find out if he's still alive," Porfirio Rodriguez said of his son, Ramon, who had been serving time for smuggling migrants to Puerto Rico.

Police directed Rodriguez to a nearby copy shop, where he had to pay a dollar to obtain a list of the victims. Ramon was among the dead.

Austacia Guerrero, the mother of another prisoner, said the inmates didn't have a chance. "They're like sardines in there. They can't move, so how are they going to get out?" she said.

wars," said Lifton.

Lifton additionally pointed out that after Vietnam, lessons that should be applied to present foreign policy were abandoned by the foreign policy advisors closest to the Bush Administration. Lifton referred to the administration as 'vulcans' having little experience with war and its consequences diplomatically.

The response of America to the Sept. 11 attacks, according to Lifton was "a dangerous exaggeration." Likewise, the response failed "to take a critical look at American policies that could have contributed to 9/11."

Lifton pointed out that the two distinct survivor missions of the post 9/11 age have been at odds against each other in the American mainstream.

"On the one hand Americans are confused about what caused 9/11 and now, having the energy to look beneath it more than was initially encouraged or permitted," said Lifton. However, he points out that "at the same time there is still a post 9/11 belligerence about 9/11 because it was such a horrific event."

According to Ervin Staub, a professor of Psychology and director of the new doctoral program, "Understanding the roots and prevention of violence between groups, such as intractable conflict, ethno-political warfare, mass killing, genocide and terrorism is a young and developing area of research and scholarship, especially in psychology."

The new doctoral program in the psychology of peace and the prevention of violence would not be possible if it were not for a $2.5 million anonymous donation. According to the Psychology department the goal of the initial donor is to foster the creation of a peaceful world; likewise, "we expect that our program will contribute to the study of individual violence, becoming more engaged with issues of group and community violence and peace."

Clinton will undergo second surgery

By Karen Matthews
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Six months after undergoing heart bypass surgery, former President Clinton will return to the hospital this week to have a rare buildup of fluid and scar tissue removed from his chest.

"I feel fine," Clinton said Tuesday in Washington, adding that he plans to play golf in Florida a day before the operation.

Doctors at New York-Presbyterian Hospital/Columbia University Medical Center, where Clinton is scheduled to have the procedure on Thursday, said the surgery is low-risk.

Former President Clinton will undergo surgery to remove tissue around his heart.

During the procedure, known as a decortication, doctors will remove scar tissue that is pressing down on his left lung. The surgery will be done either through a small incision or with a video-assisted thoracope inserted between his ribs.

The former president said doctors discovered the condition during a recent X-ray, and he called the surgery a "routine sort of deal."

In an interview with Associated Press Television News, Clinton said he knew before he went with former President George H.W. Bush to tour tsunami-devastated areas last month that he would be having the surgery. Doctors told him he would not be able to fly after the surgery, so he scheduled it after he returned.

Clinton said he will play in a charity golf tournament for tsunami relief Wednesday with the elder Bush.

"I feel line. I just had a little fluid buildup after my surgery," Clinton told APTN. "It's no big deal."

Clinton's problem is a rare complication of his surgery, where inflammation of the lining of the heart develops and fluid builds around it or in the lungs, said Dr. Craig Smith, who performed the bypass surgery on Clinton in September. He said it occurs in "a fraction of one percent" of cases.

Dr. Allan Schwartz, chief of the cardiology at New York-Presbyterian, said Clinton passed a full physical before going to Asia and scored in the 95th percentile for his age in a stress test.

Clinton, 58, had been quite active since his Sept. 6 heart surgery at Columbia-Presbyterian, presiding over the opening of his presidential library in Little Rock, Ark., and, more recently, joining the first President Bush for a public relations campaign to help raise private funds for the victims of the Asian tsunami.

Former President Bush said he had trouble keeping up with Clinton in Asia.

"You should have seen him going, town to town, country to country. Energizer Bunny here. He killed me," Bush said.

Clinton underwent quadruple coronary artery bypass surgery after suffering chest pains and shortness of breath.

In bypass surgery, doctors remove one or more blood vessels from elsewhere in the body and attach them to arteries serving the heart, detouring blood around blockages. The vessel typically comes from elsewhere in the chest, although doctors sometimes take one from an arm, a leg or the stomach.

Clinton previously blamed his blockage in part on genetics — there is a history of heart disease in his mother's family — but also said he "may have done some damage in those years when I was too careless about what I ate."

Student-run businesses in need of acknowledgement

The University of Massachusetts is holding the first annual "Student Business Appreciation Week," this week, designed and to honor those student-run business on campus that work so hard to serve UMass students. These businesses are what give the University of Massachusetts its character and charm. They add a hint of professionalism while still understanding and appealing to the student body, their primary target.

Without knowing it, students on campus have come to rely heavily on many of the student-run businesses. Just having the comfort of know a student can always get that last-minute impulse cup of coffee in the morning is a very good feeling. The eight student-run businesses on campus deserve campus-wide recognition for all the hard work they put in and this week is perfect to do just that.

All students can relate to holding a job while attending classes. However, the students who work and manage these businesses on campus seem to be undertaking a lot more than the average UMass student. Those students occupy the title of co-manager. For all intensive purposes, they are responsible for running everything, from ordering to staffing to organizing. With help from managerial consultants from the Isenberg School of Management, these students are gaining great experience and knowledge of the business world.

Perhaps the greatest thing these students will be walking away from their tenure at their respective businesses with is the knowledge of how to turn a profit. And what's even more impressive is that none of these students are business majors and are, therefore, trying to balance the stress of the corporate world with the everyday stresses of being a full-time college student.

This week is a great opportunity for all of UMass to take the time to properly acknowledge the hard work and long hours these students put in to making our day-to-day routine manageable. Student-run businesses, because they have the word "student" attached to the management's name, can often be thought of as less reputable. After all, they are just college students. But, the initiative that it takes to own and operate a business without help from the University is something that speaks volumes to all future employers for these students.

Also, the fact that these student-run businesses operate within the same vicinity of each other speaks very highly of the competitive nature that they have to endure. As any business owner knows, competition is a major factor and maintaining a successful corporation in the midst of all of it is vital.

For these student-run businesses, that they are able to still profit and stay afloat is remarkable. Because of the college campus environment, they need each other to survive, and working with your competitors is a better skill to have than working against them. This week, we should all take the time to acknowledge the hard work and dedication that these students put in to adding that little hint of comfort to our lives.

Buying the dunce defense

Andrew Freeman

On Feb. 28th, Bernard Ebbers told the jury of his trial: "I don't know about technology and I don't know about finance and accounting." Ebbers, the CEO who built, through a series of mergers, the telecommunications giant WorldCom, which at its height was worth over $150 billion, described his role as the chief salesman for the company. He is being tried for the $11 billion fraud that resulted in WorldCom's bankruptcy, the largest in U.S. history.

When I read about this in the New York Times, I laughed out loud. How can anyone possibly believe that story? To add insult to injury, Ebbers continued his self-deprecatory statements, saying he got bad grades in college and worked a string of low-paying jobs before he hit it big. His defense is more complicated than claiming ignorance, however, because Ebbers charges that his company's chief financial officer Scott Sullivan, the government's star witness, carried out the fraud without his knowledge.

For the sake of argument, let's assume that Ebbers was telling the truth, and that he was not familiar with his company's finances, let alone its products. In that highly unlikely scenario, something is very wrong that a man who runs an enormous company had no knowledge of accounting, and was unable to oversee the people in charge of it. What was he being paid so much for? Why would WorldCom grant him a $400 million loan with the only collateral being his stock of the company? Why would they give him a yearly pension of $1.5 million in his severance agreement?

Ebbers is mounting a dunce defense: he didn't know what he ought to do, what any competent person in his position would do. And he's not the only one who has professed stupidity. Kenneth Lay, the former CEO of Enron, is expected to make similar claims in his fraud case, as is Jeffrey Skilling, another Enron CEO.

... the dunce defense is only the latest manifestation of an age-old political tactic: claim ignorance and blame your subordinates.

Richard Scrushy, CEO of HealthSouth, made a similar defense in the face of charges of fraud, conspiracy, money laundering and more.

This wave of dunce defenses kicked off with Walter Forbes, the chairman of CUC International, a consumer services company. Prosecutors exposed the company's $286 million fraud, and implicated the vice chairman in the crime, but Forbes was able to defend himself by blaming his underlings while claiming ignorance of their actions. Forbes' case ended in a mistrial, with jurors unable to reach a verdict on his guilt, proving that sometimes it's good to be ignorant.

But the dunce defense is only the latest manifestation of an age-old political tactic: claim ignorance and blame your subordinates. Remember Iraq's weapons of mass destruction? When our troops couldn't find them, the Bush administration criticized the CIA for providing them with faulty intelligence, in particular scapegoating its director George Tenet. The Bush Administration had already reached its own conclusions about Iraq, and had manufactured evidence to support them. And then there's Sept. 11...

The Bush administration claimed that it had no warnings about Al-Qaeda's intention to attack the U.S. Speaking to the 9/11 Commission, Condoleeza Rice, then National Security Adviser, declared that a memo entitled "Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States" did not contain any warnings about attacks.

The memo reads in part "FBI information since that time indicates patterns of suspicious activity in this country consistent with preparations for hijackings or other types of attacks, including recent surveillance of federal buildings in New York."

The real travesty about the dunce defense, which demeans the intelligence of the listener as much as the defendant, is that it seems to work.

Forbes got his mistrial and Bush got his second term, and meanwhile most people are following Michael Jackson's trial rather than WorldCom's.

The people who use the dunce defense are all very intelligent, but the people who buy it are not.

Hurdles in the workplace

Samantha Sharac

There are still obstacles in achieving equality and equity in the workplace and these are the realities for women working outside of the home. From discrimination and sexual harassment, low pay and little promotions, to the ever-so-popular "double day," women are not exactly experiencing the so-called "welcome mat" in the labor market. These problems do not only hurt the individual woman but also all women and the entire labor workforce.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, women who work full time earned on average 80 percent of the earnings of men in 2003. The wage gap varies within age and racial/ethnic groups as well. The Bureau of Labor Statistics observed, "young women (16 to 24 years old) earned almost as much as young men, while women aged 35 years and older earned about three fourths as much as their male peers" (2003). Asian men earned the most income followed by Asian women who made 78 percent of the average income of Asian men.

The report from the Bureau of Labor Statistics concluded that white men and women earned more than black and Hispanic or Latino men and women. They also noted that white women earned 79 percent of the income of a white male while black and Hispanic women made 88 percent of the earnings of black and Hispanic men. Hispanic or Latino men and women earned the least among these racial/ethnic groups in 2003.

Sexism along with racism usually is a strong factor in the continuing hierarchy of the wage gap. Radford University professor Hilary Lips, in her review of the annual 2003 report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, discovered that "only in jobs that pay $25,000 to $30,000 a year do men and women earn roughly the same. The further up the pay scale and the higher the education, the wider the earnings gap" (2004). For instance, "Women college professors earn 75 cents; women lawyers and judges earn 69 cents" (Lips 2004); in comparison, "women bookkeepers earn 94 cents; women secretaries earn 84 cents" (Lips 2004).

Although many factors can explain this gender gap in earnings, for example preferences and years of work experience, the income disparity between men and women is still present when such factors are taken into account. The study director for the Institute for Women's Policy Research, Vicky Lovell, argues that "When certain factors are taken into account ... factors including different jobs and industries dominated by one gender; the disparate rates of union membership and years of work experience; education and training ... women still earn 12 cents less on the dollar than men" (2000).

Some people make light of this issue, but the fact is that sexual harassment is 'a vehicle for dominating women in the same ways that other violent crimes like rape and battering are.'

In addition to less pay and fewer promotions, women are more likely to be sexually harassed on the job. "Anywhere between 40-70 percent of women have experienced sexual harassment in the workplace," according to womenssisues.about.com. From Wall Street to the American armed forces, women are often sexually harassed in male-dominated occupations.

Women are still being called gender-specific derogatory names, they are the objects of dirty jokes and other degrading practices, which are all examples of the common acts of sexual harassment. Some people make light of this issue, but the fact is that sexual harassment is "a vehicle for dominating women in the same ways that other violent crimes like rape and battering are."

The "double day" is still an issue for women who work outside of the home. The productive duties, which are tied into women's reproductive roles such as cleaning, cooking and taking overall care of the home, are still part of the fabric of a gendered specific society. Again, due to economic pressures among other societal issues, many households have been making adjustments. It is left to be seen to what extent such changes will be practiced and if that will mean a shift in gender socialization roles.

If a woman is a single parent, she is burdened with even more responsibilities. A large income will help delegate the burden with paid help, but for poor, single-parent households there is little or no money for outside help. Relatives may help ease the burden of taking care of the home and caring for children while the parent works outside of the home. However, some single parents are unable to depend on family members to help and so the quality of their careers, households, and children's well-being suffer.

Women's workplace issues should be an ongoing economic and political discussion at all levels, the micro, the meso and the macro if there is to be any true measure of equity. Education, comparable worth, increase in the low income wage, access to affordable child-care and improvement in the work-force climate are just a few recommendations to improve the lives of women and our society.

U.S. must watch its step

Joseph St. John

A few days ago, the United States received a warning from Venezuelan president Hugo Chavez, saying that if we assassinate him, the country will shut off its oil exports to us.

The United States of course denied any intention to assassinate Chavez, calling such a claim ridiculous, but such an accusation begs the question of whether Chavez is sincerely afraid that his country's government is being manipulated.

The United States has a vested interest in Venezuelan politics for several reasons. Venezuela is the third largest importer of petroleum to the U.S., only behind Canada and Mexico, and according to the BBC, Venezuela under Chavez has been "courting" Libya, Cuba and Iran. It also dealt with the Iraqi Government led by Saddam Hussein. These are all governments openly against U.S. policy.

Chavez is quoted by ABC News as saying, "If this came to pass one day, that an invasion force came to Venezuela, a hundred-year war would ensue ... but not only in Venezuela, but in this part of Latin America and the Caribbean against imperialism ... so if this comes to pass, the citizens of the U.S. can forget about Venezuelan oil."

The U.S. has been known in the past to interfere with political turmoil in other countries in order to benefit its own political and economic interests. The Bay of Pigs was an unsuccessful attempt to start a coup in Cuba to overthrow Fidel Castro. The School of the Americas was used by the U.S. as an influential arm in the Latin American countries of El Salvador and Guatemala, and unspeakable atrocities were committed in the name of the U.S.

More recently Jean-Bertrand Aristide accused the U.S. of exiling him to South Africa after a coup last year that ousted him from his role as president of Cuba. History will tell if this claim has credence, and will unveil the extent of the U.S." involvement in the 2004 turmoil in Haiti. Is it possible that we are meddling a little too much in Venezuela as well?

There is little doubt that the U.S. has the capability of funding Chavez dissidents, and involving itself in Venezuela's internal affairs. Chavez knows this and has claimed that his government has the evidence and proof that it has done so already.

As the U.S. becomes increasingly dependent on foreign oil we must tread carefully in order to fulfill our energy needs for the future while not using our might unjustly. Our military strength cannot be our only diplomatic device.

ABC news said, "Chavez is convinced that the United States is helping to destabilize his Government." In past weeks, this controversial politician has had to face half a million protesters in the capital city of Caracas who demand change in oil and land laws. The U.S. has engineered coups starting off with similar protests. Could Chavez be lying about his belief of U.S. involvement with the recent protests in his country, just to increase the anti-American sentiment and gain support from Venezuelans who view the U.S. as an imperialist bully?

This is a possibility, but it seems more likely that he is saying this to protect himself, so that if the U.S. planned, or knew about plans of his assassination, they would avert them to avoid international scrutiny if such an event occurred.

Perhaps Chavez's threat to stop exporting oil to the United States was meant to show that Venezuela could resist the U.S. juggernaut. This seems logical, but some say that it would be hurtful to Venezuela to stop selling oil to the U.S. because the U.S. is one of the major consumers of Venezuelan oil. Analysts like John Gage, a professor from the Australian National University, do not think Venezuela could afford to lose a customer like the U.S. Venezuela is seeking to sell oil to India, but refusing to sell oil to the U.S. would be hurtful to its economy in the long run.

It is amazing that the leader of one country could accuse another country of plotting to assassinate the leader of that one country, especially two countries that do business with each other.

Oil is definitely the golden currency of today's world. A lot of it is in the hands of struggling countries like Venezuela, or in countries that have very different ideas about society than we do, like Saudi Arabia. As the U.S. becomes increasingly dependent on foreign oil we must tread carefully in order to fulfill our energy needs for the future while not using our might unjustly. Our military strength cannot be our only diplomatic device.

A time will come when there will only be a few countries supplying oil to the entire world, and we have to start thinking about ways in which the resources can be shared fairly without so much bloodshed. We have to practice good diplomacy, and recognize the needs of other nations as well as our own, because the more we do this, the better we can all work together to achieve our mutual goals.

Oh, Jesus: dealing with the re-release of 'The Passion'

Thomas Naughton

It seems "no bunny knows Easter" better than an embattled Jesus movie and its crazy Church-building, anti-guy producer who has had a past penchant for parading around with other men in skirts. Just in time for the Lenten Fast, Mel Gibson is re-releasing his heavy-hitter of holy horridness, "The Passion of the Christ," and this round of crucifixion is "re-cut for new audiences."

I can imagine that the "new audiences" are actually the un-brainwashed demographic that Gibson is so interested in, and that "re-cut" actually means that some kind of gas is pumped into the theater to numb critical thought while the politics of the aforementioned director take over the mind like hundreds of kilted men with painted faces and fake accents.

According to popular belief, "every American should see this movie," and why would one argue? Our president is a religious fanatic, we're fighting a war that is steeped in "Our God vs. their god" undercurrents, and much of the country is convinced that they know exactly what God wants and whom God loves. America is a nation being dipped deeper and deeper into the dismal, drowning baptismal-waters of religious zeal and Gibson's "Passion" is a perfect example of this slow and scary submergence.

It seems the hand of evangelism's God is outstretched and reaching hard for any and all who resist it; in some way, shape or form, we are all going to be forced to see at least some part of this movie even if its only a 30 second trailer. However, if by some strange act of God or the President all Americans are required by law to see Gibson's film, be not afraid — I have devised some solutions to deal with the Easter re-release of "The Passion of the Christ."

Passionate Kisses

Recruit a friend or significant other to attend the movie with you. Throughout the entirety of the film, make out sloppily over a bucket between your seats. Participants who fill the bucket with saliva drippings before the conclusion of the movie will receive a small prize. (Extra credit will be awarded to gay male participants, as they are headed for Hell.)

The Porno of the Christ

Make friends with the projector guy at the theater and find a way to dub the sound from your favorite hardcore porn film over the "Passion" reel. Insist that you find it similar to the Pink Floyd "Dark Side of the Moon"/ "Wizard of Oz" phenomenon.

The Gassing of the Christ

Bring 10 of your lactose intolerant friends/acquaintances to the theater after a healthy trip to the local dairy farm. Make sure everyone has had enough ice cream, milk, ice milk, Alfredo sauce, cream in their coffee, cheese, cream cheese, cream-based soup and perhaps straight lactase enzyme.

Contraption of the Christ

Get to your local theater early. Remove all of the chairs from the theater and with the help of some toothless Carnies, set up a Tilt-a-Whirl facing the screen in place of the chairs. If patrons protest, stick the Carnies on them. If there's one thing fanatics are afraid of, it's Carnies. Insist that vomiting patrons on the Tilt-a-Whirl are possessed by the Devil and that Mel Gibson is saving them. Never wipe up vomit, its God's vomit. Repeat if desired.

The Dying Jesus Picture Show

Draft a live-action "Passion of the Christ" play to perform in tandem with the movie at the front of the theater a la "The Rocky Horror Picture Show." Encourage audience participation and heckling of your live action Jesus while he's being crucified (real blood gets extra points). Create dance numbers to your original Passion-inspired songs, which include "Hungry
Like the Last Supper", "Ouch, Being Nailed to a Cross Hurts", "P is for Pontius and It's Good Enough For Me", and my personal favorite, "Dirrty (Mary Magdalene Remix)".

Three-o-cifal

Construct crowns of thorns for every patron seeing "The Passion." Insist that if they really believe in Jesus and want to know what it was like during the last twelve hours of his life, they would have no problem having a crown of thorns smashed onto their heads. When they ask why you aren't wearing a crown remind them "It is better to give than to receive."

A Mixed Drink

On a popular "Passion" night for area churches, invite members of your local Church of Satan to view the film. Then invite local witchcraft covens, psychic friends and cannibals. Add sacramental wine. Stir well and frequently.

Obviously some of these options could get you into some trouble, so choose wisely. Always remind your detractors that when they persecute you, they are no better than the people who crucified Jesus, just because the Good Lord Gibson dropped 25 million dollars on this little art project doesn't mean we have to be willing participants. However, if we're all going to be evangelized, we may as well have fun before we loose our free will entirely.

Using the words we have

Craig Weinfuss

It's no secret: English speakers love their language. We take pride in this unique lexicological conglomeration. It has been said that English is the language that when in a dark alley pulls a knife on other languages and steals anything interesting in their pockets. It is a tough language, a survivor.

It has survived, along with the English themselves, the Norman Conquest and therefore the French influence, as well as the Latinate, Celtic and a host of others. Not only has it survived, but thrived from the stolen goods of each.

So I say, in the spirit of this long-standing take-no-prisoners tactic we put aside our social anxieties and use those sexy words we've had our eye on. That's right; don't deny it. I know about that diction reserve you have been hording in the back of your brain, those words that you want to use but haven't because they might sound awkward coming from your mouth, those words that may not fit your "style."

Everyone has them. It's no secret. But I say it's about time we throw our linguistic angst out the window. It's time we replace those dust-gathering clichés like "out the window" with a new phraseology of the exotic variety. Instead of the well-worn phrase "I'm daydreaming," why not "bathing in bullamaka" (which is an Australian term for an imaginary place.) Come on, it has a nice alliterative bubble to it, doesn't it?

If that's too extreme for your tastes, how about invoking the traditional English colloquialism "bloke" to replace the long dead-beat "dude"? Or perhaps resurrect extinct phrases, like the colorful term "elf-locks" for the ladies, perhaps? Used to describe the elfish mischief of Mercutio's Queen Mab, "This is that very Mab / That plats the manes of horses in the night, / And bakes the elflocks in foul sluttish hairs, / Which once untangled, much misfortune bodes." Certainly, we can use it to brighten up our slanderous gossip!

Everyone has them, it's no secret. But I say it's about time we throw our linguistic angst out the window. It's time we replace those dust-gathering clichés like, "out the window" with a new phraseology of the exotic variety.

I'm also tired of hearing all these compact, professional phrases. The news, CNN, FOX, Name Your Reporting Company, they are all bountiful sources for the mass production of these ready-to-consume phrases, with simply appalling flavor. Dare I mention the notorious "weapons of mass destruction," a phrase so overused that an acronym has been created and commonly understood: W.M.D. I won't even get started on "the war on terror" or Bush's State of the Union.

But this plague of the unoriginal has certainly struck closer to home. Look at the workplace! I hear my own father spew forth this ugly, misaligned, ready-for-business, and the worst of all: vague language: "We need to be first movers concerning efficient ETA (apparently, Expected Time of Arrival) from Dallas to D.C. to maintain big-hitter status." What's wrong with simply saying "We need to ship the boxes quickly from Dallas to Houston to be competitive with other businesses?" Isn't that easier to understand? Why purposefully make a difficult job more difficult?

Recently, I've been inspired by Mr. Robert Frost and the radical philosophies he proposed concerning language in his day. Simply put, he said the sentence is not merely 10 words thrown together but a tune, sung and harmonized by the everyday people. I then imagined the city as a forest with humans chirping their tunes in the grocery stores and outside markets.

So, if you haven't been paying a heedful vigilance to the wondrous sounds about trying to seduce your senses, give it a go. Attune your ear to the symphony of the language and pluck from it those words and phrases that tickle your fancy. I'll leave you with a contemplative note concerning the critical theory of Mr. Frost:

Art exists not in creating new variations (for that would place the artist outside of nature) but in listening for the tones that have not been stereotyped by literary expression; in collecting and arranging.

Men controlling contraception

S.J. Port

Every girl over the age of 16 seems to be on it. It's the one pill nobody puts in a box, a bowl or keeps in the bottle. It comes in a packet with 28 enclosed bubbles, one for each day of your cycle. Some kinds come in square pink cases, some in round lavender compacts. Some help your skin. Others regulate irregularity. Many kinds increase your cup size. Even more kinds increase your waistline or your pant size.

Congratulations boys, within 10 years you too will enjoy the responsibilities held within that pink compact of pills.

Women everywhere take a small pill full of estrogen and progesterone everyday, which plays with their hormones, their health and their budgets (to figure out how to afford the often uncovered prescription). Since the FDA's 1960 approval of oral contraception for woman, the chemical birth control revolution has spread through cities and small towns, villages and suburbia.

But what about men? Aren't they part of heterosexual sexual activity and heterosexual efforts to prevent pregnancy?

Only now, after 45 years, after the breakthrough medical discovery, pioneered by male doctors and women's suffragette workers like Margaret Sanger, is the international medical community closing in on a comparable product for men. And even now the debates about whether to go with a hormonal contraceptive being worked on by various national and international researchers or to go with a sperm blocking chemical brought to us by University of Massachusetts Worcester Medical and the Norwegian-based Spermatech splits the research funding, lengthening the waiting period.

Oral contraception revolutionized the way women live, love and reproduce by equalizing women and men through the chemical suppression of the female's fertility based vulnerability in order to weaken the gender barrier.

For men this was a revolution as well. Men began to see women as they had previously only seen their male peers: beings capable, willing and wanting of regular sexual activity, and not necessarily with a monogamous partner. Men could expect women to be more willing to engage in sexual activity before marriage, since the risk of pregnancy and public exposure of their so-called-sin was diminished. But with this, men all of kinds, also began to expect that women — all women — would be on birth control, and "take care of" the oldest risk factor involved in sex.

But the miracle pill is a double-edged sword. The other edge of the sword slices towards the actual day-to-day effects oral contraception had and continues to have on women. Yes, there have been tremendous and welcome social advancing effects, as well as scores of individually satisfied and enthusiastic women and men, but oral contraceptives have a dark side.

Guys, imagine if you were on the pill: being trapped into commitments due to supposedly accidental pregnancies would be much more difficult. Men, like women, will soon have some way to control the number of dependents under their roof or in the world.

The oral contraceptive revolution put women and girls on a vicious daily roller coaster of hormones causing both serious and frustrating routine side effects and health risks; laid further responsibility for preventing unplanned pregnancies on women, and put an additional financial strain on women (even to this day, the pill is often not covered by insurance, and even if it is the additional $5-40 a month is a pecuniary burden for all female patients).

After 45 years of oral contraception, why are women still bearing the day-to-day responsibility for controlling reproduction? The easy answer is that women carry the biological burden of the womb. The more difficult answer comes in pieces but can be summed up by saying that operation male birth control has become the ultimate challenge for scientists. Because women are already carrying the burden of birth control, it is harder to sell men on why they too should involve themselves. Men will be tougher customers than women were.

There are however those men in monogamous relationships who wish desperately that they and their girlfriends or wives had more options (either because they're partner is unable to use contraceptives for medical or religious reasons, refuses to or does not want to because of the side-effects). And there are those men who wish that they had the option to control their fertility because they don't trust their partner to do so. Guys, imagine if you were on the pill: being trapped into commitments due to supposedly accidental pregnancies would be much more difficult. Men, like women, will soon have some way to control the number of dependants under their roof or in the world.

Two hundred years ago Alexis de Tocqueville wrote, "In America, more than anywhere else in the world, care has been taken constantly to trace clearly distinct spheres of action for the two sexes, and both are required to keep in step, but along paths that are never the same." Limited to just condoms or vasectomies or abstinence, men still make up one third of contraceptive use in the United States, according to the Associated Press.

It is time society worked to give men who are taking steps to involve themselves in sphere of fertility decisions more options. It is time women asked men to be more involved. And it is time for male contraception to move beyond condoms to unbreakable chemical options. Women do not get pregnant or have children alone: contraception provides protection for both women and men. However it happens, hopefully the medical community will sooner rather than later bring us all back into the life cycle.

Flaws in Commission report

Barak Sered

The Commission on Campus Diversity's report finally came out last Tuesday, and while the report certainly raises many pertinent issues, like the descending percentage of minority students at the University of Massachusetts in recent years, the Commission's report is overall lacking in some very important areas.

"Re-define and restructure ALANA support programs."

This recommendation is particularly troubling because it does not assign a specific agent or process for the restructuring. The Diversity Commission refers to the foundational parameters of the ALANA support programs, and claims that the fact that these programs have expanded significantly beyond their mandate over the years is a sign of internal problems and instability.

I believe, however, that services that have had a chance to develop organically to serve the needs of a community and are sufficiently funded, would tend to provide a better service over a longer period of time than institutions that were created in a synthetic top-down approach. I believe we should be concerned that the restructuring of the ALANA support programs will occur without sufficient consultation with the staff and students who populate these programs

"Appoint a senior level administrator ... to coordinate all diversity and inclusion activities."

While the idea of a Vice Chancellor who is truly concerned with the experience of underrepresented groups of campus would be an appealing change, I fear that without mechanisms of accountability and transparency, this administrator's role would be purely symbolic.

The data that drives the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Diversity must be made open and available to all.

The results of policies implemented by this Vice Chancellor must likewise be made public. Equally as important, the Vice Chancellor must be made, in a substantive way, accountable to the constituency he or she is meant to serve. The Diversity Commission's report includes none of these parameters, and I see this as a serious shortcoming.

"Require all members of the campus' leadership community to develop plans to intensify and assess efforts to achieve an improved climate for enhancing diversity and inclusion within their areas of responsibility."

A blanket statement of this sort, urging all administrators to be cognizant of our campus' diversity, or lack thereof, is severely shortsighted. This commission was called in response to a tense racial climate and the increasing dissatisfaction within minority groups on campus, to recommend significant concrete policy changes. Instead, the Commission has treated its charge as the "first step in initiating a conversation." This first step alone has cost our campus upwards of $40,000.

The majority of the Diversity Commission's report is a regurgitated summery of the dozens of interviews that they conducted at open forums and in private. The administration would like to pretend that they did not know what the campus community wanted, and therefore could not be held accountable for not meeting our needs. So they charged a commission with the task of finding out what we, the students, faculty and employees of UMass want.

I suggest that instead of spending $40,000 to find out what anyone on campus knows to be true — that minorities overwhelmingly feel excluded here at UMass — the Chancellor and his colleagues could have used these resources to tackle some of the problems that have been raised again and again, head-on.

Another serious shortcoming in the Commission's report that I would like to highlight is the total absence of any discussion of class. People of color occupy the lowest socio-economic rungs in our state and country, and a discussion of the drop in minority enrollment at UMass over the last five years is rendered unenlightening without mention of the 50 percent tuition increase over the same time period. If we want UMass to be diverse, we must make it accessible to a diverse constituency.

On a final, and positive note, I would like to applaud the Commission for including in its recommendations the general assertion that "student voices should be valued and the integrity of student government and its agencies respected in the pursuit of diversity and inclusion goals."

I hope the UMass administration is ready to address the concerns expressed to the Commission, and follow through on their commitment to improve race relations and minority inclusion at UMass.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

TASERS NOT JUST FOR POLICE

It seems the most hotly debated issue on campus right now is TASERs. The UMass police force wants to be able to control unruly students during riots, and the planned acquisition and use of TASERs would certainly increase the police officers' safety, as well as minimize the damage that rubber bullets and pepper spray can cause. However, I feel that the major shortcoming in this plan is that it is unfair to students. By giving the police this new tool, the rights of students are being affronted.

Specifically, if police officers are given free rein to use TASERs to protect themselves from rioters, then it is only fair that students should be provided with, and trained to use, TASERs to protect themselves from rioters as well.

I'm sure there are many Southwest and Orchard Hill residents who, coming back to the dorm after an evening of studying at the library, are forced to confront a massive riot at their dorm complexes. Many times, it is difficult for these students even to reach the door of their building, for fear of drunken assault.

If the administration was truly concerned about the welfare of students, they would provide these students with TASERs, enabling them to reach their residence halls safely. This would prevent needless injuries and allow students not affiliated with the riots recourse in pursuing their academics without interruption.

POLLUTION AND ENERGY KEY ISSUES

The goal of cleaner energy is both obtainable and sustainable; it requires the use of renewable energy sources, such as the sun, wind and plants (biomass fuels). The level of air pollution is unsafe, costly and dirty. As a result, asthma is the number one cause for children receiving emergency room care and being sent home sick and missing school.

Our air is being polluted by 92 percent of our energy sources. Almost one third of carbon dioxide pollution, a leader in global warming, is created by burning fossil fuels, such as coal and oil, and from nuclear power plants. In Massachusetts, nuclear power accounts for three to five percent of the state's energy. There is no safe way to dispose of such toxic wastes that are mounting to 1.2 million pounds in Plymouth.

Our energy sources are temporary, with unpredictable lasting effects, which incur unnecessary costs to society and the environment. Encourage your local legislatures to work for the passage of the Energy Efficiency Standards Bill in Massachusetts Congress. This bill would make 17 common appliances more energy efficient, which will save the state two billion dollars by 2030, an annual reduction of 1400 metric tons of pollutants like soot, smog and carbon dioxide.

MTV UNDER FIRE FOR DEPICTION OF TEENS

Does MTV affect the way you look at life?

MTV is charged with giving too much of the mainstream perspective. The report goes on to say that by overplaying the same music, MTV aired bands seem to be 'loosing their luster.'

"It is a self-serving argument to say that this research is done to basically serve teens. It's done to better manipulate teens."
–Robert McChesney

Scholars and media critics scrutinize the network in latest report

By Lenny Castaneda
The Daily Aztec

SAN DIEGO — Today, many young Americans are sucked in like tractor beams by MTV's reality shows and TV series.

Dick Sirulnick, MTV executive vice president for news and production, stated MTV does its best to connect with viewers by reflecting their lives, "hopefully accurately," according to a 2001 PBS Frontline report called, "Merchants of Cool."

Viewers are taken to places they may not normally go when MTV airs a show like the documentary series "True Life," which focuses on the lives of young adults. The show allows viewers to see what people completely different than themselves are doing, Sirulnick said on PBS Frontline.

Tim Powell, San Diego State assistant professor for the school of theatre, television and film, said MTV opened the doors for reality television such as "Survivor" and "The Bachelor."

Powell said MTV shows are skewed toward a specific audience, and the reason viewers are so interested is because the content aired is related to what viewers are currently experiencing in their own lives.

Brian Graden, president of MTV programming, stated in the report, he uses focus groups consisting of 12 trend setting kids that discuss emerging trends with a mediator.

Robert McChesney, research professor in the Institute of Communications Research at the University of Illinois, stated in the report that focus groups are used to find out what teens want so the most money as possible can be made off of them.

"It is a self-serving argument to say that this research is done to basically serve teens," McChesney, who is also a media critic and author of Rich Media, Poor Democracy: Communication Politics in Dubious Times, stated on the Web site, www.PBS.org. "It's done to better manipulate teens."

In the report, he stated entertainment companies are like the British or French Empires in the 19th century and teens are their colonial Africa. The companies' weaponry includes films, music, books, CDs, Internet access, clothing, amusement parks and sports teams. Powell said any reality show with celebrities is interesting to people. Whoever is "hot" at the time, such as Jessica Simpson, will bring viewers to the show.

"Everybody wants to see what celebrities do in real life," he said, "and they think that this is the celebrity's real life.

"But when you have 10 camera crews in a house, the production company rented for the show, it's hard to get a feeling of real life."

He said there is not a true sense of real life for reality shows, however, there are real character elements, such as the way Jessica Simpson mindlessly responds to common knowledge.

Heather Ward, assistant professor for the school of communication at SDSU, said the people who watch MTV are only getting the mainstream prospective, which overplays music so that it loses its luster.

She said this pool of media eagerness jumps on the "band wagon" of what's "cool," by catering to the lowest common denominator to whatever gets eyes to watch.

"Similar to Bandura's Social Cognitive Learning Theory, people look at their environment, then they look at the media and identify with it — mimicking what they see on television," Ward said.

Ward said teenagers are because their peers have a tremendous influence on them.

MTV has ways to capture someone's attention to watch its shows, she said. It could be the way a show is edited with the combination of music and narrative that takes hold of a teen's — at times limited — attention span.

Public relations junior Nicole Buono said reality shows on MTV such as "My Super Sweet 16"are stupid.

It is not entertaining to watch a rich and spoiled girl celebrate her 16th birthday, she said.

"It's worthless television — what happened to the music?" she said.

Communication junior, Alli Paris said she thought the MTV's reality show "The Real World" was "cool" to watch — when it was the only one. She said the same concept of filming "reality" is redundant, because it is on every television network.

Paris said she now thinks the show is nothing but a "drunken-orgy."

El Pus fuses rap and rock on debut album 'Hoodlum'

By Nathan Rothstein
Collegian Staff

Atlanta is home to the Braves, Outkast, Ludacris and El Pus. El Pus? Are you spelling Hawks wrong?

No kids, El Pus is the newest rap/rock fusion group to hit America. Coming from the N.E.R.D. school of thought and kicking Linkin' Park back to the kiddy school, El Pus comes hard with style. On their debut release, Hoodlum Rock: Volume 1," they are rough, rugged and out of place, but they sound first-class. Good enough for Speech from Arrested Development to discover them in the Atlanta musical circuit, El Pus is about to "rip it up."

El Pus
'Hoodlum Rock: Volume 1'
Virgin Records

Forming into a band in the late 90s, El Pus draws influence from old-school gansta rappers N.W.A. and classic rockers like Led Zeppelin. Their live show promises to be just as energetic, as the group has witnessed incidents ranging from noise violations to marriage proposals.

On their first track, "Monday Morning," the group makes a song to show what they are all about. It isn't about politics, or the welfare of the nation, or the changing the world economy. No, it is about partying. They actually will be partying until Monday morning.

Though they may be dabbling in a topic that has already been touched upon, El Pus is doing something a little different — they are having fun, and that counts for something. Their lyrics are goofy, "I ain't freaky like R. Kelly, but I will put a mask on;" silly, "Girl you gotta, and you girl you so hotta;" and outright crazy, "I got some chickens in the coupe, they down for getting it on." Mixed together, and supplemented by hard guitar riffs, loud drum beats, and DJ cuts, everything comes together in perfect harmony.

You may have wondered where the two minute rock track went, and now its back. The album is just over 30 minutes, provoking the listener to put it in the CD player again, and spend another half hour with these hooligans. If that is not an option, and you want to get back to your old school Outkast or N.E.R.D. album, make sure to spend some time with the following songs.

"Girl" is another playful number that expresses their interest in the opposite sex, with a middle-school type fascination. On the next track, "Days of the BK's (I Remember)," they turn back the clock to a time of "kids hitting switches at stop lights." After hearing this ballad, you would think they would stop over at TRL for a meet and greet with the pre-teens, but then they get hard again. On "Madame Zenobia," El Pus gets everything right.

Their debut album might make Pharell quit hanging out with Snoop and take the next jet eye to Atlanta for a studio session with the city's new sensation, El Pus.

Halle Berry collaborates with Oprah on new TV movie

COURTESY LIONEL HAHN

By Tom Jicha
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

Only Oprah Winfrey would dare call an actress the morning after she won an Oscar and ask her to star in a TV movie, which is what she did with Halle Berry. Only Oprah would get an immediate yes. And only Oprah would wind up doing the star as big a favor as the one she asked.

Berry was still reveling in the afterglow of the Academy Award for "Monster's Ball" when Oprah made a pitch to recruit her for "Their Eyes Were Watching God," or, as it's known on ABC, "Oprah Winfrey Presents Their Eyes Were Watching God."

"I was a little nervous because of when I called," Winfrey said. "Halle and I are friends and I really hate imposing on friends. I didn't know whether she was going to be like, 'Now I have an Oscar. I'm sorry. I can't talk to you.' No, she's too sweet to do that. But I didn't know whether or not she would be interested in doing television."

Some imposition. Oscar notwithstanding, Janie, the free-spirited, independent-minded heroine of the adaptation of Zora Neale Hurston's novel set in early 20th century Central Florida, is one of those roles of a lifetime. Berry gets to use every color and shading on her acting palette playing a liberated young black woman who defies the convention of her time in taking control of her life and loves.

It's a demanding role, which calls for Berry to appear in almost every scene of the two hour presentation and age more than 20 years as she shares her joys and heartaches with three distinctly different men. Berry is up to the challenge, movingly conveying innocence and sensuousness, vulnerability and duplicitousness. It will take a mighty turn from someone else to deny her a second Emmy to go with the one she won for Introducing Dorothy Dandridge.

The pitch wasn't a cold call from Winfrey. The two had first discussed Hurston's book 12 years previously when Berry was a guest on the host's daytime talk show. "Their Eyes Were Watching God" is second only to "The Color Purple" among her all-time favorites, Winfrey said. "It's really important for us to see black people, African-Americans, in a life that allows not only the history and legacy of the culture, but to show love. That's often not seen in a way people can relate to."

The only reason "Their Eyes Were Watching God" didn't become one of her book club selections, Winfrey said, is because adapting it as a movie was always in the back of her mind. "I never wanted to have any kind of discussion about why I really chose it."

Wanting to share the pleasure with Berry, Winfrey had a gift copy for her. "Take this and read it," Winfrey recalls telling Berry. "You are Janie."

The gesture was unnecessary. Berry had read the book in high school and loved it as much as Winfrey did.

When Winfrey finally called with the movie offer, it didn't faze Berry that it was going to be for TV.

"I look for things that inspire me and are different," Berry said. "(Janie) is a fully realized character, who starts in one place and has this amazing journey. She ends up really discovering what life and love are about. Love is really about loving self first, then all the other love from other avenues seems to come your way."

Winfrey found the same things in the novel. "Janie, to me, represents awareness of self and becoming a whole person, proud of being a whole, full person. I used to be one of those women afraid of being full of herself. Even in elementary school, people would say, 'She's so full of herself.' So I grew up afraid of being full of myself, because other people, who are not as inspired or are jealous or who don't want to be their full selves, try to tear you down. So it took me a while to get to the point that I was comfortable being full of myself."

"So many people who have read the book came up to me on the street in the last three months and told me, 'You better not mess this book up. I love her. This better be good."

They have nothing to worry about.

Rockers open School of Song Writing

By Bryan Brown
The Parthenon

HUNTINGTON, W.Va. — Are you currently a struggling musician hoping to strike it gold with your first big single? Have you been plagued with writer's block coming up with lyrics to go with an awesome guitar riff you composed after an all night binge of Jose Cuervo? Now you can breathe easy because two of Rock and Roll's greatest pioneers have recently opened up The School of Song Writing in Anaheim, Calif. Chad Kroeger, lead singer of Nickelback, and Chester Bennington, the rock portion of Linkin Park, have decided to lend their considerable talent in helping you succeed.

"I always envisioned opening up a school like this back in the early days," Kroeger said. "I just don't think it's fair that the average Joe doesn't get a chance to shine. Everyone, despite their lack of talent, has it within themselves to make it big."

Although Kroeger had entertained the notion of a songwriting school for many years, he did not actively pursue it until one night when he was writing a new song about having sex with one of his groupies for his group's upcoming album.

"I knew right then that the school was something I had to do," Kroeger said. "So I picked up the phone and called my buddy Chester, and we got the ball rolling."

Bennington, whose band Linkin Park topped charts in 2001 with the album Hybrid Theory, and again in 2003 with Meteora, was immediately on board.

"I see so many musicians falling into the same creative traps," Bennington said. "For example, you have to write for a specific audience. And if you're in your 20s, it's really difficult to grow an audience of your peers because so many of them are off doing unique things and having unique experiences. If you're going to play any kind of hard rock and be successful nowadays, it's got to appeal to teenagers. And how do you do that? You make your lyrics as vague and relatable as possible. Take the chorus for 'One Step Closer' for example. It took me forever to come up with those lines, but when I finally nailed them down, I felt like I had really done something great."

Kroeger and Bennington will not only address songwriting concerns, but many others common to up-and-coming musicians.

"We're not just going to teach you how to write a top single, but what to do after you have. We're going to immerse the student into the complete contemporary Hard Rock lifestyle," Kroeger said. "For that we're going to enlist the help of a lot of our friends in the business."

Among those friends is Scott Stapp, formerly of Creed, who will handle proper posing techniques for students as they shoot the video for their debut single. Fred Durst, of Limp Bizkit, will handle wardrobe and image concerns. Aaron Lewis of Staind will be responsible for keeping students focused on what inspires them.

"This project is really something I'm proud to be a part of," Lewis said. "Of course, my father probably wouldn't think so. He'd just crush a beer can on my head and tell me what a loser I was."

Although the school is based out of Anaheim, Lewis will spend most of his time teaching in a satellite school in his hometown of Boston.

"Boston has always felt like a kindred spirit when I'm writing new songs. Where else in the world will you find a city of half a million people that whine about the same thing over and over again, for years and years?"

Spaces in the school of songwriting are booked for the next six months, so interested musicians are encouraged to complete an online application and be placed on a waiting list.

"It'll be an experience you'll never forget," Bennington said.

quartet of sophomores to pick up the slack this year with Brian Iacovino, Brett Garber, Pat Larmon and Andrew Recchione leading the way. All four player received ample playing time last year as a number of injuries decimated the offensive lineup.

The four sophomores already have six goals between them for the season, with Iacovino and Garber scoring two apiece and Larmon and Recchione with one.

Adding to an already athletic attack will be the return of Jeff Zywicki who was injured for most of last year. Zywicki has five goals and two assists thus far for UMass, good for second on the team in points. Cannella mentioned that Zywicki is the type of player, "you expect that kind of production from."

Junior midfielder Dane Collins will be the primary face-off man this year for the Maroon and White. Collins has gone 14-for-30 this year. Collins was extremely efficient last season for the Minutemen, grabbing 125-of-245, for a .510 percentage.

KAREN WINCKLER/COLLEGIAN

Senior attackman Gene Tundo has paced the UMass offense so far this year. He recorded three assists against Yale on Saturday.

UMass also sports a brother combination in Bret Caretsky, a junior transfer from Maryland, and freshman P.J. Caretsky. Both Caretsky brothers play on attack and add some athletic depth to the Minutemen's offense.

"It's always good to have brothers on the team. They are both really good kids, Bret brings a little more experience coming in as a junior and has done a good job in practice." Cannella said. "P.J. is a hard worker and more of a heady player out there. They really fit in well with the team and the university."

Freshmen Evan Blum, Rory Pedrick, Fred Fedirico and Paul Manesis will all compete for time during the season. Cannella mentioned that this freshman class is, "full of extraordinary athletes."

Defense

Although Reid and co-captain Garcia will be the focal points of the Minutemen's defense this year, UMass has an array of size and athleticism that will be holding down the backfield.

The Minutemen have allowed a mere 6.50 goals per game this year, and have given up only one goal in seven man-down situations. Cannella is hoping that the overabundance of experience on defense will push the unit throughout the season.

"We have some experience there, so we're trusting our guys to work on a team defensive match-up and support each other a little bit more, especially around the cage on the Inside," Cannella said.

UMass has a total of five seniors bolstering its defense, with Reid, Garcia, Aaron Paskalis, Greg Scott and Rich Guyre. Canella has been stressing patience among this group as he knows they tend to get passionate and sometimes lose focus in the heat of the moment.

Reid was an aggressive force last year for the Maroon and White, picking up 53 ground balls in only 13 games. Garcia missed three games last season with an ankle sprain but was still able to contribute. He was selected as an All-American after the 2003 campaign.

Another positive for the Minutemen has been the sizable Paskalis who saw action in all 14 games last year. Paskalis transferred to UMass from Army before his junior year and has proven to be a powerful athlete in front of the cage. His strength is unparalleled on the team as his 405-pound bench-press leads the squad.

Helping the intimidation factor of Paskalis is 225-pound Guyre. Guyre and Paskalis weigh in at a combined 450 pounds, offering a intimidating balance to the defense. Cannella sees both as outstanding defenders, but wants everyone on the team to carry an air of intimidation.

"I think when you're big you intimidate people just by looks, but everybody needs to be tougher, that's something we stress," Cannella said.

Freshman Brian Danvers has been a pleasant surprise thus far for the Minutemen. He and classmate Sean Kryger add depth to this very experienced line.

Goalies

There is only room for one man between the pipes, and luckily for the Minutemen they have two worthy candidates.

Four-year starter and co-captain Bill Schell has been an important cog in the UMass defense and is poised to start for most of the season. He will be offered a challenge by sophomore Efosa Guobodia, who has impressed coaches with his improvement in the offseason.

Cannella has been pleased with the way both keepers have come along and is looking towards Schell to impose his leadership over the defense.

"Bill (Schell) has been doing really well in the preseason here and in scrimmages and practices. Guobodia has been really good in there as well," Cannella said. "Bill is great because he has a wealth of experience. He's been through it all, so we expect him to be a rock and a leader for us on that side of the ball."

Since Guobodia has proven to be an adequate goalie last year and in the offseason, Cannella is in a situation where he has two keepers ready at all times. However, Cannella is hoping that Schell can continue to improve and anchor an already powerful defense.

"It's good that we have that kind of competition there and I think Efosa is very capable, but Billy is a four-year starter," Cannella said. "You have to go with the experience, but I'm glad that either of these guys can step up for us this year."

Sophomore Dan Whipple has done a solid job on a defense that has caused huge problems for the opposition through two games this season.

Meyer turning heads as the anti-Zook

By David Whitley
Knight Ridder

ORLANDO, Fla. — Urban Meyer made his first big appearance in Orlando on Monday, and Florida fans came hungry. Not just for lunch, but for reassurance.

Let's just say Meyer was much more satisfying than the salad.

The guy knows how to work a room. He also knows how to work a campus and a state.

Whether that means happy days are back in Gainesville, check back in 10 months.

But the 500 people at the Florida Citrus Sports luncheon had to feel good after their Urban appetizer.

He is a breath of confident air for a program that needed it. Meyer is, aww, let's go ahead and say it, the anti-Zook.

It's not polite to speak ill of the dearly departed, but the differences go to the core of what went wrong before and what's going right now. Ron Zook's heart was in the right place, but his insecurities wouldn't let him succeed.

He couldn't handle the spotlight and second-guessing that goes with the Florida job.

If Zook had spilled tea on himself Monday, he would have thought an FSU waiter gave him a trick glass. Meyer would have laughed at himself.

He is currently taking a crash course in Gatordom.

Meyer has contacted old coaches and players, asking them to come around and feel at home.

One of his first calls was to an ex-quarterback who recently got a job in South Carolina.

Instead of feeling threatened by the Specter of Spurrier, Meyer has welcomed it.

He also plans to visit every fraternity house to get a feel for campus life. Zook made only one visit to frat row, which was one too many.

His Us-vs.-the-World mentality kicked in with the Pi Kappa Phis, though the shouting match showed why players liked him. He had their backs, only in a frathouse kind of way.

Meyer doesn't need his players to like him.

Good ones want discipline, and they're getting it with 6 a.m. mat drills and weightlifting sessions that work on their brains as much as the muscles.

"You don't do it just to do it," Meyer said.

When one player fails, his entire unit runs or lifts extra. If discipline were all it took, of course, Army would never lose. It comes down to players, and Meyer plans to meet or call every high school coach in Florida. All 493 of them.

That's one reason he was in Orlando, speaking Saturday at a coaching clinic.

On Sunday, he took his family to Islands of Adventure. It was his first day off since taking the job.

The Gator gear was back Monday, and Meyer smoothly handled two speaking engagements. After three years in sound bite purgatory, no TV interviews had to be stopped because the coach was hyperventilating.

Meyer comes off as a 40-year-old who's always had a master plan. He's so sure of himself, you're tempted to hit the Cynical Alarm. It's one thing to be smooth and another to be slick. Only Meyer doesn't cross the line.

He'll give you an opinion and not worry about the diplomatic fallout ("The BCS is a failure"). And his orange-and-blue talk sounds sincere. As much as Meyer loved Sunday at Universal, he hated missing Florida's basketball victory against Kentucky.

He's been meeting with campus leaders and is asking that all students learn Florida's fight song. He wants everybody to sing it after home games.

That includes the coach, though he admits he would never have been hired for his singing voice.

"It's horrible," Meyer said.

If confidence matters, he'll sound like Pavarotti by September.

Championship Week is sure to excite

By Armando Salguero
Knight Ridder

MIAMI — Championship Week is here, which means 26 conferences from the Northeast to the Southland, from the Western Athletic to the Big East, will decide their tournament champions by Sunday.

That's Selection Sunday to fellow devotees of bracketology and RPI ratings.

By Sunday, evening the field for The Dance will be set. Top seeds will be established, and folks from the Palm Beaches to the Keys, interns to investment lawyers, will begin wading into their office NCAA pools.

Everyone becomes a college basketball expert this time of year; everyone thinks they can spot this year's Cinderella even though they haven't watched a game all season.

That's because these folks who didn't care about college basketball when the season began in November understand it is March now, and the inevitable is about to happen.

They will soon contract the Madness.

College basketball changes everything in the sports world starting this week.

It's a time when Pacific is not only an ocean but a mid-major team with a real shot at the Sweet 16. It's a time when the Davidson Wildcats share the stage with the Kentucky Wildcats.

Starting this week, you will root for people you never knew were on the planet. You will watch Coppin State out of the MEAC and wish them luck, not because their coach's name is Fang Mitchell, and you have root for a guy who answers to Fang, but because earlier this season, Mitchell had a tumor removed from his thyroid area yet valiantly continued to point his team toward success.

The Freakish

Championship Week lets us see the fantastic and the freakish.

We will see Louisville guard Taquan Dean, whose game has actually improved since he learned he has mononucleosis.

Off the court, Dean has shown understandable signs of fatigue, which is why teammate and roommate Francisco Garcia says Dean, "is always going to bed early."

During timeouts, coach Rick Pitino jokes, "He's not contagious, but we just stay far away from him anyway."

But that hasn't stopped Dean from linding his three-point stroke and leading the Cardinals in that department since learning he had the disease two weeks ago.

No Computers

Championship Week and the tournament that follows is about what is right in college athletics today.

Neither computers nor pollsters decide this championship, it will be won by athletes in head-to-head competition. And that gives teams that can win it all no advantage over teams that are happy to be part of it all.

Championship Week also offers a villain. As with all great theater, you can satisfy your sensibilities when the unfriendly, pompous, boor gets his comeuppance.

Two games in, Minutemen showing serious potential on lacrosse field

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

For most teams, a 7-7 season indicates transition, rebuilding and brings up the intimidating question of, "what happens next?" For the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, last year's 7-7 record is nothing more than a fading unsavory memory fueling a team that is already turning heads.

Over the first two games of this season, the Minutemen have gone 2-0 with wins over Hofstra on Feb. 26 and Yale on Saturday. UMass has outscored its opponents 24-13 thus far and is riding the talents of its four Preseason All-Americans who mesh well with the team-oriented concepts that head coach Greg Cannella has imposed on his squad.

The Minutemen have two Preseason All-Americans anchoring the defense in Jack Reid and Matt Garcia, while attackman Sean Morris and midfielder Chris Doyle hold the honor on offense. Cannella cares little for any honors given before the season and is quick to mention that the awards mean nothing until it is all said and done in May.

"I always tell my guys that nothing means anything in the preseason, no ranking, no preseason honors, it's all fluff, and we don't need to pay attention to that," Cannella said. "When you read about yourself, and everyone is telling you about how good you are, you forget about how hard you need to work to be good."

The Minutemen will try and continue their winning ways today at Harvard for a 3 p.m. face-off. UMass lost to the Crimson last year on March 13 at Garber Field, for its second loss of the year.

Offense

Although the Minutemen had a lackluster record, the overall offensive output was a positive coming out of last season. UMass averaged 9.92 goals per game, while giving up 8.29. This season, however, the Maroon and White have lost several offensive options with the graduation of Kevin Glenz and Neil Lundberg. Lundberg and Glenz combined for 55 points last season. Glenz had 30 points and was tied with Doyle for the most on the team while Lundberg followed with 25.

KAREN WINCZEWSKI/COLLEGIAN

Midfielder Chris Doyle is one of four Preseason All-Americans for UMass.

Co-captain Doyle will be pacing a young, athletic UMass offense this season complemented by fellow Preseason All-American Morris and senior Gene Tundo. Tundo already has two goals on the year on two shots, and has also contributed with four assists.

Morris had seven goals and 17 assists during his sophomore campaign for the Minutemen while playing in only 10 of UMass' 14 games due to injuries and sickness.

"He's been healthy, and we need to keep him healthy, that will be the key to Sean," Cannella said. "He's been an outstanding player the last few years, but he hasn't been healthy."

Morris has scored seven goals thus far this season, with four against Hofstra and a hat trick against Yale. He was awarded the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week for his performance against the Bulldogs and was named the ECAC Offensive Player of the Week after the Minutemen's game at Hofstra.

Cannella is pleased with Morris' performance thus far, but doesn't want the emphasis to always be on him. He believes that depth in the midfield needs to mesh with an athletic attack in order for the Minutemen to have success in the long run.

"We have about eight midfielders that we can play on the offensive end. These are guys that played a little bit for us last year and have some experience so I think we're well-balanced. I don't really think that we're one-dimensional," Cannella said. "People talk about Sean, but I want to talk about the whole group that we know can contribute."

The Minutemen will look towards a

March is also a month for hockey

Jeff Howe

March Madness shouldn't just be reserved for basketball, not in the top-right corner of the United States map, anyway.

While bubbles are being popped, Cinderella's start checking into shoe sizes and buzzer beaters are making the top stories on SportsCenter, the double-overtime ice wars, the goalies who carry their teams on their shoulders and the Hobey Baker candidates who start sniping out top corners are all part of NCAA hockey that is rarely more than an afterthought during this time of year.

Half of New England's states will be hosting quarterfinal action of Hockey East this weekend, beginning on Thursday night in Durham, N.H., where sixth-seeded Northeastern will meet up with third-seed UNH, and concluding on Sunday if any of the four series reach that far.

But the madness in the year's third month doesn't just begin this weekend; it actually started last weekend, when all eight playoff teams had zero idea of what seed they would finish in, or who they will play once hockey's second season finally kicks off.

There seemed to be enough playoff scenarios heading into the final weekend of regular season action to fill every seat at the FleetCenter, which will host the semifinals on March 18 and the Hockey East Championship the following night.

New Hampshire headed into last weekend with a one-point advantage over Boston College but couldn't hang on as the Wildcats could only manage a single point in their two-game set with Boston University.

The Eagles leapt over UNH by collecting three of a possible four points in two home games against Maine, but it was that third point that created the biggest stir of the weekend.

Down 2-0 to the Black Bears with under 15 minutes to play in regulation, the Eagles rallied for a pair of third period scores to force overtime and eventually earn the tie to lock up their third regular season Hockey East Championship in a row.

Had Peter Harrold not scored his fourth goal of the season with a measly 16 seconds left on the clock, Boston College would have shared the regular season title with cross-town rival Boston University and the Wildcats of Lake Whitt, though the playoff seedings would have remained the same as BC won the tiebreaker with both schools anyway.

Coupled with Lowell's 5-1 victory over Merrimack on Thursday, Northeastern's 2-1 loss to UMass on Friday locked Lowell into the five-seed and NU into the six-seed before their respective finales on Saturday.

In one of the bigger surprises of the season, Providence went to the Tsongas Arena in Lowell on Saturday and came out as 3-2 victors in overtime. Just like Maine, the Friars blew a 2-0 advantage, and Lowell sent the game into the extra frame with Ben Walter's 26th goal of the season as the clock dipped below the five-minute mark of the third period.

Unlike Maine, however, Providence capitalized in overtime to capture the seventh seed in the playoffs due to UMass' 8-3 collapse at the hands of the Huskies.

Though the game was meaningless in the Hockey East standings for the Riverhawks, the loss to the Friars almost certainly dropped them out of contention for an at-large bid for the NCAA Tournament, meaning their only way into hockey's big dance — excuse me, 16-team shindig — would be by doing a few laps around the FleetCenter with the Lamoriello Trophy next Saturday night.

So after the regular weekend full of playoff atmosphere concluded and the ice settled, BC is set to host UMass, BU will welcome Providence, UNH has a date with Northeastern and Maine will open Alfond Arena's doors for Lowell, all for best two-out-of-three series and a right to play where the Boston Bruins can't.

On that note, it's time to drop your basketballs and pick up some skates, because if it's playoff hockey that you love and last weekend was merely a pregame skate around, then Hockey East action is heating up, or if you like pans, getting ice cold.

A-10 honors UM athletes

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Three members of the Massachusetts women's basketball team received All-Conference honors on Thursday at the Atlantic 10 Championship awards banquet in Washington, D.C.

Brooke Campbell was named a third-team All-Conference selection and was also an All-Defensive team selection. The senior forward was fourth in the A-10 in both rebounds (8.4 pg) and steals (1.22 pg). She also averaged 8.2 points and 3.63 assists.

Campbell, the team's only senior in the starting lineup, provided leadership for the young team late in the season. She played her best basketball down the stretch, when some of her inexperienced teammates struggled; averaging 11.3 points, 8.6 rebounds, 4.6 assists, and 3.1 steals in February.

"I think it was great for Brooke to get these honors," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "Even more than the third-team [selection], was her being on the All-Defensive team. She really worked hard on her defense, and she did a great job rebounding. It's a tremendous honor to be one of the five best defensive players in the conference."

Freshmen Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills were named to the All-Rookie team. Rosanio led UMass in scoring (11.1 pg) and was the second-highest scorer among league freshmen. Mills broke into the starting lineup late in the season and averaged 10.0 points in the last seven games of the regular season.

"They're great kids to coach," Dacko said. "They have good work habits. Both of them are just terrific people, both on and off the basketball court. They're really the ones that are going to set the future in my tenure at UMass to build a program. They're the foundation of this program."

Temple's regular season dominance continued over into the postseason awards. The Owls (27-3, 16-0 A-10) completed the conference schedule undefeated and went on to capture the A-10 Tournament Championship on Monday against host George Washington. The No. 16 Owls are on a 24-game winning streak, the second longest in the nation.

Leading the Temple recipients was conference Player of the Year Candice Dupree. The junior center was fourth in the league in scoring (16.0 pg) and led in rebounding (9.2 pg). Dupree was also named Defensive Player of the Year and was a first-team All-Conference selection. Dupree garnered her second consecutive Most Outstanding Player Award of the A-10 Championship on Monday.

Dupree was joined on the first team by teammate Cynthia Jordan. Jordan led the Owls with 4.3 assists per game and was third on the team with 12.4 points per game.

Rounding out the Temple players to be honored was Kamesha Hairston. The sophomore forward was named the league's Most Improved Player of the Year, as she increased her scoring from 4.4 points per game in her freshman year to 12.7 this year. Hairston was also named to the All-Defensive Team and was a second-team All-Conference selection.

The Coach of the Year selection was no surprise, as Temple's Dawn Staley collected the award for the second year in a row. Staley has compiled an impressive 101-50 record in her five years at Temple and has led the Owls to three of the last four A-10 Championships.

Staley is perhaps better known for her playing career, as she has won three gold medals as a member of the USA Olympic team and continues her All-Star career for the Charlotte Sting in the WNBA during the summer.

Woods and Mickelson draw huge crowd

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

The showdown between Tiger Woods and Phil Mickelson at Doral captured the largest television audience for a golf tournament since the U.S. Open.

It included a certain Ryder Cup captain who only recognized the faces.

"I watched it from start to finish," Hal Sutton said Tuesday. "What part of my body wouldn't say, 'Where was this in September?' We all knew both were capable of that. I don't know why they didn't do it together."

Six months ago at Oakland Hills was the only time Woods and Mickelson were partners, not rivals, although it was hard to tell the difference. They stood some 20 yards apart on the first tee for the opening game at the Ryder Cup and kept their distance while losing their first two matches.

As rivals at Doral, they were brilliant.

Both made 27 birdies over four rounds on the Blue Monster.

Woods took the lead with an eagle on the 603-yard 12th hole when he hit a 3-wood that carried 290 yards. Mickelson fired back with back-to-back birdies, starting with a 3-iron from 242 yards to within 8 feet. Back and forth they went before a delirious and evenly divided gallery.

Both players deny their relationship is icy at best. Mickelson said the partnership at Oakland Hills was "not uncomfortable at all," but it might have looked that way because they played poorly. Woods said their relationship was overanalyzed. Johnny Miller finally chimed in, "It'd be great if these guys answered the questions."

They certainly can answer some questions in the next month.

This renewed rivalry is at a crossroads heading into the first major championship of the year.

Mickelson was so sure he was going to win that some might wonder how much the loss takes out of him. He all but deified Woods on the eve of the final round, then got a gleam in his eye as he talked about how much he was looking forward to taking him on.

As well as Mickelson played, the difference at Doral came down to him missing short putts down the stretch, something that has haunted him throughout his career. He called the loss a "great slap in the face," and said it would only make him work harder for their next battle, the sooner the better.

What to make of Woods?

The big picture is that he shot 63-66 to rally from five shots down against the hottest player in golf. Woods still hits shots no one else can. He was 44 yards longer than Mickelson on one tee shot, and Woods was a combined 330 yards longer than Mickelson on every tee shot but the par 3s.

He made clutch putts, as always, none bigger than the 30-foot birdie that gave him the lead on the 17th.

Still, Woods has not exactly slammed the door in his last two victories.

Last month at Torrey Pines, he boldly went for the par-5 18th green with only a one-shot lead, fanned a 2-iron and was fortunate it didn't go in the water. At Doral, with a chance to apply enormous pressure, Woods came out of a 7-iron and left himself a downhill putt from 55 feet.

There are times when Woods takes a half-dozen repeated practice swings on the tee, still trying to drill into his mind the mechanics of his new swing.

Woods has had a revolving door of rivals for the last six years, although this one is unrivaled.

Vijay Singh has performed better as a rival. He is the only player who has approached Woods' dominance in the last 10 years, and he took the No. 1 ranking away from him in a head-to-head battle outside Boston last year. Woods and Singh aren't chums, but the big Fijian is not a threat to take away Woods' adulation from the fans.

Mickelson is.

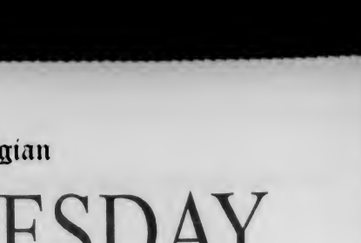
Ernie Els and Woods make the most natural rivalry. The Big Easy has finished second to Woods six times, more than any other player, and eight of his 15 victories on the PGA Tour have come with Woods in the field. But it is difficult for Woods to work up any animosity inside the ropes because Els is universally liked and respected.

That's not the case with Mickelson.

Woods' emotions at Doral spoke volumes about this rivalry. While it was a dramatic duel, there was one even better five years ago at Kapalua, where Woods and Els were Nos. 1 and 2 in the world and tied for the lead going into the final round of the Mercedes Championships.

The lead changed seven times, and no one ever led by more than one shot. Both made an eagle on the last hole to force a playoff. Both made birdie on the 18th to extend it. Woods finally won with a 40-foot birdie putt that had 6 feet of break, then he watched as Els' birdie putt from 35 feet stopped an inch short of the cup.

Woods was thrilled that afternoon on Maui.



He was relieved Sunday in Miami.

There was an uppercut fist pump when Woods made the eagle on No. 12. He pursed his lips and firmly squeezed the bill of his cap to acknowledge the masses as he walked briskly off the 17th green with a one-shot lead.

When Mickelson's 30-foot chip for birdie dipped in and out of the cup on the 18th, his reaction contained as much raw emotion as his 13-inch vertical leap when he captured the Masters.

Clearly, this was a battle both players desperately wanted to win.

How they respond could shape the season.

PATRICK FARRELL/MIAMI HERALD

Tiger Woods celebrates with his routine fist-pump after sinking his par putt on the 18th hole to win at Doral on Sunday.

PATRICK FARRELL/MIAMI HERALD

Police search Puffton, seize two pounds of high-grade marijuana

NORTH AMHERST — A drug bust in the Puffton Village apartment complex on Saturday resulted in the arrest of two University of Massachusetts students on drug possession and distribution charges, according to Amherst Police.

Christopher Masure, 22 of Amherst and Mark A. Koch, 20 of Brewster are the two UMass students who were arrested and charged with possession of a class D substance with intent to distribute and possession of a class B substance. Another man who is not a UMass student, Robert Hayes, 21 of Brewster, was arrested and charged with possession of a class D substance. Two tenants of the apartment were present when police arrived, but were not arrested.

The three men were all arraigned in Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley on Monday, March 7.

After an investigation over several months, Amherst Police converged on apartment 229 of the 1040 North Pleasant St. complex at approximately 7 a.m. on Saturday, March 5. Police allegedly seized two pounds of high-grade marijuana, 20 doses of aderall and several hundred dollars in cash from the apartment.

Police say the pot was prepackaged in a similar manner to what was found three weeks ago in a drug bust at the Brandywine apartment complex, which is located directly next to Puffton Village.

The type of marijuana that was allegedly seized was hydroponically grown and is very strong, according to Amherst Police. Hydroponically grown pot is grown in a water solution rather than the usual soil. Police estimate one pound of this kind of pot has a street value of $3,500.

Police say they are currently investigating where the marijuana originated.

Airport re-opens as storm leaves states

By Greg Sukiennik
Associated Press

A car struggles to drive through campus Monday afternoon during a snowstorm that closed campus early.

BOSTON — Gusty winds knocked down trees and power lines as the latest storm of a seemingly endless winter swept through Massachusetts, leaving more than 20,000 homes without power and shutting down Logan International Airport for hours.

Central and western Massachusetts saw the most snow, with 10 inches in Rutland and 8 inches in Springfield, Northfield and Wilbraham. North of Boston, Peabody, Winchester and Billerica all had at least 6 inches.

Boston received 4.8 inches, pushing the season's snowfall total to about 83 inches. Even before the latest storm, 2004-2005 was the seventh snowiest winter on record, according to Charlie Foley, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service in Taunton. The record of 107.6 inches was set in 1995-96.

And it's not over yet. Foley warned of a developing coastal storm that could bring more snow to the region by Friday afternoon.

Whiteout conditions caused Logan to shut down around 8 p.m. Tuesday night. It reopened at 2:55 a.m., initially with only one runway because of a strong northeast wind. By midmorning two runways were operating, airport spokesman Phil Orlandella said. Between 400 and 450 passengers were unable to get flights out Tuesday night and the airport provided cots for those who were stranded overnight, he said.

"The airlines have to get back into the system," Orlandella said.

Electricity was knocked out to about 8,000 NStar customers in eastern Massachusetts. By midmorning, they all had their power back, NStar spokesman Mike Durand said.

Trooper Dennis Eugin warned of drifting snow on western Massachusetts roads. "It's very, very cold," Eugin said from the Shelburne Falls barracks in the northern Berkshires.

A car and school bus collided in the central Massachusetts town of Rutland on Tuesday afternoon, injuring the driver of the car, 20-year-old Nicole M. Garris. She was in serious condition Tuesday night at UMass Memorial Medical Center, according to the Worcester Telegram & Gazette. None of the 21 children on board the bus were injured.

March marks 'Choose Your Major' month

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

March is choose your major month at the University of Massachusetts.

As students enter college, the question every student tries to avoid gets asked on a consistent basis. "What's your major?"

The question that is heard most often around campus often receives responses like "I'm undecided" or "I have a major but I think I'm switching majors."

When students on the University of Massachusetts campus were asked by the Massachusetts Daily Collegian what their plans were for their choice of major, many could not respond.

According to the pre-major advising department on campus in Goodell, "students enter the university with a major in mind, while some wait until the end of their sophomore year or the beginning of their junior year to make a choice. Most students will change their major at least once during their college career."

Conventional wisdom proposes that the time for prospective job-seekers to act is well before their graduation, but Dave Brown, a senior in the communication department points out that, "if you don't really take your major seriously, how do you expect others to when you graduate?"

Tom Schack, who is a junior in the Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration program, says "I started my work with the Perini Corporation right after my first year of school, in 2003."

Through patience and networking Schack found himself working at the Perini Corporation.

According to Perini's Web site perini.com, the company "is one of the most versatile and successful contractors in the U.S., consistently reporting annual revenues in excess of $1 billion." Additionally, Perini has been consistently ranked with the top 50 contracting firms in the United States.

"The BDIC major is really just for people who have a really good idea of what they want to do with themselves, because some of the general requirements like Mathematics or Biology are not specific enough for some people," Says Schack. "I was interested in the construction courses offered in the Building Materials and Wood Technology department more than the Wood Science and Forest Products Marketing courses offered here."

The BDIC major allows students to select courses from respective departments to form a more tailored education for specific educational needs which the individual student must have prepared within a proposal before consideration for the major.

According to Schack, "working in the industry of study helps the overall prospective of the student to understand the whole operation. I couldn't have imagined a better place to get started in the construction business," says Schack. "Perini is a international corporation, and I had hoped that my major would help me travel."

According to Perini, as many as 10,000 skilled craftsmen may be working all over the world at any given time.

"The experience has given me with the insight necessary to achieve my goals at UMass by providing insight into the path I need to take as an undergraduate to eventually become a project manger in the construction industry," says Schack.

According to the pre-major advising department, the most effective way to determine your course of study is to ask yourself some basic questions. What do I like about the class and what do I dislike? Does the professor appeal to me? Why am I interested in the content? Am I comfortable with the ways of working and thinking that this course requires? Finally, does the course material match my interests and goals?

"I had a few friends in construction programs and it grew from there. I took some classes in construction and took an interest in it and found myself at Perini," says Schack. "Still, the internship at Perini really confirmed that construction was what I really wanted to do."

"My father, who is an electrical engineer, gives me the motivation necessary to achieve academically," Says Schack.

Harvard applicants get ethics lesson

BOSTON — His decision came late at night, with his laptop propped in front of him in bed. Instructions on a Web site promised business school applicants like him an early online peek at whether they'd been accepted. Intrigued, he began typing.

A minute later he'd accessed the Harvard Business School's admission site, though all he saw was a blank page. That split-second decision cost the 28-year-old New Yorker a chance to attend the school this year.

And he wasn't the only one to get turned down for doing what he did — using a method detailed in a BusinessWeek online forum to try to get an early glimpse at admissions decisions in top business schools.

In a blanket rejection issued Monday, Harvard dashed the hopes of 119 applicants. MIT followed suit Tuesday, rejecting 32 applicants. Carnegie Mellon was the first to act, delivering the bad news to its "hackers" applicants last week.

The New York applicant — who, like all applicants interviewed, asked that his name not be used — said he spent months completing Harvard's rigorous application process.

Admissions sites of at least six schools were accessed by applicants for about 10 hours March 2 after a hacker posted instructions on the online forum. Some applicants saw blank pages and others viewed rejection letters before access was denied.

Bustamante and Murphy encourage SGA but decline to run

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Current President of the Student Government Association Eduardo Bustamante and Trustee Matthew Murphy will not be seeking re-election, but encouraged candidates to continue to work with students at last night's meeting.

"Our vision was, and remains to educate and mobilize students," Bustamante said in his officer report, "when we first came in, we felt that the SGA was schmoosing with the administration and used it for resume building."

Bustamante and Murphy said that they see great things for the future of the SGA, but there is room for improvement.

"I see tremendous room for growth for the SGA. There are different means of outreach, but to make things clear, we are not running."

Additionally, the pair endorsed candidates Pavel Payano and Valerie Lewis for President and Trustee, even though actual campaigning does not begin until today.

Bustamante also remained confident that he would remain involved with the SGA "in some way shape or form."

After applause from the Senate, Bustamante mentioned his recent meeting with Chancellor John V. Lombardi regarding the University's decision to purchase the highly controversial weapons, Tasers.

"I have news regarding students being electrocuted," he said, "we were told that the university is no longer looking into Tasers....at this time."

MEGAN MINNICH/COLLEGIAN

Student Trustee Matthew Murphy and SGA President Bustamante

And in reference to the newly revised picketing code which was implemented despite extreme student opposition, Bustamante said that the SGA "has been cordially invited to take the Chancellor to court [over the issue]. And to that, I thank the Senate for getting the ACLU involved."

Speaker of the SGA Mark Morrison reiterated to Senators last night that he still plans on working with Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano, even thought the Senate voted 'no confidence' in him last November. Morrison was heavily criticized at last week's meeting because of his efforts to work with Gargano.

"I build many of my principles on respect," Morrison said, "we do not have enough student popularity, we need to get back a relationship with the administration."

Morrison added that he feels that the SGA has "missed out on issues," and have been denied input on important University business.

"I am not talking about a relationship that exploits either side," he said. "I am just talking about input. The Universits can't do it without our support. I am working on a minimal basis with the vice chancellor. I can't neglect that obligation."

Several Senators applauded Morrison's refusal to comply with the 'no confidence' vote and added that it is important to work with all administrators on strictly important University business, however, some were angry that Gargano allegedly rejected an invitation to come to meet with the Senate body. Public college faculty will receive retroactive pay raise

BOSTON (AP) — Employees at the state's public colleges and universities will get a retroactive pay raise after the legislature overrode a budget veto from Gov. Mitt Romney on Wednesday.

Late last month, Romney had vetoed nearly $30 million for the pay hike, saying the state can't afford the extra spending.

But lawmakers in the House and Senate swiftly overrode Romney's veto and approved the raises.

Every Republican in the House and Senate split with Romney and sided with Democrats to allow the increases.

Morrison, Gargano was just trying to help the SGA, not hinder it.

"He said that he didn't want to come to a Senate that was so divided. It wouldn't be beneficial," Morrison said.

Attorney General Craig Goldschmidt and Trustee candidate announced that even though the sub committee that is giving a negative recommendation to bag searches did not meet, it is still very important that students know their rights and refuse any bag searches from a Umass police officer.

"[UMPD] is making proactive efforts to prevent alcohol consumption. They are waiting for you. They will ask to search your bag if they have probable cause."

He encouraged students to visit with Student Legal Services Director Charles DiMare about specific laws and guidelines that are acceptable in searching bags.

"There are 10 ways for police to search bags," Goldschmidt said, "most commonly by search warrant and giving consent, which is the most common."

SGA elections will take place after spring break.

Top Chechen rebel's death leaves dilemma

MOSCOW (AP) — The killing of top Chechen rebel Aslan Maskhadov leaves the insurgency largely in the hands of Shamil Basayev, the most brutal of the warlords — a development that could undermine any chance of peace even as the Kremlin celebrates a success in the long conflict.

On Wednesday, there was uncertainty over what the death might mean, with Russia facing the fundamental question of how much an insurgency depends on its leaders — a dilemma faced by Israel in the targeted killings of key Palestinian militants and the United States in the hunt for the top men in al-Qaida.

Russia hopes the Chechen insurgency might be hobbled, with a series of militant leaders systematically eliminated over the years. In recent months the Russians also appear to have reaped some gains from a tough policy that apparently includes detaining rebels' relatives.

And the Chechens might suffer diplomatically too, because Maskhadov was respected by some European mediators as a possible negotiator — a mantle not likely to pass to Basayev. The death of the more moderate Chechen leader could leave the Europeans with no major figure they can push the Russians to negotiate with.

Rebel, Aslan Maskhadov's death leaves unrest in Russia.

In Russia, some legislators hailed Maskhadov's killing as a sign that Russia, which has suffered repeated terrorist attacks, might be on the right track at last.

Improperly prepared snack leaves 27 dead in Philippines

MANILA, Philippines (AP) — wailing parents carried the bodies of their children from hospitals after a snack of cassava — a root that's poisonous if not prepared correctly — killed 27 and sickened 100 others Wednesday at an elementary school in the south-central Philippines.

With the nearest hospital 20 miles away from San Jose school, in Bohol island's Mabini town, some victims died while being carried in a variety of vehicles, including three-wheel motorcycle taxis.

Francisca Doliente said her 9-year-old niece, Arve Tamor, was given some of the deep-fried caramelized cassava by a classmate who bought it from a vendor outside the school.

"Her friend is gone. She died," Doliente told The Associated Press. Her niece was being treated, she said.

The roots of the cassava plant, a major crop in Southeast Asia and other parts of the world, are rich in protein, minerals and the vitamins A, B and C. However, cassava is poisonous unless it is peeled and thoroughly cooked. If it is eaten raw or prepared incorrectly, one of its chemical constituents will be attacked by digestive enzymes and give off the deadly poison cyanide. As little as two cassava roots can contain a fatal dose.

Blacks dying earlier due to unequal health care in U.S.

By Randolph E. Schmid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Middle-age black men are dying at nearly twice the rate of white men of a similar age, reflecting lower incomes and poorer access to health care, a study says. But mortality among black infants is dropping.

While overall longevity for both black and whites has improved over the past 40 years, the gap between the races has narrowed little, former Surgeon General David Satcher said in a paper published Wednesday in the journal Health Affairs.

Satcher's paper was one of several in the journal, which is devoting most of its March/April issue to the topic of health care discrepancies between races.

Elimination of this racial gap would prevent an estimated 83,570 early deaths annually, Satcher said.

Some 10,472 of those deaths occurred among black men who were 45 to 54 in 2000, according to research based on a death rate of 1,060 per 100,000 black men in that age group compared with a rate of 503 for white men.

In 1960 the rates were 1,625 for black men and 932 for white men in that age group.

One reason for the differences is that gains in health care access generally have not included black men unless they were older or disabled, Satcher said. For example, when Medicare became law, the average black man did not live long enough to become eligible, he said.

Other factors include the relatively low incomes of black men compared with whites, a rise in gun-related deaths among blacks, their disproportionately high death rate from AIDS, and higher rates of heart disease and diabetes, Satcher said.

While a gap remains, there has been progress for infants, Satcher notes.

Deaths per 100,000 black males under 12 month fell from 5,307 in 1960 to 1,653 in 2000, he found. Comparable figures for whites were 2,694 in 1960 and 656 in 2000.

For baby girls the infant death rate fell from 4,162 in 1960 to 1,363 in 2000 for blacks and from 2,088 to 530 for whites.

Social factors, including neighborhood quality and residential segregation, contribute to the differences in health care, according to a separate paper by David R. Williams of the University of Michigan and Pamela Braboy Jackson of Indiana University.

Additional factors include education, income and health practices such as diet, physical activity and tobacco use, they report.

Cosby molestation charges insufficient

By David B. Caruso
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — The woman whose molestation accusations against Bill Cosby were deemed insufficient evidence by prosecutors has filed a civil suit against the comedian.

The woman, a former Temple University employee who now lives in Canada, came forward in January with accusations about the incident she said happened a year before. Prosecutors last month said they had not found sufficient evidence to support charges against Cosby.

The civil suit was filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court.

"That prosecutor was out of line," said Dolores Troiani, an attorney for the woman. "It is not a comment on her credibility, or the evidence in this case."

Cosby has denied the sexual-assault allegations, and in an interview with The National Enquirer last week said, "I am not going to give in to people who try to exploit me because of my celebrity status."

Cosby's attorney, John Schmitt, released a statement through the comedian's publicist saying his client "will address this matter through the judicial process and not through the media."

MATTHEW B. PERLMAN/COLLEGIAN

Entertainer and UMass alumnus Bill Cosby was accused by a former Temple University employee of molestation. Cosby has denied the allegations.

The woman claimed Cosby gave her three blue pills that rendered her semiconscious, then sexually molested her at his home in suburban Philadelphia in January 2004. She said she awoke to find her bra undone and her clothes in disarray.

According to the suit, the woman also said that after the investigation became public, Cosby's representatives falsely told reporters that her family had asked him for money before going to police. She is seeking defamation damages.

Smuggling survivor used cell to call 911

HOUSTON (AP) — With people dying around him, a Honduran immigrant who survived the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt described Wednesday how he grabbed a cell phone and made two futile calls to 911 for help.

"We are in a trailer ... ahead of Harlingen and Sarita. We're in a trailer," the panicked voice of Matias Rafael Medina Flores was heard in Spanish on a recording of the second call. Both 911 calls — filled with static — cut off before he could tell authorities the exact location of the trailer.

The testimony came in the smuggling trial of Tyrone Williams, who is accused of abandoning the truck in South Texas and causing 19 immigrants to die in May 2003. Williams, 34, could get the death penalty if convicted.

Medina said he and his companions shouted and banged against the trailer's walls and punched out a signal light, but Williams ignored them. They felt like prisoners, he said.

Medina also told jurors that he is still haunted by the memory of watching a 5-year-old Mexican boy die in the stifling heat of the trailer.

"He was suffocating with the heat. He was crying so loud that he was making us feel what he felt," Medina said, testifying in Spanish through an interpreter.

Defense lawyer Craig Washington questioned whether Williams could have heard any screams or known people were dying.

The defense also says that while Williams is guilty of transporting the immigrants, he tried to help by giving them water but couldn't understand their pleas because he didn't speak Spanish.

But witness Scott Reuter testified he remembered thinking something was wrong when he saw the tractor-trailer as he drove home. He saw hands holding on to the light that had been punched out, and one hand was also waving a bandanna, he said.

"It was very frantic-looking to me. To me, it was obvious something was wrong," said Reuter, who later called 911 about what he saw.

Undercover FBI man arrests 30 mob figures

NEW YORK (AP) — The acting boss of the Gambino family and at least 30 other mob figures were arrested after an undercover FBI agent posing as a wiseguy infiltrated the Mafia with an act so convincing he was considered for membership, authorities said Wednesday.

Among those arrested was Arnold "Zeke" Squitieri, who allegedly took over as acting Gambino boss after Peter Gotti was convicted last year. Also facing racketeering charges is reputed underboss Anthony "The Genius" Megale.

Prosecutors said Squitieri, Megale and other defendants made millions of dollars through extortion, loansharking, illegal gambling and other crimes during the past decade. Some of the crimes were plotted at a nursing home, court papers said.

Pasquale D'Amuro, head of the FBI's New York office, said the undercover agent made hundreds of secret recordings revealing the family's inner workings.

It was a feat not seen since FBI agent Joe Pistone penetrated the Bonanno family 25 years ago under the alias Donnie Brasco, he said. Like Brasco, the agent "was told by a high-ranking member of the crime family that he would be proposed for induction," D'Amuro said.

"Had we left him out on the street much longer, the Gambino family ranks would actually have increased by one," D'Amuro said.

The unidentified agent "risked his life as a mole for the better part of two years," said U.S. Attorney David Kelley.

Kids have more electronics than ever

WASHINGTON (AP) — It wasn't too long ago that a kid with a stereo and television in his room might have been the coolest on the block. Now, that just makes him one of the crowd.

In the past five years, many children's rooms have evolved into multimedia centers, with cable or satellite hookups, computers and video game consoles.

For instance, 20 percent of youngsters age 8 to 18 can surf the Web from their bedrooms, double the figure from 1998, according to a Kaiser Family Foundation survey released Wednesday.

That has helped turn kids into "media multitaskers," researchers suggest. Nearly one-third of kids say they chat on the phone, surf the Web, instant message, watch TV or listen to music "most of the time" while doing their homework.

What effect this behavior has on the often fragile ability of kids to focus is unclear because detailed research is fairly new, said Vicky Rideout, the foundation vice president who directed the study.

"We are not necessarily saying that kids spending more time with more media is a bad thing," Rideout said. "This is something all parents have to decide based on what age their kids are, how they are doing in school and the parents' own values."

Some of the blame — or praise — rests with the Internet and technology such as instant messaging, tools widely used for education and entertainment, said Lee Rainie, director of the Pew Internet & American Life Project.

"The parental fear is that this can't be good by splitting kids' attention into so many segments," Rainie said. "Yet the argument in favor of it is you are more efficient, you can do things on the fly that you couldn't do before."

Kaiser surveyed more than 2,000 third-graders through 12th-graders between October 2003 and March 2004 about their non-school use of TV and videos, music, video games, computers, movies and print.

Researchers say that children have become "media multitaskers," who are able to watch TV, talk on the phone and listen to music all at once.

Data breach opens records

NEW YORK (AP) — Using stolen passwords from legitimate customers, intruders accessed personal information on as many as 32,000 U.S. citizens in a database owned by the information broker LexisNexis, the company said.

The announcement Wednesday comes on the heels of a series of similar high-profile breaches, the most serious affecting another large data broker, ChoicePoint Inc. in which scores of identities were stolen.

The ChoicePoint case, as well as other data losses including one affecting some 1.2 million federal employees with Bank of America charge cards, have prompted an outcry for federal oversight of a loosely regulated commercial sector. In the data-brokering business, sensitive data about nearly every adult American is bought and sold.

The first in a series of Capitol Hill hearings are scheduled for Thursday.

At LexisNexis, criminals found a way to compromise the logins and passwords of a handful of legitimate customers to get access to the database, said Kurt Sanford, the company's chief executive, told The Associated Press.

The database that was breached, called Accurint, sells reports for $4.50 each that include an individual's Social Security number, past addresses, date of birth and voter registration information, including party affiliation.

No credit history, medical records or financial information were accessed in the breach, LexisNexis parent company Reed Elsevier Group PLC said in a statement.

The Accurint database is part of the Seisint unit, which LexisNexis bought in August. Sanford said a team examining Seisint's data security routines in February noticed abnormal usage patterns and suspicious billing on some accounts.

Tyson joins with Bay State fertilizer firm for chicken litter production plan

By Rainer Sabin
Associated Press Writer

COURTESY OF TYSON FOODS INC.

Tyson Foods is joining forces with a Massachusetts company to process chicken byproducts into fertilizer.

LITTLE ROCK — The old saw about meat-packing houses using everything but the squeal can apparently be applied to poultry as well — everything but the squawk.

Tyson Foods, the world's largest meat producer, is teaming up with a Massachusetts-based company in the hope of making a profit off chicken litter.

Since January 2004, Springdale-based Tyson has been talking with Regenerated Resources LLC, a company located in Framingham, Mass., to convert poultry byproducts into a commercial fertilizer.

Simmons Foods, another poultry producer based in Siloam Springs, has also partnered with the fertilizer company, which makes Organic-Gro.

"We believe this relationship provides another outlet for poultry litter," said Gary Mickelson, a spokesman for Tyson Foods. "It adds environmental value to byproducts while reducing excess litter supplies that cannot be land-applied locally."

Financial details of the deal were not disclosed under an agreement, both Tyson and Regenerated Resources said.

The decision by Tyson and Simmons Foods to partner with the fertilizer firm comes at a time when the poultry industry in Northwest Arkansas is under fire and has been accused by Oklahoma Attorney General Drew Edmondson of producing phosphorus runoff in watersheds in northeast Oklahoma.

The management of poultry litter, a mixture of wood chips and rice hulls that is used to soak up bird manure, has served as the basis of the claims.

Negotiations that have addressed the water quality issue have taken place between Edmondson and five companies, including Simmons and Tyson. The others are Cargill, George's and Peterson Farms. But the talks have been contentious, as Oklahoma has threatened to file a lawsuit against the companies.

Richard Aleo, president and CEO of Regenerated Resources, said that it is safe to assume that Tyson and Simmons' partnership with his company was motivated by the problems they have faced in recent months concerning the environment.

"I am sure that is part of it," said Aleo, who co-founded the Massachusetts company in 2003 with Arkansas farmer George "Buddy" Black. "I am sure some of the attraction is working on the environment issue and getting the litter out of the environment."

Mark Simmons, chairman of Simmons Foods, said the partnership benefits both sides and the agriculture industry as a whole.

"It makes a great marketplace for growers to sell poultry litter," Simmons said. "It's a good alternative."

In the last couple of years, Regenerated Resources has bought chicken litter to make Organic-Glo, an all-natural fertilizer that aims to compete with its chemical-based counterparts. The company manufactures its product at its one plant in Bentonville that employs 13 people and produces 60,000 tons of fertilizer each year.

Sox look for property to support Fenway

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Red Sox are negotiating to buy three small properties near Kenmore Square in a bid to secure space for long-term growth in the neighborhood surrounding Fenway Park.

The properties — a taxi garage, a McDonald's restaurant and the WBCN radio studios — would allow the Red Sox to continue shifting their offices from the cramped, 93-year-old stadium and allow more room for fans. But there are no immediate plans for major changes to the properties, vice president Janet Marie Smith said Tuesday.

"We have been looking for anything in the area that might help us with our space problems," said Smith, architect of Fenway Park's recent renovations. "It surprised us it took three years to find a single property."

Team owners have refused to say whether they've made a final decision on staying in Fenway Park, Major League Baseball's oldest and smallest ballpark. But all indications are the Red Sox will stay.

Farmers end protests with Taco Bell chain

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) — Taco Bell will spend an additional $100,000 a year on the tomatoes it buys under a deal with a group that had criticized the fast food chain for not doing enough to help the farm workers, the company said Tuesday.

The Coalition of Immokalee Workers, a group of mostly Latino laborers from the tomato-growing region around Im-mokalee, Fla., had sponsored a three-year campaign called the "Taco Bell Truth Tour." The effort asked people to stay away from Taco Bell and restaurants run by its Louisville-based parent, Yum! Brands Inc., until the company pressured tomato growers to provide better wages and living conditions for farm workers.

Yum also owns KFC, Pizza Hut, Long John Silver's and A&W All-American Food Restaurants.

As part of the agreement announced Tuesday, Taco Bell will pay an extra penny paid per pound — about $100,000 annually — that will be funneled to about 1,000 farm workers through a small group of suppliers, Yum spokesman Jonathan Blum said. Taco Bell buys about 10 million pounds of Florida tomatoes a year, Yum spokesman Jonathan Blum said.

Business is up since smoke ban on the job

BOSTON (AP) — Business has increased in Massachusetts restaurants since a statewide workplace smoking ban went into effect last July, according to a leading indicator.

Some restaurateurs had predicted that the law, which included a ban on smoking in restaurants and bars, would drive down business since customers could no longer light up with meals.

But revenues from the state's 5 percent meal tax went up, not down, after the law took effect last July 5, The Patriot Ledger of Quincy reported.

State Department of Revenue figures indicate that meal tax receipts were up in each of the last six months of 2004 compared to the same period in 2003, including a 10.6 percent increase in August, the first full month after the law took effect, over the previous August.

The improving economy could also be a factor in more people eating out.

Some business owners said they had to spend money to get customers back after smokers were driven from restaurants and bars.

Greg McDonald, co-owner of the several Quincy restaurants, said sales in one of his restaurant lounges and a pub dropped after the ban went into effect, but went back up after the owners bought high-definition TVs to attract new customers.

"It cost us a substantial amount of money to get the business back to where it was before," McDonald said.

Gail Anastas, a spokeswoman for the Massachusetts Restaurant Association, which represents about 5,000 food and beverage establishments, said the organization received no complaints from members about a business drop-off after the ban took effect.

, "Choosing a major is a decision that requires gathering information and weighing your options. It isn't usually a decision that can be made overnight. Your courses and UMass experiences will help you gain better understanding of your own academic interests and goals.

This knowledge will, in turn, help you evaluate potential majors."

"I'm looking forward to graduation because I am anxious to get in the field of construction," says Schack.

"For a period in my life I'd like to work with a bigger corporation, like Perini. I'm really happy with what the company has taught me over the past few years. I'd like to stay there."

"Ideally, I'd like to work internationally, and Perini might give me that chance," Says Schack. Perini, has in fact, conducted business in some of the most remote parts of the world, most notably, their reconstruction of the war torn Iraq and Afghanistan.

Schack advises underclassmen to "try and get involved in your field of study outside of the classroom because in the long run you will be better off."

International Bush appointments

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

We're getting to that point in an administration, that juncture that occurs just after a president's reelection when there remains much to be done, though the inevitable end is now in sight. All else being equal, second terms are generally more eventful and controversial. Without the added pressure of having to seek reelection, a president is concerned only with his or her own personal legacy and the fate of the party after the term is up. Presidents will feel much less inhibited by public opinion or potential political backlash in pursuing personal or administration goals than in their first terms. All of this culminates with the final flurry of presidential pardons and signed legislation and accords that generally occur in the months before leaving office. All of this will come to pass with the current administration.

Yet it is also at this time — just after the turning of the electoral corner — that a much more subtle flurry of activity begins. These events are often more important and long-lived in the national and international communities than the big stories that make the headlines. In many cases they are considered to be downright insidious because they are of such structural significance but often go so unnoticed. I speak of presidential appointments to the heads of institutions and to other positions of international power.

Presidents seek to ensure that the pursuance of their policy aims outlives their own abilities to achieve them. By appointing new, and often less popular, representatives and diplomats that are generally closer to presidential views, presidents keep the legacy of their government alive and in structural power. We all hear about the high profile domestic appointments in the administration's cabinet and to the Supreme Court, but it is the lesser publicized decisions that will have more direct impact upon the world. In the case of this administration the legacy is likely to turn even more nightmarish for the world community after Bush has gone back to Texas than it already has.

In the past week and a half two such appointments in particular scream of danger and hypocrisy. The first of these is the revelation that Paul Wolfowitz, currently undersecretary of defense, is likely to be named the next head of the World Bank and the second is the designation of John Bolton, formerly undersecretary of state, as the US Ambassador to the UN. The unleashing of Bush's ultra-right hawks comes at an especially inopportune moment for these two institutions, both of which are undergoing some form of re-definition of their respective missions and means.

Wolfowitz is one of the most sinister members of Bush's team, a hegemon, and if indeed he ends up replacing James Wolfensohn as head of the global lender the results could be devastating for developing and underdeveloped countries. Wolfowitz has made his intentions clear while serving under Donald Rumsfeld and in his writings at the Project for a New American Century think tank that he envisions a world in which US values are optimal for everyone. The mission of the US, then, ought to be the fomentation of its values throughout the world to establish a sustainable system according to those specific values.

Sound shady? At very best the bank is likely to revert back to its strict adherence to IMF structural adjustment criteria for loans (and who knows what additional hegemonic strings will be attached) rather than continuing to work towards a system of case-specific analysis and approach to individual countries' needs. At very worst, the bank will deny funds for political reasons that are specific to Republican leadership in Washington.

Bolton is an ironic choice as head envoy to the United Nations given that he is one of its most outspoken opponents. This comes at a time when conciliatory measures to the UN are essential restoring its legitimacy and affirming the prevalence of a multilateral paradigm in the international system. Mr. Bolton is seen as among the most hawkish of Bush's advisors and favors unilateral to multilateral action. His nomination (he must still be confirmed by the Senate) thus represents Bush giving the UN and the international community the cold shoulder at a time when he ostensibly seeks to mend international fences. Mr. Bolton is all but certain to undercut effective multilateral diplomacy at the UN while turning it into a stage for the Bush administration's aggression against Iran and North Korea.

Through these delegations, the head representative of our country is sending a cold and grim message to the world. It is an antiquated message and one that reflects the backwards power politics of Bush and his cronies. In the years that come, the real Bush agenda will make itself known to the world, or at least to those that were still unclear about it. Unfortunately the world will have to learn about it the hard way.

Friday Nights Lights

Matthew Burke

There is something magical in those lights. Ask any UMass football player. Ask any UMass football coach. Ask anyone who has ever buckled up a helmet, strapped on their shoulder pads, and played the game of high school football. There is just simply something magical about those Friday night lights.

I never knew the power they possessed until I played. They have the strength every year to bring behemoth men to their knees in tears. I have seen it. Gladiators reduced to rubble after a loss. And every year someone new comes up to replace the departing seniors in the spotlight.

You learn life and you learn to completely trust the guy next to you. For if one person fails, someone tears a ligament or gets the snot knocked out of them. The coach teaches you this, among a slew of other life lessons. If they are a good coach you'll get good grades, because if you don't, then you won't play. The coach serves as drill instructor, judge, and jury.

When the lights (of your career) go out you close your eyes hoping that maybe you might get a glimpse of the magic again. However, all you are left with is the memories. The coaches leading the teams into battle, the double summer sessions, the lifting, and the pride of wearing your uniform to school on Friday morning.

Playing high school football was the most gratifying experience of my lifetime and it has left an indelible mark upon me that can never be taken away. My high school coach, Joe Dawe, was fired recently due to the hazing of a freshman. Coach Dawe didn't haze anyone. He started the football program from scratch at Sandwich High School in Massachusetts when I was a freshman, and it soon after blossomed as he laid down the framework for success and pride.

The hazing incident occurred when he let the team captains run the outdoor calisthenics session before practice. And just like he did every year for the last eight, he sat in the locker room and went over the battle plan with his assistants.

They fired him because he let those kids be men. Just like he did for eight seasons prior. These kids were the first ones to fail. They abused a kid that just wanted to be under those lights, to be a part of it, and Joe Dawe got axed for their behavior. Is he at fault or the school? Or maybe even the parents? God forbid that the kids involved actually accept responsibility.

Coach Dawe didn't deserve this. He worked hard and, along with several top-flight assistants, built our program into a contender. We definitely played our hearts out and won respect in our first varsity year.bBut I am writing this to shed some light on something I see happening in society today. There is no accountability today. Why was Dawe blamed for the behavior of some morons? The football coach at the University of Colorado is still at helm, despite reports of a female team member being subject to harassment and even rape.

I was caught on game film punching an opposing lineman in the face instead of using the proper technique to get by him. Joe Dawe saw this and immediately I flinched. "Do it again Burkey and you're off the team." This is the guy they fired. I knew that he meant it. I got great grades in high school and actually became a history minor due to the things he taught me in class. Not to mention I learned the rip and swim techniques of shedding lineman. He was the toughest. He purposely made his history classes harder for football players so it wouldn't look like they got special treatment. Dawe even talked to my other teachers and got behavior reports. They fired this guy. I can't believe it.

When asked, Coach Dawe humbly thanked the school and took the high road, as I knew he would. But I am an ed/op columnist so that rule does not apply to me. Sandwich High is a joke for letting the first head coach we've ever known go. Dawe will be staying on as a teacher with no immediate plans to return to coaching. If he is good enough to teach, then why can't he coach?

I'd like to thank Coach Dawe for one last thing. On the eve of my final game as a Blue Knight, Dawe lined up our team and had each player run on to our home field one last time to the cheers of our teammates. No fans. No opposition. No officials. Just teammates. It was an incredibly emotional sendoff to the seniors leaving the program.

Friday night lights. I can see them still. Thanks Coach. Sandwich is going to be worse off without ya.

The away message phenomenon

Katelyn Harding

I really hate doing this, but I am going to write about the phenomenon, AIM. For the non-computer savvy people, this stands for AOL Instant Messenger, which also stands for America Online Instant Messenger? Yeah, it's a mouthful, I am not making myself an innocent party here; I am also a victim of AIM. My buddy list is categorized according to friends from home, friends from school, etc. Don't even try to shake your head, because I know you have the same exact thing on your computer screen.

The aspect of Instant Messaging that I find so amazing is the almighty "away message." I will say this now, and say it again, never underestimate the power of the away message. There is the typical, "I am away from my computer right now" or maybe something else that the witty writer came up with. Whatever it is, people, who you probably do not even know, are going to read this away message. You have to impress them, right?

Do you use meaningful quotes? Or just keep it short and sweet, letting your friends know what you are doing, in case they need to reach you? What really gets me about the away message is when I hear people talking about them.

I was on the bus the other day, and one girl turned to the other and said, "Did you see his away message? It was totally about me. I know it was." And the other girl concurred, this mystery boy's away message had to be about her friend, because she checked it herself. What are friends for?

Oh, I'm not saying I'm not guilty of away-message checking myself, but I would like to think that I refrain from talking about it where people I don't know can hear me…and write about it in their opinion piece.

There are the away messages with the relationship quotes, which make you wonder if this person is actually in one. Then the next day there is a mean quote about how much love bites, and you wonder if they broke up. The anticipation is killing you. Or when you read an especially nasty one, and you wonder what poor soul this is directed at. I personally love the away messages that list out every single thing that that person is going to do that day, as if we all didn't have tons of stuff to do ourselves. But in case you were wondering, at exactly 12:05 I get out of class and then I am going to the store….

You get my point. Our age demographic literally grew up with the beginning of AIM. When I was in middle school, AOL was the new cool thing to have. That was before the dawn of away messages. Once AIM was invented, America Onliner's were introduced to the away message, and they never looked back.

Last, but not least, is the silent power of an away message. Let's say you get in a fight with a friend one night. The next morning they Instant Message you to see if you are mad. And you still are. So, instead of answering them, you are going to throw the away message in their face. Yup, you are going to paste that yellow pad next to your name so fast, they won't realize what hit them. They can feel the sting of it from your computer screen.

I told myself I would never, ever write about AIM and how it sucks you in, but I caved. The world of Instant Messaging is still in its transition stage. When we are all in our 30's we are going to be amazed at what AIM has transformed into. Before you know it, our computers will be doing things that we couldn't possibly imagine now. But for your sake, peel yourself away from your computer screen and go outside and do something productive.

There are so many things happening around us, if we spend all our time glued to our computer screens, checking everyone's profiles/away messages, it cannot amount to anything substantial. Go make something of yourself. That's what you are at UMass for. At least you took time away from looking at an away message long enough to read this column. Go check some away messages now, I bet some have changed since you have read this.

Katelyn Harding is a UMass student.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

AN IMMATURE AND PROFANE 'COLUMNIST'

The United States rejoices in its freedom of speech, yet Congress, state legislatures, and the courts have continually upheld the need to temper this freedom with responsibility and civility. In other words, certain forms of expression, such as threatening, abusive, or profane language, may be justly regulated. Furthermore, to be considered a useful and respectful member of society, one is expected to show restraint and maturity in his self-expression.

Thomas Naughton, "columnist" for The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, has clearly demonstrated that he is incapable of such adult behavior. Having only just admitted puerile criminal acts (the recent yellow ribbon issue) that violate the First Amendment which those such as himself idolize, he has proceeded to contrive the most disgusting, impudent, and indecent piece of journalism I've read in years, if not my entire life. In his column, "Oh, Jesus: dealing with the re-release of 'The Passion,'" Naughton attacks not only the release of the uncut version of Mel Gibson's controversial rendition of Christ's sacrifice, but Christianity (particularly Catholicism and evangelical Protestantism) as a whole. It is one thing to disagree with and satire a person or dramatic artwork; it is entirely another thing to act, as has this scurrilous author. He has:

1) Suggested that one invite Satanists to view the film while mocking aspects of the Sacrament of Holy Eucharist (Holy Communion).

2) Suggested that viewers indulge in sexually oriented behaviors during the film.

3) Suggested, in ridicule, that viewers be forced to wear crowns of thorns.

4) Suggested that vile satires ("A..a la "Rock Horror Picture Show'…") be made of the film.

5) Suggested that pornographic sound reels be substituted for the originals.

These are not the words of a competent, college-worthy young man; these are the rantings of someone who is insolent, immature, ignorant and brutish.

Granted I'm, admittedly, a conservative Roman Catholic; that aside, anyone with the slightest hint of decency should be repulsed by this latest outburst by this journalistic wretch. One of my colleagues suggested that the offending piece was meant in exaggeration, desired to promote an excited response, rather than encourage literal actions in regard to showings of Gibson's film. In light of his other recent exploits, and his viciously leftist and anti-Christian attitude, I highly doubt that to be the case. If it is, it was the wrong road to take and done with far too much obvious satisfaction and conviction.

There is a fine line between acceptable ridicule and socially/morally/ethically (and often legally) unacceptable diatribe. Thomas Naughton has apparently decided to reside on the other side of that line. If The Massachusetts Daily Collegian wishes to retain its credibility and (limited) authority, it should act immediately to distance itself from Naughton and his statements.

DECRIMINALIZING MARIJUANA

This is a call for help. This is a call to action. The students at UMASS are in a privileged position, a place that confers to us enormous political power. No where else in Massachusetts is there such a high concentration and such a large number of people from all over the state in one place. We have students from every single legislative district in Massachusetts, constituents of every representative in the state government. We could be the megaphone of political change in the state if we wanted to be, but what would we say? What issue could be big enough to unite most of the student body, grads and undergrads, together in solidarity to work for change? I can think of more than a few, but I'll just give you one: nonsensical drug laws that overcrowd prisons, arrest and give criminal records to honest decent people, and cost us taxpayers disgusting amounts of money to enforce laws that most of us think should be at the very least drastically altered.

So what are we going to do about it? I mean, we can't just make marijuana legal, right? The answer is maybe not right away, but we can get on that path and we can start by decriminalizing it.

This means that a person cannot be arrested, jailed, and receive a criminal record from minor possession for the drug (less than one ounce) but only fined. In the elections last November, all 12 Massachusetts counties that had nonbinding ballot questions about decriminalizing marijuana passed, many by wide margins.

The Cannabis Reform Coalition is a politically active RSO here at UMass and the oldest college-based group working to reform drug laws in the entire country. We're working with the Partnership for Responsible Drug Information to pass a marijuana decriminalization bill in the state legislature that would have the effects I described above, regardless of reason for use of the drug, and we are closer than anyone has ever been to getting this bill passed in the state within the next year and a half.

We believe this is a noble cause and it cannot be achieved without the support of all of you reading this right now. Please, take action and stand up for your rights as citizens. For more information, come to the CRC Office rm. 322 in the Student Union, and help us make a difference.

New designer on the block

By Amy DiLuna
New York Daily News

NEW YORK — "If you are not Jennifer Lopez, don't even think of knocking!" reads a sign posted on a door at J.Lo headquarters.

Problem is, she is Jennifer Lopez, and she is knocking, and no one's answering. It's the day before her Fashion Week debut, she's trying to get into the models' changing room, and she's losing her patience.

MTV cameras, following her every move, are rolling. Finally, she yells "it's me! It's me!" and a harried stylist lets her in.

In an age where every pop star and her mother has her own clothing collection, it's surprising that an already established icon like Lopez is upping the ante with an upscale line (labeled Sweetface, a name she says an old agent used to call her) and a splashy fashion show.

It's something, she emphasizes, that she's taking very seriously.

"I don't fancy myself a big designer or anything," she said Thursday on the fifth floor of her Sixth Ave. offices, situated a stone's throw from Bryant Park. She's wearing jeans and an ivory sweater that falls past her hips, her chestnut hair pulled back in a high ponytail. "Anything I put my name on is not just about making a buck. If I'm going to take on a venture like this, I want to make sure that it's something that I could be proud of."

She has help, of course. A small team of pros takes care of the technical stuff, from sketching to styling, and business whiz Andy Hilfiger, Tommy's brother, is her partner in promotion.

"I was surprised when we started working," says Hilfiger of his A-list associate. "She knew the

Maybe blondes don't have more fun

By Elizabeth Wellington
The Philadelphia Inquirer

Hollywood has spoken: Blondes are better as brunettes.

Don't believe it? Rewind to the red carpet at this year's Oscars or Golden Globes. Look at the glossy tabloids.

Renee Zellweger, formerly a flaxen-haired siren, now has cocoa-colored locks. Sarah Jessica Parker's blond highlights are a unified shade of amber. Beyonce's golden mane is honey brown. Color Ashley Olsen's coif tawny, Ashlee Simpson's deep mahogany.

Even the queen of blond layers herself, Jennifer Aniston, now wears brown hair falling softly past her shoulders.

"Right now, I have 10 fashion magazines in my salon, and (on) the cover of only two are blondes. The rest are brunettes," said Doris Freeman, owner of Salon Rouge in Cherry Hill, N.J.

"And now, everybody wants darker hair. Before, I'd have to talk women into darkening it. Now, they don't even think about it. They just sit down and say they want dark hair."

Some salon owners say 20 percent of their customers are making the switch from vanilla to chocolate. The change is quick, though it's not necessarily easy, because darker hair draws attention to every facial feature and requires a new makeup palette.

Many women are tired of shelling out more than $100 every six weeks to lighten their roots;

Is Spring a cinch or slouch? It depends on the belt

By Wendy Donahue
Chicago Tribune

From beaded to braided to jumbo-buckled, belts' sphere of influence keeps on growing.

"They're becoming bigger and bigger as far as height and size and trendiness," Amy Gallagher, fashion expert for Marshall's stores, said. "We're seeing a lot of big belts that are resting on the hips. That's because the tunic look is very in right now. It's a fun way to break up a long shirt."

Belts can be an inexpensive way to make those jeans look as fresh on Sunday as they did on Saturday (and Friday and Thursday).

The big news:

Thick belts worn not through the loops but hanging on the hips. And big buckles, which is good news for hips, Gallagher said.

"You never want to go overboard, but a big buckle really makes your hips look smaller," she said.

The big caveat:

"One thing I see people make a huge mistake with is not buying the right size belt. You really want it to easily buckle and have a little extra left over," she said. "If you pull it too tight, you can be a skinny girl and still look cinched in the middle. It's not cute to see skin above or below the belt line."

That matters only if your belt is cuts, the colors, the fabrics, the silhouettes."

Thursday afternoon, the designing diva was in a surprisingly good mood, considering a reporter just asked if the Lopez family, her "Brooklyn contingency," would be sitting in the front row at Friday's show ("well my family's from the Bronx," she corrected sweetly). And when he suggested her peeps would be performing a "Mexican cheer," the Puerto Rican pop princess's leg started shaking.

But she took it all in stride.

She has to: She and her brand will be competing with fashion heavyweights. And whether she likes it or not, Lopez is following in some big footsteps.

In 2001 Sean "Puffy" Combs caused a stir when he debuted his Sean John menswear collection at the Bryant Park tents. Style arbiters were dismissive of the very idea of a rapper invading fashion's mecca. But Combs proved them wrong, and went on to win a coveted, and credibility-lending award from the Council of Fashion Designers of America.

And Lopez gave those wanna-be celeb couturiers — think Eve and Gwen Stefani — a run for their money. Her presence on the runway was palpable. The Sweetface collection featured a $2 million pair of diamond-studded jeans (a nod to her "street" upbringing) and an oversized white mink version of the floppy hat she wore to the MTV Video Music Awards alongside red-carpet fur coats (a reflection of the "luxurious things" she's been "lucky enough to see"). The music she and Hilfiger chose mixed her own tunes (plus hubby Marc Anthony's) with rock influences, from the Red Hot Chili Peppers to Guns n Roses. And the models were a lot like Lopez, too, by design.

"I was looking for an energy and a vibe more than just a look," said Lopez of her casting choices, which included Naomi Campbell and Liya Kebede. "I wanted a mix. I wanted Latina girls, of course, all different types, but I was looking for that sexy street glamour. There are certain girls that are so not that. I was looking for girls with real power and energy, that are going to be sexy on the runway, that kind of can do high-couture fashion, but at the same time they have a little bit of a street edge to them."

Lopez was extremely aware that her own image as a powerhouse style icon had to be maintained throughout her Fashion Week presentation.

"Just being here, you have to be right on top and micro-manage," she said, eyeing a model who was pulling off a skirt. "Like right now she's getting undressed. I'm like, wait a minute, she's not done. You know what I mean? But that's the way you have to be. I care about it that much."

Backstage Friday night, she micromanaged even more.

After some TV interviews in mile-high stilettos, Lopez changed into terry cloth flip-flops and got down to business as her husband wandered about. Wielding a comb, she touched up Campbell's ponytail, then argued with stylists about how to make the thing stay put. Fretting and fussing (and fully aware she was on camera), the lady of the hour slipped into frantic designer-mode.

But that's what happens when you aim high, inspired by the spectacular shows from style titans like Dolce & Gabbana and Christian Dior.

The tent itself, jet-black, was more stage than fashion show venue. Showgoers snatched handfuls of the tiny rhinestones covering the catwalk. And when West Side Story-themed lights flashed, they cheered.

After her show-ending walk-out, Lopez gave a triumphant fist-pump and headed backstage. She had, apparently, achieved her goals.

"I want it to be fantastical, but me," she explained before the show. "So it's fantasy because at the end of the day and you want big, beautiful pieces, you still want it to be you. You don't just want to put an ostrich on someone's head just because you want to be like someone else. It's very, very me."

Jennifer Lopez, media mogul, launched her new line of haute couture clothing 'Sweet Face' in New York at Friday's show.

Blonde bombshells old news chic brunettes are the trend

others are seeking a natural look with more shine. Still others have hair that, after years of being stripped of pigment, is so weak you can see through it.

But the main reason blondes are going brunette, stylists say, is that today's tweedy, retro style harks back to the demure, ladylike look of Audrey Hepburn.

If you look at the old-time, glamorous actresses, almost everyone is a brunette, except for Marilyn Monroe, said stylist Michelle Eppright, of 19 West Beauty in Ardmore, Pa.

Trend watchers say darker hues stepped back into the spotlight two years ago, when Madonna opted for brown tresses. Last year, Eve introduced chunky brown highlights to her shoulder-length white-blond extensions. Britney Spears was next, followed by goddess-to-the-tweens Ashley Olsen, and so on and so on.

Today, hair companies from Aveda to Goldwell offer products specially formulated to ensure that brown and red hair have a healthy, natural shine.

"The look is so much softer right now. Chunky is over," said Giavanni Scott, owner of Philadelphia's Total Serenity Hair Spa.

"Most of my clients are African American, and the hot color for them is chocolate brown. They want to be downtoned with warm chestnut and mahogany shades. Brown is just sexy now."

That's the No. 1 reason Philadelphia-area model Laura Ash decided to abandon her blondness.

On Friday afternoon, Ash, 42, waltzed into a Southampton, Pa., salon with sandy hair. She'd been blond all her life and was simply ready for a change. Plus, she'd just left her agency, so now was as good a time as any.

"I'd noticed that the celebrities were getting their hair darker, and I decided I needed a change. Why not step out of my box a little bit?" Ash asked.

Deborah Gavin applied a floral-smelling pigment solution to Ash's hair. An hour later, Ash swiveled around to the mirror as Gavin blew the newly brown hair, with a hint of terra-cotta, out straight.

Makeup artist Barbara Tendler was on hand to give Ash a darker shade of lipstick and tips on how to choose colors.

Her foundation, of course, will stay the same. But, Tendler said, she'll have to choose warmer lipsticks. Frosty pinks should be replaced with browns, berries and rusts. Blushes should follow the same pattern.

"Oh my God, I look like I need a tan," Ash said. "But I like it, I really like it."

Forget brassy hair. If you are a bottle blonde, it's time to make a switch to brunette. Starlettes from Renee Zellweger to Beyonce Knowles have traded light locks for darker shades this year.

Windy winter blizzards get you down? Try sweet hot chocolate

By Kim Harwell
DallasNews.com

First of all, here's what drinking chocolate is not: hot cocoa. Forget the mini-marshmallows and clumps of undissolved powder, this is all about the sensual, silken properties of the world's finest dark chocolate. Each small serving is a decadent cup of liquid luxury, rich and indulgent with a balance of sweet and bitter properties.

Chocolate has been a favorite beverage since long before that perky Swiss Miss started showing up on your grocer's shelves. Ancient Mayans were brewing up the sweet stuff well over a thousand years ago; it's said that it was the drink of choice for their gods. More recently, as in the 17th and 18th centuries, European nobility embraced the smooth, satisfying pick-me-up, and now drinking chocolate is finally starting to become known in the States, in no small part because of the recent launch of Starbucks' Chantico drinking chocolate.

Much like caviar, foie gras and fine champagne, the best chocolate boasts an elegant and impressive mouthfeel that lets your taste buds know that something special is going on. Whether you're biting into a hand-crafted artisan truffle or sipping a demitasse of quality drinking chocolate, there's no denying that unmatched feeling of epicurean extravagance.

My favorite way to indulge is with England's Charbonnel et Walker, the drinking chocolate produced by the Queen's chocolatier from 51 percent cocoa solids. To prepare a cup, simply whisk two or three teaspoons of the chocolate flakes with an equal amount of boiling water. Purists can purchase specialized pots and cups from France and Hungary designed especially for drinking chocolate, but we've found our regular espresso cups work just fine.

Chocoholics on the go can opt for Starbucks' new Chantico, a rich, intensely flavored drinking chocolate that has been likened (accurately, in my opinion) to "drinking a melted truffle," according to Michelle Gass, Starbucks' senior vice president of category management. Named for the Aztec goddess of the hearth, Chantico is steamed on-premise with cocoa butter and whole milk and is being marketed as a "drinkable dessert." That's something to keep in mind, since a 6-ounce cup contains a whopping 390 calories and 21 grams of fat (10 of which are saturated).

Eve dances salsa and drinks wine with 'Ben Stiller'

Original Sin

Eve

I went out on a date with Ben Stiller, minus the fame and plus an engineering degree, and never would have I guessed the outcome of the evening.

We met one night at ABC Upstairs, the only decent lounge-type bar in town, and our fate was sealed. He took immediate liking to me when I ever-so-luckily beat him at a game of pool without breaking a sweat. I invited all of our friends to join in on the challenge. The teams were made, his guys against us girls, and eventually they regained their masculinity.

And men they surely were. We were out with graduate students in a very difficult master's program, with proper schedules, nightly curfews, and five o'clock shadows. I was in heaven. The leader of the pack, Mr. Stiller, caught my interest immediately. He not only resembled this ridiculous character, but he spoke, acted, and joked around like him as well. I love a man that can make me laugh.

This wasn't even our first date, but having such a good time settled that we would, indeed, have a first date. It was as though he ran home and watched "Along Came Polly" before he came to see me. He wore a tight crisp-white button down shirt with vertical blue stripes, dark blue freshly ironed jeans, and high glossed leather shoes to put the outfit into complete motion.

"I was thinking we could go to Carmelina's. I heard they have great salsa music, and I'm ready to dance!" His eyes glowed to match his bright idea. Is this a man that wants to dance? Could he be any more perfect? I nodded excitedly and we were off.

I had heard many rumors about Carmelina's. Some say it is the place where rich older men sit and stare at beautiful and sophisticated women they might possibly buy home at the end of the night. Others say it hosts big-time hustlers around the area that are incredibly friendly with the owner, but as we approached the bar, a dance room on the left, a lounge room on the right, all I could see were my ex-boyfriend's best friends surrounding me like a pack of hungry wolves.

"Oh! Hey guys, um, funny seeing you all here!"

I flashed an uncomfortable smile, simply trying to ignore a sudden wave of nausea and a loudly beating heart that wouldn't stay quiet. They all smiled in reply to calm the nerves that saturated the walls of the room.

"Hey, let me get you a drink. Would you like a glass of red?" Mr. Stiller looked sweetly at me as if he knew what I so desperately needed. I exhaled in sudden relief.

"Yes that would be wonderful. Thank you so much, any dry red is great."

He walked toward the bar, leaving me in a very sticky situation.

"So, have you talked to you-know-who lately?"

It was my ex's favorite party buddy. I felt a rush of heated emotion burst inside of me, my face was flushed, and I suddenly panicked.

"Um, no I haven't. I have to go, sorry."

I brushed by all of them quickly, only to be grabbed by my date and escorted to the left side of the room; the dance floor.

"Here you go," he said as handed me a big-bellied, long-stemmed wine glass, half-full with Pinot Noir.

I smiled and watched him as he ticked his head to the side in time with the internationally flavored rhythms of the night. He moved his feet from side to side, jerking his body comically to distract me from noticing that he never had taken salsa lessons, but it was too late not to notice. He twirled me around clumsily, knocking me into the side tables, and we laughed out loud like school children. He then switched up dancing styles from the chicken dance, to the Macarena, the eighties arm swing, to the wipe out. For some reason, I thought it was adorable.

We danced like two best friends at a cheesy wedding, and I loved every minute of it.

When the lights turned on I looked around and noticed all of my ex's friends staring at us with their mouths wide open in horror. I burst out laughing and took Mr. Stiller's arm.

"Come on, let's get out of here, I think we've caused enough damage." He laughed along and we opened the door to leave.

I looked back inside and saw them staring directly at us. And for the first time in months I felt at ease. I waved goodbye and smiled to myself. I was finally with a worthwhile man that treats me with respect, even if it was only for a friendly night of salsa moves. Is it possible that I have finally learned from my mistakes? Probably not, but at least I was finally on the right path away from my past and toward one night of well-rested sleep.

Packages certain?

Ask the Attorney

Michelle L. Leal

Q: I purchased a spring break charter package and am scheduled to leave for Cancun for Spring Break on Saturday. Last week I got a notice that my hotel will be unavailable and that I will have to stay somewhere else. I was told that the substitute hotel is rated even higher than the hotel I had booked, but I have heard bad things about it. What should I do?

A: All charter packages are subject to changes, and any potential substitutions or additional costs must be specified in your contract. According to regulations of the federal Department of Transportation, you have a right to cancel the contract and obtain a full refund whenever there is a major change in the flight or tour that is not acceptable to you.

The fact that you have signed a contract does not guarantee that there will not be changes or price increases in certain circumstances.

For example, many charters specify that a fuel surcharge may be assessed. Major changes include a change in the departure or return city, a change in the departure or return date, unless the date change results from a flight delay. If the flight delay is more than 48 hours, that is considered a major change.

It is also a major change if the price increases by more than 10 percent of the original charges. With respect to price increases, no increases are permitted in the 10 days before departure. Hotel substitutions are considered major changes unless the hotel was named as an alternate hotel in the contract. If the substitute hotel was not named in your contract, then you can cancel and are entitled to a full refund. If you don't want to cancel, given the weather of the past few days, then you will probably have to accept the substitution.

Tour operators are not required to make partial refunds, but you could try to negotiate for a rebate or some extra amenities (e.g. a meal plan or party package) if the substitute hotel is truly inferior. If you don't find out about a change until after the trip has begun, you can reject the changed flight or hotel, and make your own alternative reservations.

In this case you can seek a refund for the changed component when you get home. If anything goes wrong while you are away, put your complaints in writing and keep a copy. It is important that you keep a written record of what the problems were, with whom you spoke, and what the response was. This will help you address the problem while you are away so you can hopefully enjoy your trip. If the problem is never corrected then you will have a record of what happened and will then be in a much better position to take legal action when you return home, if that is necessary.

exposed, she clarified. Otherwise, "it's there for function, not style," she said, "so you can do what you want."

4 BELTS TO BUILD ON

1. A ribbon belt. If you don't already own this from last spring, think preppy grosgrain or tapestry-type fabric.

2. A long scarf that can weave through belt loops. (Scarves are a true value item for use in hair, on neck, around handbag handles, even as a bandeau top in some cases.)

3. A leather belt with a large buckle.

4. A large belt that sits on the hips and can be worn over a tunic.

"If you have those," Gallagher said, "you'll be set all spring and summer."

But don't let that stop you from shopping for others.

Non-leather belts often are more affordable and versatile than leather. Fabric belts sometimes are reversible, like those from Kansas City-based Annie Shugart and partner Sara Tumminia. Their Waist Wraps also fasten with optional pins that can migrate elsewhere in your wardrobe.

Leather Rock brown leather belt with coral embellishments, $128 at Nordstrom.

Lauren brown leather braided belt (sized to cinch at waist or slouch on hips), $52 at Nordstrom.

LADYLIKE BAUBLES

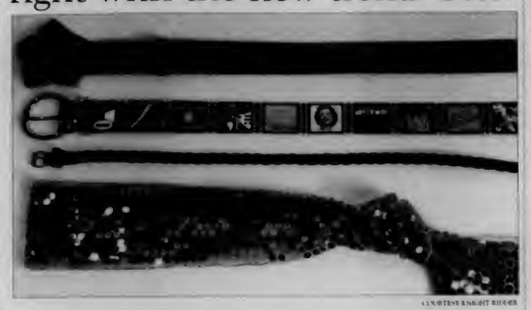
Three-tier faux-pearl belt (can double as a necklace), $34.90 at Rampage stores.

Cara turquoise beaded belt with flower clasp, $98 at Nordstrom.

Faux-pearl and chain belt, $39.90 at Rampage stores.

SPARKLE AND SASS

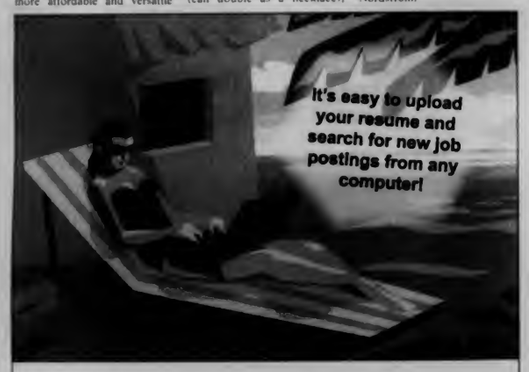
Lu Lu gold sequin sash, $14 at Nordstrom.



Hollywood film belt, $14 at Kohl's stores.

Pucci-style print "Sophie Girl" belt with tweed flower pin, $84 (without pin, $75), from Waist Wraps by Annie Shugart at 913-681-2800 or info@waistwraps.com.

TRENDY TOUCHES



Beading and embroidery: Treesje black leather-trim embellished canvas belt, $110 at Red Head Boutique in Chicago.

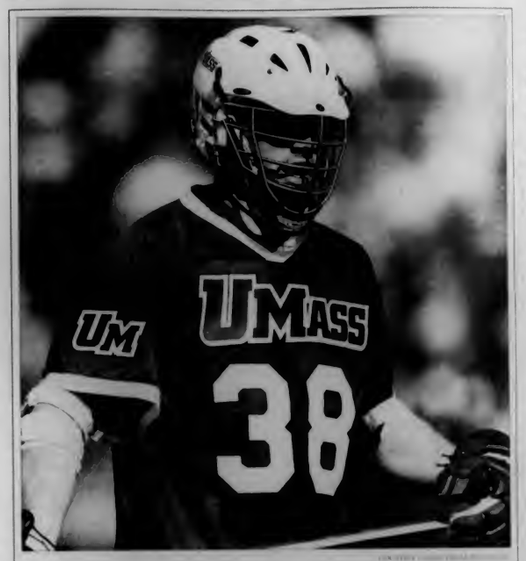
include seniors Denise Denis, Hilary Puglia and Pam Sulick. Denis had a clutch performance last weekend in the consolation game against FIU, homering to put UMass ahead in the seventh inning.

"Denise is a very strong hitter, so that kind of stuff doesn't surprise me," Sortino said. "She's really capable of the long ball even though she's not a very big kid."



Aside from the upperclassmen, rookie Lauren Proctor has put up numbers that impress Sortino. Proctor has three RBI's on the season and is second on the team with a .318 batting average.

Although Sortino is confident with her group, one aspect that might appear to be a deterrent is the placement of UMass. Unlike warm climate teams, UMass cannot practice outdoors all year long, causing Sortino to focus on the basics, rather than team play.

"My theory is that if you're not good at the fundamentals, like catching, throwing and tagging, it doesn't matter how many first and third plays or what kind of relay system you run," Sortino said. "The basic skills are what really matters right now."

UMass has never played Buffalo, Jacksonville or BYU. Its lifetime record against Chicago-Illinois is 2-2.

Play begins this afternoon at 4 p.m., as the Maroon and White take on Buffalo.

and UNH, that plus the fact that no one likes making the trip up to Black Bear Country in Orono.

The Terriers will be tough again in Hockey East, as they already have one tournament victory at the FleetCenter under their belts this year, the Beanpot. They are led by a very balanced offense, as six players have registered at least 21 points this year. David van der Gulik leads the team with 18 goals, and BU boasts a legitimate candidate for Rookie of the Year in Chris Bourque, who has scored nine goals and dished out 12 assists.

Providence snuck into the seventh seed last weekend with a surprise 3-2 overtime win over Lowell at the Tsongas Arena. Though their team lacks star power, the Friars are led on offense by Chris Chaput's 28 points (8 goals, 20 assists). David Cacciola has seen the most time in net and has a 2.89 goals against average along with a .906 save percentage.

Prediction: Boston University wins series 2-1

No. 3 New Hampshire (22-9-5 15-5-4 HEA) vs. No. 6 Northeastern (15-16-5 10-10-4 HEA)

Season Series: UNH swept 3-0
at UNH 4, NU 3
UNH 7, at NU 4
UNH 5, at NU 2

In the only series that kicks off tonight, Northeastern got a tough break in the quarterfinal round of the tournament. The Huskies were the biggest surprise in the conference this year, as they were led by goalie Keni Gibson and forward Jason Guerriero, both of whom are Hobey Baker candidates.

Both can also take a game over completely by themselves. Guerriero scored 17 goals and added 31 assists for a Hockey East best 48 points. His assist total also led the conference. The offense is also paced by Mike Morris (19-20-39) and Tim Judy (6-14-20). Gibson finished fifth in the conference with a 2.33 goals against average.

How can the Wildcats possibly have an answer for Guerriero's offense, you ask? They can respond with some firepower of their own. New Hampshire's offense was tops in the league, scoring at a clip of 4.03 goals per game. They found the back of the net 145 times this year, 28 more times than second-best Lowell and 46 more times than their first-round opponent.

Sean Collins is second on the conference with 47 points on 17 goals and 30 assists, and Preston Callander follows right behind him with 45 points from 19 goals and 26 assists. The Wildcats' home-ice advantage could be the best in the league, and one of the best in the country, as they welcome their visitors to the massive Lake Whitt.

If this series were played at a neutral site, say a week later at the Fleet, the Huskies would have a pretty solid chance at knocking UNH out of the tournament, but that won't be happening. Gibson will win a game for his team to prevent the sweep.

Prediction: UNH wins series 2-1

No. 4 Maine (18-11-7 13-6-5) vs. No. 5 UMass Lowell (20-10-4 11-10-3 HEA)

Season series: Maine swept 3-0
Maine 5, at Lowell 4
at Maine 2, Lowell 0
at Maine 5, Lowell 3

Lowell was another great story this year, and this is the team with the best shot at scoring an upset this weekend. Ben Walter led the conference with 26 goals, and his presence in the lineup will keep Lowell in contention throughout the series.

It's just too bad for Lowell that Maine has arguably the best clutch and playoff goalie in the nation. Jimmy Howard carried the Black Bears to the Hockey East Championship last season, allowing just one goal against UMass in Maine's 2-1 triple-overtime victory.

Howard could be the product of Maine's defensive system, but either way, he has only allowed 2.02 goals per game and has a .919 save percentage. Maine has a characteristically balanced offense as six players have scored at least 10 goals, but Greg Moore leads the team with only 13.

There is one wild card for this series, too. The University of Maine has been on break for two weeks now, and classes don't resume until Monday, meaning Alfond Arena may not be rocking the way it normally does. Fortunately for the Black Bears, however, there isn't much else to do in Maine so attendance may not suffer too greatly, if at all.

Regardless of Lowell's winless season against Maine this year, this matchup does work well for the Riverhawks, who have a lot to play for in the conference tournament due to their loss against Providence last weekend. Anything less than a trip to the finals will keep them out of the NCAA Tournament. This will be the best series of the first round.

Prediction: Lowell wins series 2-1

This leaves Lowell for Boston College and New Hampshire for Boston University in the semifinals next Friday.

The Riverhawks and Eagles will be the best game the FleetCenter sees in quite some time. Lowell won the season series 2-1 after taking the Eagles to the woodshed in a home and home series on Feb. 18-19, winning 5-1 in Boston and 4-1 in Lowell.

In the end, though, BC will be too much to handle for Lowell in front of a sellout crowd, using its experience to eliminate Lowell by a 4-3 score.

Boston University will use its home-away-from-home advantage to give the Wildcats all they can handle in the other game, but once again, UNH's depth of talent will win out, leaving the Wildcats as 3-3 victors.

The two best teams in Hockey East should and will play against one another in the final next Saturday night. For the third year in a row, the final will reach overtime, but the crowd that will heavily back the Eagles won't be getting the result they were looking for.

UNH drops BC in set another Hockey East classic, 3-2, and wins its third Lamoriello Trophy in four years.

Congress subpoenas baseball players in lieu of steroid use

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Jose Canseco, Jason Giambi, Mark McGwire and four other current major league players were subpoenaed Wednesday to testify before a congressional committee investigating steroids policy, a move baseball's leadership vowed to fight all the way to court.

Curt Schilling, Sammy Sosa, Rafael Palmeiro and Frank Thomas also were subpoenaed to appear at the March 17 hearing of the House Government Reform Committee along with players' association head Donald Fehr, baseball executive vice presidents Rob Manfred and Sandy Alderson and San Diego general manager Kevin Towers.

Stanley Brand, a lawyer for the baseball commissioner's office, criticized the committee for an "an absolutely excessive and unprecedented misuse of congressional power." He said the committee was interfering with the federal grand jury investigation in California into illegal distribution by subpoenaing Giambi, a grand jury witness who might have to testify at a trial.

"Not even the Iran-Contra committee attempted to do that," Brand said.

Gene Orza, the union's chief operating officer, declined comment.

Brand and Manfred said baseball will attempt to fight the subpoenas. If the subpoenas are not complied with, the committee could vote contempt citations, which would have to be approved by the full House of Representatives, and certified by a U.S. Attorney. If that happened, Brand said the fight over the subpoenas would head to U.S. District Court.

Canseco, Fehr and Manfred have agreed to testify. Manfred would speak on behalf of baseball commissioner Bud Selig.

"The remaining witnesses, however, made it clear — either by flatly rejecting the invitation to testify or by ignoring our repeated attempts to contact them — they had no intention of appearing before the committee," committee chairman Rep. Tom Davis and Rep Henry Waxman, the ranking Democrat, said in a statement.

Thomas said Monday he would testify, but baseball's formal response to the committee on Tuesday said he was declining the invitation.

"The committee will conduct a thorough, fair, and responsible investigation. It is important the American people know the facts on baseball's steroid scandal," Davis and Waxman said. "And it is important that all Americans, especially children, know about the dangers of drug use. Consistent with our committee's jurisdiction over the nation's drug policy, we need to better understand the steps MLB is taking to get a handle on the steroid issue, and whether news of those steps — and the public health danger posed by steroid use — is reaching America's youth."

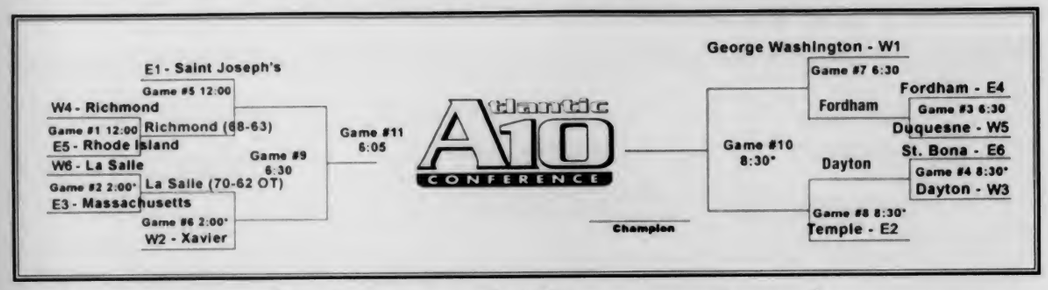
Brand wrote to the committee on Tuesday on behalf of management and the union saying the hearing and what he termed "overly expansive" document requests "present significant constitutional and institutional concerns about the underlying validity and propriety of the committee's inquiry.

"It is not clear to us how the committee's jurisdiction encompasses the privately negotiated drug policy," Brand wrote, adding that the committee was requesting "highly private and sensitive information."

JOE RIMKUS JR./MIAMI HERALD

Sammy Sosa was among the list of Major League Baseball players who were subpoenaed by Congress yesterday due to the ongoing allegations of steroid use. Everyone is scheduled to appear in court on March 17.

"The right to the privacy of this information outweighs any asserted interest in the health problems stemming from the use of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs,'" Brand wrote.



Brand said the committee request "goes to the unprecedented and, we must add, destructive length of seeking actual testing results (and) shows no consideration for the legitimate privacy concerns of MLB, the MLBPA, individual players and other members of the bargaining unit."

Another congressional hearing on steroids is scheduled for Thursday, when the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee is to hear from witnesses, including labor lawyers from the commissioner's office and the NFL, and representatives of the NCAA and the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency.

"We're trying to get to the bottom of the steroid problem," Rep. Cliff Stearns said. "Are they being used in high school? Are they being used in college? Are they being used in professional sports? And what are we doing do stop this, because it is a felony. What is the baseball commissioner doing?"

Stearns, chairman of the House Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection subcommittee, said Selig was invited to speak at the hearing but declined. Stearns said Davis' committee "cannot legislate; they're just an oversight committee."

"We can legislate," Stearns said. "We're trying to understand whether legislation is needed. We're obviously disappointed that Selig did not want to show."

Miller to miss the first month

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Wade Miller expects to miss the first month of the season with the Boston Red Sox while he rehabilitates from a shoulder injury.

He spent the last three months of last season on the disabled list with Houston and the Red Sox, hoping he could improve a rotation that lost Pedro Martinez and Derek Lowe, signed him as a free agent.

"I know I don't want to miss that much time again," Miller said Wednesday. "So I decided to take it slow now and miss the beginning of the season and, hopefully, come back for the last five months."

Early in spring training he hoped he might be ready when the regular season starts on April 3.

"I don't think that's going to happen now," he said. "Obviously, I was hoping to make it, but you set a goal and then it didn't quite happen because of weather or whatnot and it just didn't work out."

Curt Schilling may not be ready for the start of the season either, but with three off days in the first 10 days of the season, Boston can manage with its other four starters — David Wells, Matt Clement, Tim Wakefield and Bronson Arroyo.

Schilling had the sniffles when he returned to Boston's clubhouse on Wednesday after missing a day with flu symptoms. He plans a long-toss throwing session on Thursday before throwing in the bullpen and perhaps his first batting practice session on Friday.

Asked if it was a realistic target for him to pitch on opening day April 3, he said, "Friday is my target."

Barnett's job appears safe as CU coach

By Kevin Sherrington
Knight Ridder

Colorado's president resigned Monday, and it's probably hitting that another woman pays for the football program's sins.

Betsy Hoffman quit in the "best interests" of the school, as she so graciously put it.

Officials are dropping like spring break refugees on the bunny slopes in Colorado.

Down goes the athletic director. Down goes the president.

The football coach?

Gettin' up for Colorado State.

Don't get me wrong. Gary Barnett is sorry to see his president go, and you would be, too, if she'd pardoned you.

"She demonstrated courage and fairness in her actions to reinstate me," Barnett said in a prepared statement. "I consider her a valued friend."

We should all have such friends. Unfortunately, most of us are stuck with pals like Gary Barnett.

He's the kind of friend who lets others take the fall for a scandal that rocked Boulder.

Barnett had no idea that his players used sex, alcohol and marijuana as party favors for recruits.

No idea his players allegedly assaulted at least nine women. No idea that one of his assistants allegedly assaulted two female trainers and coerced them to have sex with recruits, according to leaked grand jury testimony.

Barnett didn't know, so that makes him unaccountable. But Betsy Hoffman was, and Dick Tharp, too.

The further you move from the epicenter in this scandal, the more dangerous it is for your career.

Sure, Hoffman had other problems. She's got a nutcase professor trying to liken World Trade Center victims to the Nazi who helped orchestrate the Holocaust, and financing for higher education is vanishing into Colorado's thin air.

But make no mistake: Hoffman wouldn't leave such a prestigious job had it not been for one of the worst football scandals in years.

Or maybe you don't buy the evidence. The grand jury apparently didn't. All that ugly testimony, and the only indictments were for a recruiting aide who solicited a prostitute for himself and illegal use of a school-issued cellphone.

Prosecutors reportedly had concerns about the evidence and the "reluctance" of women to pursue the cases.

Maybe those women figured they had no chance against Colorado's football program.

Katie Hnida didn't. Not after her rape allegations precipitated the revelations by women around the team.

All you had to hear to understand the environment was her coach's reaction.

"Katie was not only a girl," Barnett infamously said of Hnida's athletic skills, "she was terrible. OK? There's no other way to say it."

Or you could not say it at all. And what coach says it about one of his own, a female athlete trying to make it in a man's sport?

No matter what your stance on Title IX or women's rights, you can't justify what allegedly happened to Katie Hnida in locker rooms and other supposedly safe havens at the hands of some of her "teammates."

Lord knows the environment they've created at Colorado: You've got an 18-year-old recruit coming to town for a few days, and your idea is to get him drunk or stoned and laid?

And that's just on a visit? What's he supposed to think the rules are if he commits to four years?

Coaching is like raising kids. You can't let even a few get away with what they want when they're starting out and expect them to play by the rules later.

Of course, it's not just Colorado. College programs or the satellites circling them have been breaking rules for a long time. Cheating is so pervasive, you'd think the IRS would allow slush funds as tax shelters.

But payoffs are one thing. You're probably even numb to them unless it's a high school coach getting six figures to steer a kid to Alabama.

Steroids are a bigger crime than money changing hands. And so is the sexual harassment of female athletes and support personnel.

Other than Dave Bliss counseling his players to blame a drug problem on a dead teammate, the Colorado case is as disturbing as any I've heard in nearly 30 years as a sports writer.

Colorado officials are just tired of hearing about it. Period. The chairman of the board of regents said they'd miss Hoffman, but certainly not the problems under her watch.

UMass reaches end of the line

La Salle eliminates UM in overtime

CINCINNATI — Freshman Lawrence Carrier scored a career-high 17 points and sophomore Rashaun Freeman scored 19 points, but it was not enough as the La Salle Explorers defeated Massachusetts in overtime 70-64 in the opening round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament. La Salle will face Xavier today at 2:00 p.m.

La Salle	70

Carrier's 17 points were complimented by a career-high nine rebounds, while Freeman recorded his seventh double-double of the season with 19 points and 12 rebounds. Art Bowers scored 13 points to round out the top Minutemen scorers.

Steven Smith, the Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Year, led La Salle with 18 points. Jermaine Thomas added 18 points followed by Darnell Harris who netted 15 of his own.

La Salle (10-18) started the game hot going on an 11-to-1 run in the first three minutes of play. UMass was unable to score in the first four minutes of play until Carrier checked into the game and hit back-to-back 3-pointers.

The Minutemen (16-12) were able to cut that down to a one-point margin just before halftime on a 14-to-4 run sparked by two more Carrier treys.

Harris hit a 3-pointer with eight seconds remaining to push the lead to 33-29 for La Salle going into the break.

The Explorers led by as many as 11 in the second half, but the Minutemen pulled within three, 46-43, with a pair of Freeman free throws with 9:47 to go.

Jeff Viggiano's lay-up with 2:17 remaining sparked a 7-0 run capped by a 3-pointer from Bowers with 47 seconds in regulation. Bowers' 3-pointer gave UMass its first lead of the game at 59-57.

Thomas hit a pair of free throws with 32 seconds in regulation to tie the game at 59 each and give Massachusetts a chance to win on a last possession shot.

Bowers was able to get off a jumper from the free throw line with just under seven seconds remaining, but it rimmed out allowing La Salle to grab the rebound and call a timeout. Initially, the clock showed 0.7 seconds left, but after a review, 2.2 seconds were placed back on the with La Salle inbounding and having to go the length of the court. Thomas' half-court shot was short as time expired.

In the overtime period, Stephane Lasme threw down a two-handed dunk, but missed the ensuing free throw — one of eight missed free throws for UMass in the end of regulation and overtime.

Thomas hit a pair of free throws to tie the game, and Mike St. John hit a lay-up to give the Explorers a 63-61 lead in the overtime. St. John and Thomas each hit two more free throws in the final minute of play to go up by five, 67-62 with under 30 seconds to play.

Bowers sprinted down the court to score a quick runner to cut the lead to 67-64, but La Salle hit three of its final four free throws to seal the win.

UMass controlled the glass 48-30, converting that advantage to 14 second-chance points. The Minutemen also held a 21-0 advantage in bench points thanks to Carriers performance in the game.

Turnovers and free throw shooting, however, hurt the Maroon & White as La Salle scored 24 points on 16 UMass turnovers. UMass was just 15-of-25 (60 percent) from the free throw line.

The loss was the first in overtime for UMass this season as they are now 5-1 in those games.

Breaking down Hockey East playoffs

Jeff Howe

It begins tonight.

There was no calm before the storm, as last weekend's play didn't allow for any of that.

The first puck of the Hockey East playoffs will drop tonight at center ice in Durham, N.H., and the Lam-ciello Trophy will be awarded nine days from now at the center of the Hockey East universe in Boston at the FleetCenter.

Here is a complete breakdown of the four quarterfinal series along with some predictions for the remainder of the playoffs:

No. 1 Boston College (21-6-7 14-3-7 HEA) vs. No. 8 Massachusetts (13-21-2 6-16-2 HEA)

Season Series: BC won 2-0-1
UM 3, at BC 3
BC 5, at UM 2
at BC 6, UM 0

Boston College appears to have the most NHL talent in Hockey East this year, and it has been that star power that the Eagles have been able to rely on in times of need. BC has been more of a defensive-minded team this year as opposed to a group that has regularly lit the lamp in seasons past.

Patrick Eaves has paced the offense with a team-leading 17 goals in addition to 26 assists for a team-best 43 points. Ryan Shannon has been the other offensive heavyweight (13-26-39), and Andrew Alberts has anchored the defense.

The Minutemen have been decimated by injuries all season, starting with the loss of then-leading scorer Matt Anderson and snowballing throughout the remainder of the winter months. With the exception of Anderson, UMass has started to get some of its injured players back, including Garrett Summerfield and Mike Kostka, who both saw action against Northeastern last weekend.

The Mass Attack has been playing much better hockey over the last three weeks after having a horrendous start to 2005, showing the effort that Maroon and White fans were seeing out of their team during postseason runs in the last two years.

The Minutemen have been looking forward to the playoffs for over a month now, knowing they have the ability to right all of their wrongs so far this season, but the Eagles are an impressive team. The individual ability on that roster has been enough to offset any poor performances all year long, and they should prove to be too strong and too deep for UMass to handle.

The Minutemen have had trouble scoring goals when they have needed them the most since Anderson's injury, and the two-headed goaltending monster of Cory Schneider (1.69) and Matti Kaltiainen (1.81), who finished 1-2 respectively in goals against average in Hockey East, should prove to be the biggest difference in the series.

Prediction: Boston College wins series 2-0

KAREN WINGERD/COLLEGIAN

Mike Kostka and the Minutemen will have their hands full with Boston College in the quarterfinals this weekend.

No. 2 Boston University (21-11-4 15-5-4 HEA) vs. No. 7 Providence (11-19-4 6-14-4 HEA)

Season series: BU swept 3-0
at BU 3, PC 2
BU 4, at PC 2

The word around the bottom half of the Hockey East standings heading into last weekend was that of a desire to play the quarterfinal series at Agganis Arena against the Terriers. Though the home-ice advantage at the new, state-of-the-art arena isn't what it was at Walter Brown, the hometown fans can get pretty loud due to the microphone strategically placed in the student section.

This wasn't a knock on the talent or scheme of the Terriers, rather it was just out of complete respect for the abilities of BC

Speedline Invitational awaits Minutewomen

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Four days after a come-from-behind win in Boca Raton, Fla., the Massachusetts softball team (3-6) travels to the other side of the coast to Clearwater, Fla., to compete in the Speedline Invitational. This marks the fourth tournament that UMass has competed in this season and with nine games under its belt, the team is beginning to find themselves.

"Momentum is hard to build right now, stop and go, but I think what we do have is a sense of who we are, what we're capable of, where we need to get better," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "I have a much better sense of the team, and I think the team has a much better sense of themselves."

Unlike the prior three tournaments, UMass will not be facing a top-25 team this time around. Along with beating No. 22 Florida International last weekend, the team has also played against the likes of No. 23 Texas A&M, No. 13 Georgia and No. 17 Nebraska. This week, UMass will be the team to beat, and Sortino is weary of having a target on her back.

"There's no such thing as a lock for sure, and I think this is the first chance I have to asses my team's mentality and how strong willed they are," Sortino said. "If our team is the team that's going to play to the expectation level of the opponent, then we'd be in trouble."

The four teams that UMass will face consist of Buffalo, Jacksonville, Brigham Young and Illinois-Chicago, with BYU being the most feared of that group, as it received national votes in recent polls.

"Your greatest efforts have to be for the lesser of the opponents," Sortino said. "For Jacksonville and Buffalo, we're probably one of the bigger games on their schedule, so they're coming at us with everything."

Aside from its mental preparation, the Maroon and White will depend on the physical talent that it possesses. One of the keys of that talent is senior pitcher Barb LaFogg. In the six games LaFogg has pitched in so far, she has struck out a total of 35 batters, notching a career high 14 strikeouts against Cal State Northridge on Feb. 25. After shutting down some of the top ranked offenses in the country, Sortino is impressed with the quality of play LaFogg is putting forth in 2005.

"She's really doing a great job. You know when you start striking out that many batters, you've got something going," Sortino said. "And she gets that fastball, curveball, in addition to that, she's pretty formidable to deal with. I think she's going to put up some pretty impressive performances for us."

Offensively, the Minutewomen rely on a core group of batters who have been on and off throughout the nine games, scoring only two runs in four of the team's loses, but racking up nine runs in their last two games. Junior KJ Kelly leads the team in RBIs with five and one home run. Of the 25 times Kelly has stepped up to the plate, she has only been struck out three times with a slugging percentage of .480.

The five best moments of the '05 season

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

I've said it once, and I'll say it again; it's been a roller coaster ride of a season to say the least, but with all Jekyll-and-Hyde matters aside, the Massachusetts women's basketball team has put together quite an interesting year.

Speaking of interesting, here's my top five moments from the 2004-05 season:

Moment No. 5: Prophetic Govan calls out Dukes, Nelson and Co. deliver vengeance

You could have asked any player on the Minutewomen in the week preceding the Atlantic 10 Tournament how they felt about going up against Duquesne — a team that had trounced them the last two times with intense first-half scoring sprees — and they all would have told you the same thing: "We're going to shut them down."

It's just the fact that senior guard Monique Govan was so direct in her comments about the Dukes "not going to get anything on us" and star forward Aiga Bautre "not going to get any points on us" that made this one so much fun to watch.

Why? Because they did exactly what Govan said they were going to do. They came out and turned the tables immediately, this time UMass setting the tone with a 19-5 run led by the likes of guards Katie Nelson and Pam Rosanio, as well as Tamara Tatham down low. Duquesne got 52 points, and the sharp-shooting Bautre got 16, but it's a moot point. The Minutewomen got their revenge, and they got it good, winning it 67-52.

Moment No. 4: Comeback falls just short against No. 17 Maryland

Forget the fact that this one was chalked up in the loss column. The Minutewomen poured their hearts out on Dec. 29 in front of the largest crowd they've seen all season (3,130).

Riding a five-game winning streak coming into the Terrapin Classic Holiday Tournament, UMass trailed by 15 with six minutes to go. In what would become a recurring theme throughout 04-05, the Minutewomen suddenly turned on a switch, dwindling the Terps' lead to three with 30 seconds to go.

After Nelson drained her third 3-pointer of the half with nine seconds left, UM was forced to foul Maryland guard Shay Doran with six ticks on the clock. She made one of two to make it a two-possession game, and the Maroon and White had to settle for a 67-63 loss.

But no shame here. As you will see with moment No. 3, UMass can certainly hang with the big guns.

Moment No. 3: 16th-ranked Owls escape with win at buzzer

Following a terrible home loss to Richmond, coach Marnie Dacko did something she's never done before in her coaching career: held practice immediately following the game.

It must have worked wonders because the Minutewomen came out firing on all cylinders on Feb. 24 against Temple University and their famed coach Dawn Staley.

Nevermind that it was a lopsided affair in their first meeting, it took a whole readjustment of Staley's zone defense at halftime and a buzzer-beating trey from Cynthia Jordan to cool off UM. Again, no shame in almost pulling off the unthinkable.

Moment No. 2: Orange come away empty-handed at 'Rage in the Cage'

When you're riding behind a girl who has basically been carrying the team — and the game — for the entire day, the last thing you expect her to do is miss her final and most important shot, right?

Wrong.

With 0.4 seconds left on the clock and the 1,400 fans at the Curry Hicks Cage on their feet, Syracuse forward Chineze Nwagbo missed the second of two free throws that would have sent the game into overtime, allowing the Minutewomen to escape with a 52-51 win. Not to be forgotten, the poor girl had a double-double on the day (19 points, 14 rebounds).

Moment No. 1: Rosario inches UM by HC on last-second layup

After letting the Crusaders back in the game with two minutes to go, effectively erasing the eight-point lead they held, the Philly-born freshman Pam Rosario sent the 1,179 on hand at the Hart Center home with frowns.

With six seconds to go, Rosario took a feed from Tatham to go on a breakaway and come down with the game-winner.

Once again, the game fell into the hands of the lights-out star player, and once again she choked. Maggie Fontana missed an open 6-footer.

KAREN WINGERD/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Pam Rosario was the brightest spot for the Minutewomen this year, and she was part of the number-one moment.

Bush seeks support for social security plan

By Deb Reichmann
Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Two grandpas and their granddaughters joined President Bush on Thursday in making his case that Social Security was on wobbly footing and private investment accounts would help provide a safety net for future retirees.

The president, on a two-state swing through the South to pitch his plan for the accounts, is trying to ease anxiety among retirees and give political cover to Republican lawmakers facing voters in midterm elections.

Bush repeatedly has reassured the 55-and-over set that the Social Security checks they receive, or soon will get, won't be touched. Still, seniors - a group that votes in greater numbers than the nation's youth - are wary about what will happen to the 70-year-old government retirement system if lawmakers tinker with it.

To address that, Bush said: "More and more grandfathers are asking the president 'How about my granddaughter? I understand I'm safe, what are you going to do about her?'"

On cue, Larry Dean, a self-employed online bookseller, who was joined by his granddaughter, Rebecca 'Bee' Dean, a student at the University of Louisville, said, "Call me a Pollyanna, but I have no fear that I will never be able to draw it.

"But I do have fears for my granddaughter, and all of my grandchildren, and even my children your age," he joked to the 58-year-old president.

Public support for Bush's private accounts has been lukewarm.

Outside a downtown auditorium where Bush spoke, protesters waved signs and shouted slogans denouncing his plan. "No more lies, don't privatize," shouted some of the demonstrators. Some held signs that read "Hands off my Social Security."

Inside, opponents interrupted the president four times. Each time, they were drowned out by Bush or supporters in the crowd. "There are different points of view on the issue," Bush conceded.

Facing an uphill battle in getting Social Security changes passed, Republicans in Congress recently have begun to emphasize the solvency problems of Social Security over the controversial private retirement accounts.

On his road trip, Bush did, too. But while he is focusing on solvency, the president is not letting up on his push for private accounts.

"I'm saying to members of the United States Congress, 'Let's fix this system permanently - no Band-Aids,'" Bush said later at a similar event at Auburn University in Montgomery, Ala. "Woe be to the politician who doesn't come to the table and try to come up with a solution."

Shortly before the rally began, the Alabama Senate voted along party lines to pass a resolution opposing Bush's plan to allow Americans under 55 to divert part of their Social Security taxes into personal investment accounts. The Alabama House passed a similar resolution Feb. 22.

COURTESY CNN/CSPAN

President Bush stops to kiss 79-year-old Barbara Gosser after pushing his social security reform message in Louisville, Ky.

"This could be the issue that turns around the South for the Democratic Party," said Joe Reed, the party's vice chairman in Alabama. "Economic issues always tied the South to the Democratic Party."

In Washington, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said Bush had floated two proposals, one, "private accounts that would seriously undermine the solvency of Social Security. And the other, which is the indexing to prices rather than wages, would lead to benefit slashes of about 40 percent. Again, these are non-starters with the American people," she said.

Also on Thursday, Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid were sending videotaped messages to more than 1,300 house parties in all 50 states to rally, in part, for grass-roots support against private accounts.

Meantime, the AARP, a nationwide group representing seniors, and other groups opposed to private accounts are buying radio and newspaper ads to bolster public opposition to Bush's plan.

"We think we need to repair it and strengthen it, not destroy it," said Laurel True of Shelbyville, who spoke at a forum in Louisville organized by AARP Kentucky. "And we think that these private accounts is the first step in destroying it."

On Friday, Bush was taking his message to Memphis, Tenn., and Shreveport, La. By the time he is done with the two-day sales pitch, he will have hosted Social Security events in 14 states since his Feb. 2 State of the Union address.

Weather RATS get money for schools

By Dan Baker
Collegian Correspondent

A group of science and technology related teachers has received an $85,000 National Science Foundation (NSF) grant as part of a project that was started last summer during a professional development conference at the University of Massachusetts.

The money will be used to spark interest and curiosity for science and engineering in K-12 students by studying different aspects of the weather.

The group responsible for receiving the grant is composed of various K-12 teachers originating from different parts of the country. The represented areas include Oklahoma, Puerto Rico, Arizona and a plethora of local towns such as Deerfield, Holyoke, Northampton, Princeton, Wilbraham, Aguwam and Amherst.

The project began last July during a professional development workshop held by the Department of Education at the UMass Amherst campus. The program was run by the Center for Collaborative Adaptive Sensing of the Atmosphere, which is a division of the UMass Department of Engineering and is funded in part by the NSF. Among the classes available, was one on grant writing, which is where the group first came together.

"We started talking about an idea and it suddenly hit us that 'Hey this is really good, we should do this,'" said Mary Taft, lead teacher for the project. "We all kind of looked at each other and said, 'Do you want to?' Everyone sort of thought about it for a moment and then said 'yes.'"

The proposal was then given to Kathleen Rubin, assistant dean for college outreach, who submitted it to the NSF.

"I submitted it as an NSF supplement under the Research Experience for Teachers Program. I think NSF liked it because it is a distributive collaborative project across geographical boundaries and because the teachers themselves developed it."

The group, which calls themselves the "Weather RATS" (Weather Research and Tracking Systems) received preliminary approval for the grant last November but did not get the official word until the end of February.

The money will be used to purchase wireless weather stations for the ten-member schools costing approximately $1,000 a piece. Once hooked up, the stations will allow students to monitor all aspects of their local weather conditions, everything from wind speed and temperature to barometer pressure and soil moisture. In addition, the stations will auto upload data to the Weather RATS Web site, which will provide students and teachers in the program as well as anyone else with internet access the ability to view the weather data of their fellow Weather RATS. Online message boards will be set up to allow the schools to talk with one another.

"We want the kids communicating so that they can get an appreciation for how climate or individual weather events affect daily life," said Taft. "Imagine the impact and fascination that kids in Arizona or Massachusetts would have when hurricanes roll over Puerto Rico or during draughts in the 110 degree deserts of Arizona or when New England gets buried in snow. This stuff really affects people."

The teachers will meet again this summer on the UMass Amherst campus where they will spend two weeks designing a new science and math curriculum which incorporates the new weather stations. One of the goals is to create a program which gives students hands on experience with real scientific data and provides a pratical real world application for what is being taught. '

"Weather RATS will help us integrate authentic mathematical work with scientific research," said Taft. "Students as young as second grade will have a chance to collect and analyze data in order to investigate meaningful scientific questions.

The weather stations are expected to be installed over the summer and the pilot program will begin at the start of the 2005-2006 school year.

Wife testifies in murder-for-hire trial

By Denise Lavoie

BOSTON — Harold Stonier began his courtroom questioning of the wife he is accused of plotting to kill with a promise to her.

"I'm not going to go into any (character) assassination," he said, before asking her a series of questions about the events leading up to his arrest for allegedly trying to hire a hit man to kill her.

Jamie Stonier is still married to the man federal agents caught on tape offering two different men $50,000 in cash and her three-carat diamond engagement ring to kill her.

She spoke softly and succinctly while answering questions from her husband, who is acting as his own attorney at his murder-for-hire trial.

She elaborated a little more when questioned by the prosecutor in the case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Brian Kelly.

When asked by Kelly if she recalled her husband asking her to borrow some money just before he was arrested in April 2003, Jamie Stonier said she recalled having money wired to his American Express card.

"Are you aware that he then used some of that money to pay a hit man?" Kelly asked.

"That's what I've been told," she said.

"As you sit there ma'am, is it fair to say you're afraid of this man?" Kelly asked.

"Absolutely," she replied.

Jamie Stonier spent just 30 minutes on the witness stand Thursday on the fourth day of her husband's trial. She said she filed for divorce from her husband after his arrest, but was told by military officials that if she divorced him, she would lose all of his military benefits, including medical insurance and military food stamps. Harold Stonier is a retired Marine.

Stonier spent much of his time questioning her about events leading up to what prosecutors have described as his initial attempt to recruit someone to kill her. Robert Pelkey, Stonier's nephew, testified Wednesday that in June 2002, his uncle visited him in Sanford, Maine, and offered him $20,000 to kill his wife.

Jamie Stonier said she recalled going with her husband to Maine another time and going out to dinner with Pelkey's stepfather. But she said she did not remember her

U.S. speaks out against mistaken attack

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The temporary road checkpoint where American troops mistakenly killed an Italian intelligence agent last week was set up to provide extra security for U.S. Ambassador John Negroponte, a U.S. Embassy official said Thursday.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, meanwhile, assured his Italian counterpart that the inquiry into the death of Nicola Calipari would clearly determine what happened, Italy's government said.

Calipari died Friday when troops at the checkpoint fired at an approaching car that was carrying Italian journalist Giuliana Sgrena, who had just been freed by Iraqi kidnappers.

"The mobile patrol was there to enhance security because Ambassador Negroponte was expected through," embassy spokesman Robert Callahan said, confirming a report that first appeared in the Italian newspaper La Repubblica.

It was not known if Negroponte, who was nominated last month by President Bush to be the new director of national intelligence, passed through the checkpoint before the shooting. Senior U.S. officials usually travel by helicopter to avoid attacks in Iraq, but methods are varied so as not to be predictable.

While agreeing the shooting was an accident, U.S. and Italian officials have disagreed about several aspects of the incident, including whether U.S. authorities were notified of the trip, how fast the car was traveling and whether the car ignored signals to halt.

The Italian Defense Ministry said Rumsfeld talked to Defense Minister Antonio Martino by telephone Thursday evening and promised a thorough investigation. Rumsfeld said the probe would remove "any shade of doubt and pinpoint any responsibility," the ministry said.

Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chief of Staff, made similar assurances to Italian military commanders in a separate call, the ministry added.

On Wednesday, Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi said that despite differing versions of what happened, "I'm sure that in a very short time every aspect of this will be clarified."

Berlusconi told Italian lawmakers that Calipari had informed an Italian liaison officer, waiting at the Baghdad airport along with an American officer, that he was heading there with a freed hostage.

The coffin of the shot Italian intelligence agent leaves the tomb of the unknown soldiers Monday. The U.S. is speaking out about the attack.

Romney focuses on road improvements

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — Gov. Mitt Romney said Thursday that the state should spend $31 billion over the next 20 years to improve and expand a transportation infrastructure long neglected because of the Big Dig.

The proposal, unveiled by Romney and Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey at a series of events across the state, focuses on improving existing roads and bridges. The administration wants to spend $1.2 billion over the next five years to repair 600 bridges.

"This is one of the key areas where we have underinvested as a state over the last decade as the enormous expense of the Big Dig has gone through our system," Romney said during a news conference at a visitor center in Springfield. "It's now time to return to the rest of the state and to recognize a number of the failures and errors in maintenance that need to be addressed."

The Big Dig, formally called the Central Artery and Third Harbor Tunnel project, was a $14.6 billion undertaking that buried Interstate 93 in tunnels underneath downtown Boston, and connected the Massachusetts Turnpike to Logan International Airport.

Romney's plan - which he said will change as local officials and regional planning and transit authorities weigh in - makes bridge repair a top priority. He said 600 of the state's 5,000 bridges are structurally deficient, and many require weight-load restrictions.

"When that happens, we affect commerce," he said.

The governor also wants to spend $12 billion to expand and decongest roads, including Route 2 - a narrow two-lane road through much of western Massachusetts.

Family thinks four-year-old was murdered in foster care

BOSTON — The deported father of a 4-year-old boy who died in foster care this week said his son's death was no accident.

Dontel Jeffers died Sunday afternoon after going into cardiac arrest. He had been living since Feb. 24 with a foster mother in the city's Dorchester neighborhood.

"I know my son was murdered," Elary Rohan Jeffers, 36, told the Boston Herald in a telephone interview Wednesday from his home on the Caribbean island of Nevis, where he was deported last fall after being arrested on a domestic violence charge.

The Department of Social Services is investigating whether an accident on Saturday caused the boy's death, and criminal investigators were awaiting the results of an autopsy to determine whether it was a homicide.

DSS Commissioner Harry Spence has said Dontel's family alleged he was physically abused while in foster care, but he has given few other details other than to say an adult was supervising Jeffers at the time of the accident.

Jeffers said he was told by his sister that his son was dead.

"I've cried almost every night since then because I miss my son so much," said Jeffers, who arrived in the United States from Nevis with Dontel's mother, Chrystal Claiborne, in 1986.

Jeffers was deported in October after an alleged incident involving another girlfriend. When Claiborne was deemed unfit to care for the child, the state took custody of Dontel.

Jeffers said he wants to return to Boston for his son's funeral, probably next week, but doubted he would be allowed back into the country.

"The last time I talked with Dontel on the phone, he asked if he could come home with me," Jeffers said.

Dontel has been in the department's custody for three months. He was in a group care setting until being placed in the home on Ballou Street in Dorchester.

Romney wants to spend state money on road improvements

"We're not opening up major new highways," Romney said. "We instead are going to widen, repair and de-bottleneck the current system and bring it up to standard."

The governor's plan also earmarks $670 million to build a commuter rail link between Boston and New Bedford and Fall River, something lawmakers from southeastern Massachusetts have long advocated.

New Bedford Mayor Frederick Kalisz Jr., who was in Washington, D.C. on Thursday talking to members of the Bush Administration about getting federal funding for a regional commuter rail system, said that project should "move to the top of the Commonwealth's transit priority list."

Other mass transit projects include expanding commuter rail service between Boston and Worcester, Fitchburg and Lynn.

Absent, however, is the commuter rail link between Springfield and Boston for which western Massachusetts business and community leaders have lobbied.

"That's just not a part of this plan," said Springfield Mayor Charles Ryan, who otherwise called Romney's proposal "intelligent and well-presented."

"A commuter rail from Springfield to Boston would be a dramatic opening up of the Pioneer Valley that we need to have," Ryan said. "It's like the Erie Canal."

Rep. Joseph D. Wagner, D-Chicopee, chairman of the joint committee on transportation, called the governor's plan "a commendable effort."

"I think that a lot of effort has gone into putting this package together," he said, "and I think that it's a demonstration by the administration that they understanding that we need to move beyond the Big Dig and to establish an agenda for transportation."

Romney said the $31 billion plan would be paid for with nearly $16 billion in federal funding. The rest of the money would come from various state sources, including $4.5 billion from the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority.

He said the projects won't raise the state's projected debt.

"We will not increase the amount of financial obligation as a percentage of the budget," he said.

Other initiatives include installing state-of-the-art "smart highway" systems along Interstate 91. Already in place in Boston's Big Dig tunnels, smart highways consist of a network of cameras monitoring traffic flow and accidents.

He also wants to spend about $9 billion upgrading the MBTA transit system, including buying new trains and buses and renovating stations.

Romney said the projects outlined in his plan should create about 30,000 construction jobs per year.

Wife testifies against her husband in trial

husband's claims that he also tried to meet with Pelkey that night to help him find a job.

Under questioning from the prosecutor, Jamie Stonier said she recalled arguing with her husband over his plan to go visit his nephew just after they moved into their new home in Concord. She said her husband was leaving shortly for a business trip, and she wanted him to stay home that day and help her unpack, but he insisted on going to see his nephew.

Pelkey testified that when Stonier came to see him in June 2002, he told him he wanted his wife killed while he was on a business trip he was going on in the next two weeks.

In earlier testimony Thursday, Stonier's sister, Melissa Woodbury, said her brother had stayed in a miserable marriage for the sake of his son. He admitted talking about killing his wife, but told her he never intended to go through with it.

He also told her that a gangster he'd asked to do the killing threatened him and made him feel like he couldn't back out, she said.

Woodbury said she was shocked when she heard her brother had been arrested.

"You've never been in trouble. I mean, you've always done what's right ... this was totally out of character," she said. "You've always looked out for everyone."

Woodbury broke down in tears several times during her testimony. She later acknowledged under cross-examination by the prosecutor that the only personal knowledge she had of her brother's case came from what he told her and what she read in newspapers or on the Internet.

Kelly asked Woodbury if she was aware of the audio and videotapes shown to the jury. On them, Stonier is heard suggesting various ways that his wife could be killed to federal agents posing as a hit man and his girlfriend.

"I know he said he was stressed out," Woodbury replied.

"So because he's stressed out, you think it's OK to want to strangle your wife?" Kelly asked.

"No," Woodbury replied softly.

Suicide attack kills 47 at Shiite funeral

By Sinbad Ahmed
Associated Press

MOSUL, Iraq — A suicide attacker set off a bomb that tore through a funeral tent jammed with Shiite mourners Thursday, splattering blood and body parts over rows of overturned white plastic chairs. The attack, which killed 47 and wounded more than 100, came as Shiite and Kurdish politicians in Baghdad said they overcame a major stumbling block to forming a new coalition government.

The explosion, in a working class neighborhood of this northern city, tore through a large funeral tent pitched next to a smaller one on a grassy patch in the courtyard of a mosque. Survivors scrambled to get the wounded to a hospital, lugging them to ambulances and cars in blankets or prayer rugs as a strong smell of gunpowder filled the yard.

"As we were inside the mosque, we saw a ball of fire and heard a huge explosion," said Tahir Abdullah Sultan, 45. "After that blood and pieces of flesh were scattered around the place."

At first, some mourners thought it was an air strike - but once they smelled the gunpowder, they said they knew it was a suicide bombing.

Blood was spattered across the grass, car windows were shattered and survivors wailed as corpses were loaded onto the backs of pickup trucks. Others simply folded newspapers over the faces of the dead. The body parts that were strewn around the area were believed to be of the bomber.

Shiite mosques and funerals have become a frequent target of Sunni-led insurgents. Last month, suicide bombers attacked a number of them during the Shiite commemoration of Ashoura, killing nearly 100 people.

Mosul has been a hotbed of insurgent violence, and the scene of many bombings, driveby shootings and assassinations targeting the country's security services, majority Shiites and people thought to be working with U.S.-led forces.

Dealing with the persistent insurgency will be a main task for a new Iraqi government.

Officials said the deal between the Shiite clergy-backed United Iraqi Alliance and the Kurdish parties opens the way for naming a Cabinet when Iraq's democratically elected National Assembly convenes Wednesday.

The Kurds agreed to support the alliance's candidate for prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari. In exchange, the alliance will back Jalal Talabani as Iraq's first-ever Kurdish president. The Kurds will receive one major Cabinet post - one fewer than they demanded.

"We told the Kurds that if they are going to have the presidency, then they could have only one major cabinet post because Sunnis should have one major cabinet post," said Ali al-Dabaghal, a ranking member of the alliance who has participated in the negotiations.

On the thorny issue of territory, officials in both political camps said the deal provides for the eventual return of 100,000 Kurdish refugees to the oil-rich city of Kirkuk, southwest of Mosul.

Initiative must put an end to government secrecy

Seven journalism organizations, along with The Associated Press, are joining together to promote a more accessible, accountable and open government.

The Sunshine in Government Initiative, which was announced Wednesday, is on the heels of "Sunshine Week," a weeklong campaign promoting government openness. The initiative will be addressing the apparent increase in government secrecy since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

The seven media organizations involved in the Sunshine Initiative are the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Society of Professional Journalists, Coalition of Journalists for Open Government, National Newspaper Association, Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, Radio-Television News Directors Association and the Newspaper Association of America.

The fact that a coalition such as this one even needs to be created, is proof that the First Amendment does not mean what it used to mean. There should not have to be coalitions and initiatives ensuring that our most basic and fundamental right is followed. Then again, a lot of things have happened since Sept. 11 that should never have happened.

After Condoleezza Rice's appearance in front of a panel investigating the 2001 terrorist attacks, the Bush Administration made it clear that they would be open and forthright about what "the people need to know." The problem isn't that the administration lied when they said they would tell America what it needed to know. The problem is, they actually feel justified in holding the information back. It's not that they are making empty promises, it's that they truly believe such a high level of secrecy is good for America.

According to AP President and CEO Tom Curley, "National security depends on public trust. The trend toward secrecy is the greatest threat to democracy. We must be vigilant at explaining and fighting for accountable government in every jurisdiction."

Curley could not have said it better. Democracy was built on freedom of the press, but it is hard for the press to freely inform the public if they have nothing to go on.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vermont) are co-sponsoring a bill in the Senate known as the OPEN Government Act. The acronym stands for "Openness Promotes Effectiveness in our National Government." Openness not only promotes effectiveness in government; it promotes the free-flow of ideas and discussion that makes the American media what it is. If something is not done, this country will lose one of its most cherished freedoms.

The government should not disclose absolutely everything about its inner workings. Some things should be kept confidential, in the best interest of national security. However, when the government uses national security as a front to justify withholding information that the public needs to know, it becomes clear that the best interests of the country are taking a backseat to the best interests of those running it.

It is unfortunate that the Sunshine in Government Initiative is necessary, but hopefully it will be successful in making sure future generations have no need for such a group.

Where have the pacifists gone?

Ben Duffy

When the National Socialist government of Germany collapsed after World War II, the nation's infrastructure was in ruins. Fortunately, Germany had friends in the West, and they received massive loans to rebuild their nation. Ironically, the 1950s and 1960s could be considered Germany's "glory days," in a purely economic sense of the term. The task of rebuilding a nation out of rubble meant that nobody would be refused a job. In fact, Germany had a pronounced worker shortage during this era, and turned to immigration to quench its thirst for new labor.

This Phoenix rising from its own ashes is known today as "das Wirtschaftswunder," or "the economic miracle." It's hard to pinpoint an exact date when "das Wirtschaftswunder" ended, but it is clearly a thing of the past. In Germany today, there are 5.2 million unemployed, giving the nation an astounding unemployment rate of 12.6 percent. Say goodbye to the Wirtschaftswunder, say hello to the Wirtschafts Blunder.

This is incredibly bad news for Chancellor Gerhart Schroeder, and his SPD party. When campaigning for reelection in 2002, he remarked that he wanted his administration to be judged in terms of jobs created. By that criteria, Schroeder is a dismal failure; such unemployment rates haven't been seen since before the Third Reich.

But don't worry, Schroeder has a plan. He's going to throw out all ethical standards and export anything to anyone, regardless of the consequences. Jobs are jobs, and the German economy needs a shot in the arm. Germany is already exporting plutonium to China. The Germans assure us that the plutonium is not for military purposes, but I'm not buying it.

Germany and its European neighbors are getting even more brash. Both President Bush and Secretary of State Rice have recently made "fence-mending" tours of Europe. On both occasions, the Americans urged the Europeans not to lift the EU's weapons trading ban with China. On both occasions, the Schroeder government refused to budge an inch. They fully intend to make a veritable fortune arming the world's largest military with high quality German weapons.

The EU weapons ban with China was initiated after the pro-democracy rally was crushed at Tiananmen Square in 1989. But the Europeans assure us that China has reformed, that we have nothing to fear of them anymore. It's a boldfaced lie. China still occupies and oppresses Tibet. China still monitors houses of worship, in order to ensure that clerics don't contradict the government. Child laborers are still commonplace and workplace safety regulations are almost nonexistent. China still begrudgingly tolerates the five "approved" religions, and outlaws all others.

Moreover, this is a slap in the face to our Asian allies in the region, Japan, India, and South Korea have cool relations with the dragon in their back yard. China is Taiwan's most bitter enemy, and China now maintains an estimated five hundred ballistic missiles pointed at the small island nation. All of these nations have reason to fear superior European weapons in the hands of the Chinese military. This flies in the face of prevailing wisdom, which tells us that the EU is deeply concerned with world peace and global stability. On Feb. 15, the UMass Republicans hosted a lecture from a gentleman I know, Mr. Ray Drake. Ray's topic was anti-American bias in the German media, and it attracted a number of people knowledgeable on German affairs. When Ray commented that the Germans "have a very deep sense of pacifism," many of the heads in the room began to nod in agreement.

I disagree. A truly pacifistic nation wouldn't even be in the business of making weapons. In Germany, we find a nation that not only makes weapons, but makes some of the best around — ready to load on ships bound for Beijing. Cash is king, and a 12.6 percent unemployment rate spells death for Schroeder and his party in the 2006 elections.

I have heard so many times that American gluttony is to blame for the war in Iraq, that we need an endless source of oil for our Hummer H2's. Never mind the fact that the price of gas has gone up, the image of bloated, greedy America still lingers. Well, now I'm pointing the finger back at the Germans. Their semi-socialist economy has gone stagnate. They demand healthcare, thirty days vacation, childcare and other social services, a generous safety net for the unemployed, a hefty pension, and free university. While its citizens are making demands of the system, jobs are blowing away in the wind. So in order to sustain an unsustainable system, this nation of "pacifists" is looking for salvation in the form of arms sales to China.

It's called "war-profiteering," and it's what the Europeans accuse the United States of doing all the time. If the Germans need to provide arms to an already dangerous military superpower in order to keep the whole system afloat, then that's what they will do. The 1.5 billion citizens of the US, India, Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan be damned. If only Germans would be half as angry at their own government's foreign policy as they are with ours. Where have all the pacifists gone?

My musical guilty pleasure

Mike Anmuth

Each week before I write a column, I search my mind for an idea, and often I'll stop to read the news on !Yahoo's front page to see if anything really lights my fire. Today, as I was perusing the headlines, I read about the death of country singer Chris LeDoux. Now, as far as country singers go, LeDoux was no Garth Brooks, but interestingly enough, it was one of Garth Brooks' songs that put him on the map.

The Garth Brooks lyrics are from a song titled, "Much Too Young (Too Feel This Damn Old)" and they write, "A worn-out tape of Chris LeDoux, lonely women and bad booze/seem to be the only friends I've left at all."

Attribution of the lyrics goes to the liner notes in the CD, which are provided for each and every Garth Brooks album. Before hearing that particular line, I had never heard of Chris LeDoux, and until I read about him today, I did not know that he was a rodeo cowboy turned country singer. The only thing I did know about him was that the character in the Brooks' song listened to LeDoux tapes until they were worn out, and that was reason enough for me to click on the link and read about his untimely death at 56.

I do not claim to be a country music aficionado. Clearly, there are many more people who love country music far more than me. I listened to country music when I was very young, put it away for many years and then started tuning into country stations while I was traveling across the country to look at colleges. My very first CD was by Garth Brooks, and while I may not still have it in my collection, I have acquired several others of his over the years.

To me, country music is an escape from growing up in a city. While my music collection consists of several genres from the extremely popular to some randomly unknown groups, I find that when I'm driving somewhere unknown late into the evening, I'll flip the dial on to a country music station. Growing up, my parents listened to various types of music and I can still sing along to some folk songs that I first learned very young, but that country music always had a place in my heart.

I've made the assumption that everyone has a guilty pleasure type of music in their collection, and to me, its country music.

While some people listen to it all of the time, I only select country music for particular occasions. It must be the fact that most country songs seem to follow a particular set of storylines; they are either about drinking, breaking up, falling in love, or growing up in the country. Since I cannot empathize well to the last one, being born and raised in Philadelphia, it's the other three options that I tip my cowboy hat towards and show some interest. I think we can all identify with human emotions in our music, no matter what the genre or the category of radio station.

I've made the assumption that everyone has a guilty-pleasure-type-of-music in their collection, and to me, its country music. Until now, I haven't exactly broadcast the fact that sometimes I find solace in listening to people with southern accents tell me about places that I've never seen and small towns that I will probably never visit. Calling it a guilty pleasure allows me to put it on the shelf when I want to listen to more popular music or different genres, and to take it off when I need a good, old fashioned dose of the south to brighten up my day.

Whenever an artist passes, it is a sad event. I wish I had became more familiar with Chris LeDoux's work besides the general passing of it in another artist's lyrics, and perhaps I'll now explore it when I'm looking for something new to play on my stereo. As far as country music goes, I'm going on a road trip for spring break soon and with the hours that will pass as we're driving, I'm sure I'll start to tune the dial to different sounds until I lock on to the local country station.

From there, I'll sing along to the old songs that I remember from years ago and pretend to sing along to the new ones that I simply didn't know. This will work for a while until I tune in to something else, knowing that the country stations will be there the next time I have a hankering to listen to them. As the miles pass and the fiddles and banjos play, I'll put on my cowboy hat and listen intently and empathetically.

SEPARATING POLITICS AND RELIGION

Okay, Thomas Naughton, here's the best way to deal with the re-releasing of "The Passion of the Christ": just don't watch it. I know I'm not going to, but that doesn't mean I'm going to attack those who do.

As an agnostic with no defined doctrine of faith, I have been influenced by people of all faiths, and I realize how crucial it is to respect anyone's religious choices. This does not exclude the Christians or the Catholics, whom many "liberals" have decided can be treated as the exception to their supposed open-mindedness. I welcome anyone who wants to watch Mel Gibson's movie if they find it to be a good expression of their faith. I would choose something that celebrates Jesus' life more than his death, but I understand that his crucifixion is important to many Christians and Catholics. And as a democrat, I am tired of narrow-minded people making our party look bad. Christianity is a religion that is guiltless of taking away "our tree will entirely," as Naughton put it. So why attack it?

Christianity certainly does not dictate that its followers vote republican. For instance, my mother cited many of her Christian values as to why she believed Bush was doing a terrible job in office. Her values included environmentalism, compassion for the poor and the sanctity of human life. So no one feels left out, I would also like to quickly say that being a democrat isn't the ideal way to be Christian, either.

Considering all this, it is important to realize that Christians are also in our party, and we shouldn't make them feel threatened by making our party the one against their religion. The manipulation of religion for the sake of political gain is a terribly selfish thing to do, and I believe that a lot of that went on during the last election. However, this is no fundamentalist state and religion is still one of our many liberties. Absolutely no one is going to force you to watch "The Passion." Therefore, I will not only celebrate my religious freedoms, but the freedoms of the Christians as well. During this season of Lent, I'm happy to hear that they've found a movie about Jesus that truly moves them. Me? My favorite will forever be "Jesus Christ Superstar," which I'll hopefully get to watch with my good pagan friend to celebrate Easter.

DEAR MR. NAUGHTON

I read with great interest Mr. Naughton's column on "The Passion" re-release. I thank you for your honesty and candor in expressing your eloquent critique, and although I don't usually respond to senseless diatribes such as yours, I find it almost impossible to retrain. Columns should serve to stimulate discussion and thought, and yours certainly serves the purpose.

I particularly found humorous the various scenarios of "protest" which you propose. They bespeak an artful imagination. Notable is the "contraption" in item 4. But what is a "carney?" Does this refer to individuals in a carnival who bear some kind of physical aberration?

Are you then (forgive me for being inquisitive), making some sort of humiliating statement regarding the physically disabled? Hmm ... could be a lawsuit there, or at the very least, an inquiry from Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination (MCAD). Isn't your newspaper the organ of an institution funded by the state? Could be risky.

Speaking of discrimination, I notice (starting with the opening header) that you repeatedly use the name of Our Lord. I realize that you don't believe that He is, but many of us do, in a less than prayerful manner. Would you do the same with names that are familiar to Jews, Muslims, Hindus, or Buddhists? I know, you'll say "but they aren't making a movie like this." True, but if they were, would you treat them in the same manner?

Christians are easy to slander, since they've got that "love" thing going. Yes, Tom, and please don't take this the wrong way, we poor misguided "brainwashed" Christians love you and will be praying for you, or at least those of us who are trying to maintain the path. There may be others, sadly, who will undoubtedly want to fit you for one ot your "Thorn-u-copia" creations. I, however, will just pray for you, keeping you in my heart, that you will come to a closer relationship with the God you love to hate. Now understand Tom, that meeting will happen, because I am going to get your name on a long prayer-line, and you know that the "Wherever two or more ... etc." thing really and truly works. When that happens, it's going to be all up to you. He is very understanding, so just speak your mind like you do in your columns and you should be fine.

Well, there is a lot more I could say, but I believe brevity will work in my favor towards getting published, so I will leave you with the present document in hand as it rests.

LET THE READERS DECIDE FOR THEMSELVES

Ladies and Gentlemen, Naughton has done it again. In his latest column, "Oh Jesus," written about "The Passion of The Christ," he further portrays his immaturity and ignorance.

First off, he comes up with seven solutions to dealing with seeing the movie "if" we are forced to see it. I won't even get into the childish and disrespectful solutions he suggests to his readers. I assume they are mature enough to recognize them for what they are, ridiculous.

What's more amazing is Naughton's uncanny ability to perpetuate his anti-Bush and anti-war propaganda, even when writing about a movie that has nothing to do with either.

He refers to our president as a "religious fanatic" and the war as an "our god vs. their god" fight. I think he needs some new material, or at the very least to read the Constitution (probably the first time he will).

This country was founded on freedom from religious persecution. What that means is that Americans are free to have or not to have any religion they choose. This applies to our President Bush too.

In and that there are dozens of religions or variations in the United States, who is the "our god" he is talking about? Naughton refers to those who have yet to see "The Passion" as "un-brainwashed." Are those who have seen it brainwashed?

Naughton needs to stop patronizing his readers. We are free to make up our own minds, about the movie, the war, the president and although you may convince some with the trash you write, it's just that.

Hip-hop

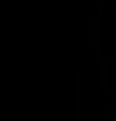
The evolution from small cultural movement to global phenomenon

Hip-hop culture consists of four elements — DJ-ing, rapping, breakdancing and graffiti art.

Old School

Hip-hop arose in the 1970s in the Bronx borough of New York City. By the end of the decade, it had spread to many major cities in the United States, developing into various regional styles.

EARLY '70s

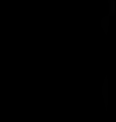


D.J. Kool Herc, considered the godfather of hip-hop, begins DJ-ing block parties in the Bronx. He creates what is known as a breakbeat using two copies of the same record to extend sections in songs for breakdancers to dance. He also creates the first emcee crew called Kool Herc and the Herculoids.

1977

DJ Grandmaster Flash develops the cutting technique to blend music from two records to create a new sound.
DJ Grandwizard Theodore invents scratching.

1979



Hip-hop's recorded history is made when the Sugarhill Gang releases the hit single

"Rapper's Delight" and The Fatback Band with King Tim III release rap records.

1980

Kurtis Blow releases "The Breaks." It becomes the first hip-hop single to be certified gold.

1981

The first non-black hit to feature rapping is Blondie's "Rapture" as Debbie Harry raps on the group's hit release.

1982

Grandmaster Flash and the Furious Five release "The Message." It is the first record to deal with social issues in poor communities

Afrika Bambaataa and Soul Sonic Force release "Planet Rock," mixing rap with synthesized electronic sounds inspired by the German band Kraftwerk

1984

Run DMC's album "Run D.M.C." becomes the first rap album to be certified gold.

1986

Run DMC release their album "Raising Hell." It features a hip-hop remake of Aerosmith's "Walk This Way." The record becomes a crossover hit.

The Beastie Boys release their debut album, "Licensed to Ill," on Def Jam. It becomes the first rap album to reach No. 1 on the charts.

1987

Salt 'N Pepa, the first major black female rap group, get their first hit single, "Push It."

A New Era

West Coast gangsta rap rises into the mainstream as hip-hop continues to grow.

1988

NWA releases their hit debut album, "Straight Outta Compton," bringing gangsta rap to mainstream audiences. DJ Jazzy Jeff (Jeff Townes) and the Fresh Prince (Will Smith) win the first Grammy in Best Rap Performance for "Parents Just Don't Understand."

1989

De La Soul releases their debut album "Three Feet High and Rising." It is considered one of the first albums in the alternative rap genre. The Mismi group 2 Live Crew releases their third album, "As Nasty As They Wanna Be." It becomes the first album to be deemed obscene in the United States

1990

MC Hammer releases his second LP "Please Hammer Don't Hurt 'Em." It sells 10 million albums in the United States, making it the biggest selling rap album ever.

1992

Dr. Dre's former member of NWA releases "The Chronic." He produces a new sound called G-funk. Arrested Development releases their hit album "3 years, 5 months and Two Days in the Life of..." It opens the door for other southern rap groups to achieve mainstream success.

1993

The Wu-Tang Clan emerges during the reign of West Coast rap with the release of their hit album "Enter the Wu-Tang (36 Chambers)."
Snoop Doggy Dogg's album "DoggyStyle" becomes the first rap album to rise to No. 1 on the charts during its first week of release.

1994

Da Brat releases the album "Funkdafied." She becomes the first woman to achieve platinum success.

1996

West Coast rapper Tupac Shakur and East Coast rapper Notorious B.I.G. begin feuding, marking the beginning of the rivalry between the two coasts. In September Shakur is shot in a drive-by after attending a boxing match in Las Vegas. He dies a week later.

1997

In March, Notorious B.I.G. is killed as he leaves a Vibe magazine party in Los Angeles just weeks before the release of his second album "Life After Death."

1998

Lauryn Hill releases "The Miseducation of Lauryn Hill." She becomes the first woman in Grammy history to be nominated for 10 awards. She wins five.

2000

Eminem wins the Grammy for best rap album for "The Slim Shady LP," becoming the first white rapper to win the category.

2004

Outkast earns with album of the year honors at the Grammys for "SpeakerBoxxx/ The Love Below."

CREATING A BREAKBEAT

Originator of the breakbeat, D.J. Kool Herc extended the "break" sections of songs, the part of the song without vocals, only percussion or instrumental. He used two turntables that each had a copy of the record.

1 The cross fader is positioned to side A, so only the sound from that record is heard. The record on side A plays until it reaches the break in the song and plays through. The record on side B is cued up to the beginning of the same break.

KEY: Break | Needle | Song

2 The cross fader is switched to side B at the end of the break on side A. Side B begins playing the break. Side A is reversed to the start of the break.

3 Side B plays through the break to the end. The fader is switched back to side A. Side A begins to play the break again, finishing a loop.

Rapping

The role of an emcee in early hip-hop was to introduce a DJ at parties and keep the crowd excited. Over time, the role grew to rhyming lyrics over the DJ's music.

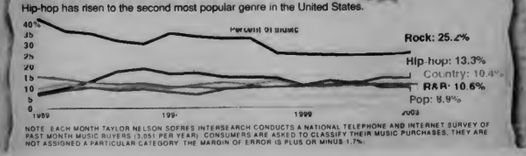
Breakdancing

Breakdancing is an acrobatic dance style developed in the late '70s in New York and Los Angeles.

SAMUEL DEAN-KRT

Graffiti art is illegal in many cities and towns.

Graffiti



Often illegal, spray can art was present in the '60s in Philadelphia and made popular in New York because of elaborate drawings on its subways.

ANGELA PETERSON/KRT

THE RISE OF HIP-HOP

Hip-hop has risen to the second most popular genre in the United States.

Book reveals poker strategies

By JON WIRT
BADGER HERALD

MADISON, Wis. — "You got to know when to hold 'em, know when to fold 'em, know when to walk away and know when to run." While Mike Sexton's new book, "Shuffle Up and Deal," doesn't quite teach the formal strategies sung by Kenny Rodgers, it does provide insight for novice poker players looking to break in on what is quickly becoming the nation's biggest fad.

Sexton provides instant credibility, being a spokesman and commentator for the World Poker Tour. Sexton is a former European poker champ and in his spare time has created "Tournaments of Champion Poker" and "Party Poker Million," both of which are online programs that allow their participants to play in online tournaments. Sexton also writes a regular column for CardPlayer Magazine.

Sexton is by no means a Pulitzer Prize-winning author. His writing is stilted and often corny, but he is informative and knowledgeable, which is really all you need to be in a book of this nature. "Shuffle Up and Deal" is broken up into small, easily readable chapters that provide for a quick read.

Although a complete poker novice might find "Shuffle Up and Deal" helpful, anyone who has played any significant amount will quickly become bored. Although Sexton provides strategies (when to hold 'em and when to fold 'em), they only constitute for a small portion of the book and are somewhat superficial. Sexton does not delve into any statistical analysis of playing hands but instead details commonly known formal strategies such as slow playing or playing a draw hand.

Too often, Sexton seems to just state the obvious. His subchapters labeled "Take Time to Think Things Through" and "Maintain Your Discipline" should come as second nature to any poker player; novice, amateur or anywhere in between. Sexton's book only skims the surface as to what it is to be a champion poker player, partly the reason this book will appeal to only inexperienced poker players.

The most interesting portion Sexton includes is a chapter entitled "World Poker Tour Key Hands." In this chapter, Sexton shows different (more exciting) hands and the strategies used by the players who played them. This is not only the most interesting part of the book but it is the most informative. By showing and not telling, one is able to see why a player would bet in a certain situation, or when they would fold. By doing this, you are able to get into the mind of respected poker players who make a living playing in the circuit.

At times it seems like Sexton was writing to a page limit and not to write a good book. The book has 197 pages, but more than half of the book is completely useless, superfluous information. The middle of the book includes eight glossy photo pages each showing different people playing poker. This is a complete waste of space. It does nothing for anyone to see pictures of people holding cards or huge stacks of chips. It is almost as if Sexton wants to glamorize poker, when in actuality being a professional gambler has its inherent ups and downs (the devastation of the downs most likely being more extreme than the highs of the ups). Sexton also includes a section detailing players who are on the tour and players to watch. The average person who would buy this book is most likely interested in learning how to play poker, not learning the names of professional poker players.

Mike Sexton, host of the "World Poker Tour," deals poker tips in his newest book which also includes a DVD.

An interesting addition to "Shuffle Up and Deal" is the included DVD companion to the book. Part ad for the World Poker Tour, part informational companion (hosted by Lou Diamond Phillips), the DVD is just as superficial as its book. While it is indeed helpful to actually be able to watch the strategies being taught, nothing advanced is ever divulged.

To be fair, reading a book will not make you the next poker champion (especially this book). While poker definitely has a strategy portion to it, it is more of a game of experience and practice. To be able to read your opponent is not something you can learn in a book, and Sexton acknowledges this fact. Witty title aside, "Shuffle Up and Deal" provides the basic knowledge for any novice but will prove dull and repetitive for the more experienced poker player.

'Robots' invades theaters nationwide

By OLGA ROBAK
THE ORACLE

TAMPA, Fla. — As with most recently released animated films, there is an odd dichotomy to 20th Century Fox's "Robots." On one hand, the film tries to cater to adults by including sophisticated yet dirty jokes and spoofs on films such as "Star Wars" and "Braveheart." On the other, its overdone message of self-worth is more annoying than educational, lowering the level at which we expect children to comprehend a simple message.

The thing is that "Robots" is really funny. There's not a minute that goes by without some sort of a joke, crack or spoof that, on instances, will bring a tear of joy to anyone's eye. "Robots" is in part a poignant satire of big-city life, borrowing much of its themes from the early cinematic gem "Metropolis" but adding a comic twist. After all, nothing beats a robot doing the robot.

But it's hard to overlook the embarrassing way in which the film churns out an old formula: The protagonist overcomes all odds, against all odds. Our protagonist is, of course, an intelligent but poor son-of-a-nobody. There's the mean, greedy, dimwitted corporate stooge, the old and lovable do-gooder (replaced by the aforementioned stooge) and the brave, beautiful worker who stands up to her boss and a slew of other cookie-cutter characters.

The film's hour-and-a-half running time is packed with feel-good slogans and highly moralizing propaganda. In true Hollywood fashion, the film ends with a great battle scene, including a parody of the WWF and Britney Spears, in which everyone, even the weakest and smallest, kick some tail to further emphasize this already-too-obvious point.

In all honesty, though, this spoon-fed message is one of the only two things that spoil the film. The second is the tempo, which never slows down and proves much too fast even if the MTV-attention-span stereotypes were true. The film tries to pack everything into that 90 minutes, successfully discarding any dramatic pause or even a dramatic slowdown.

Aside from those couple of blunders the film is a great comedy, appealing to both kids and adults. The imagination of the filmmakers is overwhelming. The music is well-arranged and includes such greats as Tom Waits.

The film's voice cast, headed by Ewan McGregor, does a fine job bringing their animated characters to life. Stealing the scene is Robin Williams, who once and for all proves that he doesn't even have to be on screen to exude comical brilliance. Unfortunately, the film has so many characters that many of them are undeveloped and are reduced to having only a few lines each.

The biggest opportunity for the film is its release in IMAX — a way to cash in on unsuspecting mothers of three dragged to the theater by their kids only to spend 15 bucks a ticket. Given all the circumstances, while everything may be bigger in IMAX, including laughs, the already-overindulgent message will be even more blown out of proportion. And that's something no one should be subjected to.

Robin Williams and Ewan McGregor provide the voices for two of the characters in Twentieth Century Fox's latest computer animation feature film "Robots."

The grunge revival

The Mix Tape

Matt O'Rourke

Remember when putting together a garage band actually involved playing as a group in a garage? How about the ripped jeans and messy hair? Featuring some of the greatest drummers of the past 15 years, and of course, several brilliant guitar riffs, this week's mixtape takes us back to the era of grunge rock.

"Cherub Rock" – The Smashing Pumpkins (4:59)

Opening with Jimmy Chamberlain's classic military-march style drum intro, combined with Iha's singing guitar, the Smashing Pumpkins launch the mixtape with pure power. Make no mistake, everything is heavy in this track, with a fast progression into Billy Corgan's nasally singing. Some will be able to tolerate the wall of sound better than others, and its no surprise that the Pumpkins lasted as long as they did —their reached their potential and continued to experiment with new forms of music. The track ends as it began, with Chamberlain dueling on drums against Iha's intensifying guitar.

"Stay Away" – Nirvana (3:32)

Dave Grohl, another drumming great of the 90s, inaugurates "Stay Away" with an even faster march-like build on snare. Bass is much more noticeable here, as high treble leaves a distinct impact when combined with drums. Soon enough though, Kurt Cobain begins his incoherent rambling, decipherable only to the most diehard of Nirvana fans. Progressing into the chorus, Cobain begins to shout along with guitar, and it's no wonder why so many teens could display their angst through him. If you have survived thus far listening to the tape without the aide of Advil or headache medication, congratulations — you have a high tolerance for noise.
(Geffen Records, 1991)

"Spoonman"- Soundgarden (4:06)

Unlike the previous two songs, Soundgarden doesn't lead in with classic march, but rather what can only be described as sounding "tribal." Of course it helps that the track is about just that — rhythm. Chris Cornell sings, "Spoonman, come together with your hands/Save me, I'm together with your plan/Save me." An interesting, albeit not too surprising, element of the track is the use of spoons — a classic combination of utensils that is most often only found in folk/bluegrass music (or the kitchen).
(A&M Records, 1994)

"Plush" – Stone Temple Pilots (5:12)

In a time long before "super groups" like Velvet Revolver and Audioslave were created, there were the Stone Temple Pilots. With a tone of voice coined by Eddie Vedder of Pearl Jam, the Stone Temple Pilots still managed to create an original hit single. Layered with a high-tone bass, memorable guitar riff and simple drum rhythm, "Plush" is pop enough for the radio, yet solid enough for staunch grunge fans.

"Machinehead" – Bush (4:16)

The guitar portion of the mixtape truly commences with "Machinehead." Gavin Rossedale's singing with a vocal effect of "breathe in, breathe out" synced with a high and low guitar riff, creates an interesting parallel. A song to cure boredom, "Machinehead" remains easy enough to play on guitar. Overlapping guitars and consistent driving drums, with a break at the first chorus that builds the track up again, Bush will keep your ear for remainder of the tune.
(Trauma, 1994)

"Even Flow" – Pearl Jam (4:53)

Regardless of whether or not you feel Pearl Jam or Nirvana was the first "true" grunge band from Seattle, one cannot deny the fact that Eddie Vedder and Kurt Cobain were both incredible songsmiths. Lyrically speaking, "Even Flow" is one of Pearl Jam's best written tracks. Vedder sings "Even flow, thoughts arrive like butterflies/Oh, he don't know, so he chases them away/Someday yet, he'll begin his life again." One listen is simply not enough for this track— only over an extended period of time can a listener truly appreciate the song's complete sound. A flowing guitar rhythm, a true tribute to classic rockers of old, fills "Even Flow," creating a song that helped to define grunge-rock.

"Hey Sandy" – Polaris (2:35)

Kudos to the listener who recognizes this song without needing to know that it was the theme song to mid-nineties Nickelodeon show "The Adventures of Pete and Pete." Opening with a very 1950s sci-fi TV show announcer, promptly followed by a countdown, Polaris soon crash into its familiar guitar riff. Backed by well-placed drumming and an intricate (although in the background) cowbell rhythm, the guitar solo is sure to bring the listener back to earlier days of youth, and hopefully revive memories of childhood. Polaris provides a snapshot of the past, an era where musicians played concerts from their homes to the neighborhood and who knows, we may yet see a "grunge rock revival."

UMass opens series with Eagles tonight

The Minutemen hung with second-seed Boston University on Feb. 18-19 in a pair of losses and then finished their out of conference schedule with a 4-3 come-from-behind win at Niagara on Feb. 26.

For the last month or so, all the Minutemen could talk about was just getting to the playoffs. They knew they underperformed this year, and they knew they could right all of this season's wrongs once the conference tournament started. Here is their chance to do just that.

Still, though, escaping Chestnut Hill this weekend with a series victory will be the toughest task UMass has faced all season.

The Eagles are led on offense by Patrick Eaves, who has a team-leading 17 goals plus 26 assists for a team-best 43 points, and Ryan Shannon has been a nice compliment to Eaves, as he has netted 15 goals and added 26 helpers for 39 points.

If that isn't enough to worry about, the best goaltending tandem in college hockey will be waiting for the Minutemen this weekend, too.

Freshman Cory Schneider (9-0-4) and senior Matti Kaltiainen (11-6-3) sit 1-2 in Hockey East in goals against average. Schneider has only allowed 1.69 goals per game and Kaltiainen is right behind his younger teammate with a 1.81 gaa. The senior has also recorded two shutouts while the rookie has registered one. Neither of the goalies were credited with the shutout against UMass this season, as Kaltiainen was pulled for senior crowd-favorite Robbie Miller for the final 6:54 of the game on Jan. 28.

The winner of this series will advance to the single-elimination semifinal round at the FleetCenter a week from today, and the Hockey East Championship is scheduled the following night.

son. Albany is a similarly young team with only one senior and a core of sophomores and freshmen. Although focused more on her team's improvement, Bolduc isn't ignoring the threat that Spillett and Fontana pose and is learning what she can about Saturday's foe.

"There are two players, [numbers] 13 and 6, one is kind of like our freshman Kathleen [Typadis]. She gets the ball, and she's going to go hard to the cage. We've got to shut her down," Bolduc said. "Also they like to set up picks, especially off-the-ball picks, but besides that we're still getting some more ideas from other teams."

Typadis has been one of the best things to come out of the team's south as she has scored 10 goals in the Minutewomen's first three games including four of the team's seven last week against Harvard. Typadis is quick, relentless and close to unstoppable once she gets going towards the goal. She also represents the whole team's feistiness and persistence as they have proven they will fight to the end of the game no matter what the score is.

Although discipline and turnovers have cost the young team some games early on, there are far worse problems to have according to Coach Bolduc.

"There are so many good things going on right now that we need to keep them focusing on those. Number one, I think is our work ethic and our willing to improve every day. That's a positive," Bolduc said. "Also they like to set up picks, especially off-the-ball picks, but besides that we're still getting some more ideas from other teams."

Sherman says Favre to stay

By Arnie Stapleton
Associated Press

Brett Favre is returning to Green Bay for the 2005 season, Packers coach Mike Sherman told The Associated Press.

Sherman said Thursday he had a two-hour conversation with his quarterback on Wednesday night. Favre informed him his wife is doing well in her cancer treatment, so he's planning to play at least one more season, maybe more if his own health holds up.

"It came down to his wife and she's doing well in her recovery," Sherman said. "She wants him to play. He said he's looking forward to playing — hopefully without any off-the-field situations and 'enjoying the journey.'"

The three-time MVP said after the Packers' playoff loss to Minnesota in January he wanted to reflect before committing to playing a 15th NFL season following a year of personal tumult.

His wife, Deanna, was diagnosed with breast cancer in October, a week after the death of her 24-year-old brother in an ATV accident on the quarterback's property in Mississippi.

And Favre was still dealing with the stunning news of Reggie White's death on the day after Christmas, which came about a year after the death of Favre's father, Irv, from a heart attack.

"After the season, he just needed to think about some things," Sherman said. "Any man would have to contemplate his future when his wife is fighting cancer. It's not like he had to work to make money. He didn't want to be a part-time husband and a part-time football player. It came down to his wife. If she's not healthy, it's obviously a different ballgame. But now she's doing good. She wants him to play."

It never was a question of diminished ability because even at 35, Favre is still near the top of his game.

He topped 4,000 yards passing last season and recorded his eighth 30-touchdown season, twice as many as any other quarterback in NFL history, and the Packers set franchise records for total offense and net passing yards in 2004.

"He's always been excited about playing football," Sherman said. "He's never lost his enthusiasm for the game. It's just his family situation was pulling at him."

Next season won't necessarily be Favre's farewell, either.

"As long as he can play at a Brett Favre level, he will," Sherman said, "unless some situation off the field, outside of football, affects him or his family."

Deanna Favre has completed her chemotherapy and is undergoing radiation treatment.

The Favres are helping put on a Faith Hill concert back home Saturday night to benefit breast cancer patients. Favre is scheduled to appear at the Packers' inaugural fan fest that morning in Green Bay.

After the Packers were upset 31-17 by the Vikings in the wild-card round of the playoffs — Green Bay's second playoff loss at home in three years — Favre said he needed some time to figure out his future.

Last season, Favre extended his record of 225 consecutive starts at quarterback, despite being on the injured report three times. Since his first start on Sept. 27, 1992, 183 other quarterbacks have made their NFL debut.

Because Favre hasn't spoken publicly about his plans, it wasn't known before Thursday whether the retooled coaching staff, the stripping of Sherman's GM duties in favor of Ted Thompson or the loss of starting guards Marco Rivera and Mike Wahle in free agency would play a role in his decision.

Rivera signed with Dallas and Wahle with Carolina last week, leaving two gaping holes in an offensive line that allowed a franchise-low 14 sacks last season.

Sherman said the only thing Favre had to say about the loss of the guards was they deserved the multimillion-dollar bonuses they received.

"I told him we'll get that fixed," Sherman said. "It never was an issue. Brett said he was excited about what we did on offense last year and he thinks we can do more this year.

"Obviously, his major thing is to win another Super Bowl and he's excited about having that chance."

Brett Favre will have more opportunities to celebrate against the Chicago Bears, as Packers coach Mike Sherman said Favre will not retire.

At least six Red Sox tested for steroids

FORT MYERS, Fla. — At least six Boston Red Sox players were tested Thursday as part of Major League Baseball's program to curb steroid use.

Team vice president Mike Port said six to 12 players were tested but he was not allowed to give out names. He was contacted Wednesday night by the independent company conducting the tests and told they would be done on Thursday.

He received the list of players Thursday morning and said all cooperated with the testing. Additional Red Sox players can be tested later.

Random testing has already been conducted at several other spring training camps.

Port said he didn't know when the results would be known but assumed the team only would be notified if a player failed. Under baseball's new program, a first-time offender would be suspended for 10 days without pay.

Red Sox player representative Johnny Damon said he wasn't tested and strongly supports the program.

"I don't want my kid to ever say, 'oh, maybe I need to do this to get bigger and stronger.' I don't want that so I definitely want it cleaned up," he said.

A congressional committee looking into baseball's steroid program has subpoenaed Boston ace Curt Schilling and six other former or current players to testify at a hearing on March 17. He did not speak with reporters before Thursday's exhibition game against the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Stanley Brand, a lawyer for the baseball commissioner's office, has said the committee had no jurisdiction, was trying to violate baseball's first amendment privacy rights, and was attempting to "satisfy their prurient interest into who may and 'may not have engaged in this activity."

The 'juicing' issue just won't seem to die

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

You wish there were some good guys in this stinking drama to rally around.

You wish the whole thing would go away because this is a time, after all, when the grass turns green and hope is supposed to spring eternal for all baseball fans.

The good guys, though, are about as elusive as the real ingredients in the "clear" that Barry Bonds mistakenly thought was a nutritional supplement used to lower cholesterol, not build giant muscles.

And now that politicians have their fingers firmly imbedded in this juiced-up pie, get used to the idea that — no matter how much you hate to keep hearing about it — this will be the season of steroids.

You'll hear about it from now through opening day as politicians, ballplayers, owners and union figures engage in a snake dance that couldn't be any sleazier if it was conducted in a strip club rather than the halls of Congress.

You'll hear it every time Jason Giambi comes to the plate and hits a routine fly ball that might have gone out of the ballpark a few years earlier.

The talk will grow as Bonds draws nearer to Babe Ruth and eventually passes baseball's most revered icon, all the while thumbing his nose at the very fans who pay to cheer him on.

Finally, it will explode as he chases Henry Aaron and baseball's home run record.

By then, you'll groan at the very mention of steroids. You'll turn down the television when the subject comes up, and scan past the stories in the newspaper.

Most of all, though, you'll wish that performance-enhancing drugs hadn't defaced the sport you love.

The sad truth is that they have, no matter how often Bud Selig winds himself up and pretends otherwise. The sad truth is that baseball's records are now as tainted as the drug samples the sport never bothered to take until after Bonds hit 73 home runs in one season.

Baseball owners won't take any responsibility for the integrity of the game because they're too busy building new stadiums and counting luxury box revenues sparked by the home run binge of recent years. Neither will baseball players, an immensely spoiled group of multimillionaires who don't feel they are accountable to anyone.

So here come the nation's lawmakers, who got where they are by being able to recognize opportunity when they see it. A House committee invited players, owners and union reps to come to Washington, D.C. on March 17 to testify under oath about baseball's dirty little secrets.

On Wednesday, after figuring out the players wouldn't come without a little persuasion, they issued subpoenas.

You would think Selig and his flunkies would embrace the invitations and be happy that stars like Giambi, Sammy Sosa, Rafael Palmeiro and former slugging hero Mark McGwire would have a chance to clear their names before the season starts.

Instead, baseball attorney Stanley Brand reacted with the kind of outrage not seen on Capitol Hill since french fries were renamed freedom fries in protest over France's stand on the war in Iraq.

Brand called the subpoenas "an absolutely excessive and unprecedented misuse of congressional power" and suggested the House Government Reform Committee was interfering with the work of the federal grand jury in California by ordering Giambi to testify.

You might expect baseball's union to object because unions are supposed to protect players no matter what.

But why is management so averse to seeing the truth come out? What is it that baseball has to fear from players testifying under oath?

"What kind of message does that send?" asked David Marin, a spokesman for committee chairman Rep. Tom Davis.

The kind that you have something to hide, of course. The same kind of message McGwire's agent sent by asking, "What's the ultimate purpose of the hearings?"

It might be to find out exactly what happened in 1998 when McGwire and Sosa combined for 136 home runs. What do either McGwire or Sosa have to lose by testifying under the penalty of law that they took nothing illegal in that magical season?

It would also be nice to hear Bonds tell how he grew so big at an age when many athletes find it tougher to keep muscle mass. But Bonds was not invited to the hearing because people used to not giving straight answers themselves know they'll never get one out of Barry.

Meanwhile, the politicians are still opportunists, baseball's management remains incredibly pigheaded and the players care only about covering their own backs.

Minutemen kick off playoffs against BC

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Nothing has come easy for the Massachusetts hockey team this season.

Nothing.

There have been no silver platters, no cups of tea, no candy-yielding babies, no nothing.

So why should anything be different now?

The Minutemen (13-21-2 6-16-2 HEA) open their best-of-three quarterfinal playoff series with Boston College (21-6-7 14-3-7 HEA) tonight at 7 p.m. The series will continue tomorrow night, and if a third game is necessary, it will be played on Sunday with all start times at 7 p.m. Since the Eagles are the higher seed, all three games will be played at Conte Forum in Chestnut Hill.

The Eagles aren't just the higher seed, though. They are the top seed after winning the Hockey East regular season championship for the third year in a row.

Boston College also poses another problem for the Minutemen. UMass has not beaten the Eagles since Jan. 3, 2003, a 3-2 victory at Conte Forum, and since that time, the Minutemen have an 0-6-1 record against their cross-state rivals.

The one tie came on Nov. 12 earlier this season, a 3-3 deadlock at Conte, but the Eagles shellacked UMass in a home-and-home series on Jan. 28-29, by 5-2 and 6-0 margins, respectively.

So the one biggest question remains in the UMass corner this weekend: How in the world do the Minutemen beat Boston College?

UMass coach Don Cahoon said that the first thing his team needs to make sure to do is to not beat themselves.

The Eagles have done a pretty decent job, to say the least, at beating their opposition this year, so any frailties by the Mass Attack need to be avoided so they don't do the Eagles' job for them.

UMass has played some solid hockey over the past couple weeks, with the exception of its third period at Northeastern on Saturday night in which UMass allowed four goals to make what was once a 4-3 game an 8-3 afterthought.

UMass ready for Stony Brook

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and the Stony Brook Seawolves have a lot in common this season. Both teams are undefeated, and neither has truly been challenged.

Tomorrow at 12 p.m. UMass will face off against a red-hot Stony Brook team that has posted two convincing victories to kick off the season.

The Seawolves have outscored their opponents 28-11 thus far with huge victories over Delaware (a 14-9 victory Feb. 26) and Wagner (14-2) on Saturday. Stony Brook had its momentum slowed when its game against No. 15 Army, slated for Tuesday, was postponed due to inclimate weather; no makeup has been scheduled.

UMass has also started the season on the right foot, posting a 12-7 victory over Hofstra on Feb. 26 followed by a 12-6 drubbing of Yale on Saturday. Like the Seawolves, the Minutemen were slowed by weather and could not travel to Cambridge to play Harvard on Wednesday. The rematch has been set for April 26.

Stony Brook has gotten a lot of its production from an unlikely source. Freshman attackman Bo Tripodi leads the team with seven goals on the season. Tripodi has been complemented by the unselfish play of junior Adam Marksberry, who has three goals of his own but leads the team with six assists.

KAREN WINEGRAD/COLLEGIAN

Jeff Zywicki has scored five goals in two games this season.

Tripoldi was named the America East Rookie of the Week last week and currently ranks second in the conference in goals per game with 3.50.

One of the Seawolves' main strengths has been their goalkeeping. Stony Brook has one of the best keepers in the nation in sophomore Brendan Callahan. Callahan was an honorable mention All-American last year and led the nation in save percentage (.687) and goals against average (5.97).

While starting, Callahan has compiled an 11-3 record, with one of the losses coming against UMass last season.

The Maroon and White demolished the Seawolves 10-3 at Stony Brook on March 6.

The Minutemen have played a balanced offensive attack that has seen 10 different player score a goal. Leading the way has been Sean Morris and Jeff Zywicki, who have scored 12 goals between them.

Morris was named the ECAC Offensive Player of the Week and the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the week last week. Morris, who was picked as the Preseason Offensive Player of the Year in the ECAC, has a team-leading seven goals and an assist on the season.

A major highlight of the Minutemen's success has been their defensive tenacity. Over the course of the season UMass has held its opponents to a dismal .232 shooting percentage.

Co-captain Matt Garcia and starting keeper Bill Schell have been the anchors for the Minutemen thus far this season. Garcia was picked as a Preseason All-American, while Schell has been the starting goalie for the Minutemen throughout the last four years.

Schell remains the vocal leader on defense. He has faced just 56 shots on the season, as opposed to the 89 UMass has taken.

Bullpen has been shaky early in season

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

As the Massachusetts baseball team prepares for its spring training, where they will play seven different opponents over eight days down in the cozy confines of Bradenton, Fla., both good news and bad news will be hanging over their heads.

No. 1 starting pitcher Matt Torra has been absolutely brilliant in his first two starts of the season for the Minutemen (1-5), striking out 24 batters in two appearances (15 innings total) while recording a team-best 1.20 earned run average, stepping in adequately thus far for since-departed ace Eric Chown, who is now in the Atlanta Braves organization.

Now, for the bad news. Torra has yet to receive a win, thanks in part to a suspect bullpen.

Take their season-opener on Feb. 25 against New Orleans, for instance, when Dave Sullivan was summoned to the mound following a no-run, seven-inning, 10-strikeout performance from Torra. Sullivan gave up one earned run and consequently lasted just one inning in favor of freshman Jason Lavorgna. After Lavorgna gave up the tying run and loaded up the bases with one out in the bottom of the ninth, he too was sent packing, this time in favor of redshirt-freshman Chris Sargoy.

Sargoy's 1-2 fastball was a little too high on the No. 4 hitter, Tony Gonzalez, and in walked the winning run.

More of the same happened against Delaware last weekend. After Torra fanned 14 and allowed just two runs against a power-hitting Blue Hens squad in the first game of a Saturday doubleheader, Sargoy and Sullivan let the game run away from them in extra innings, with the Minutemen falling 3-2 in 10. Lavorgna, however, did get a save two days after the New Orleans breakdown, against the very same foes.

Certainly the injury of reliever Jason Hickey, who was involved in an automobile accident during the off-season, hasn't aided things.

"It was time for Hickey to make a positive contribution for the ball club," coach Mike Stone said. "He had shown some positive things in the past that have indicated that he'd be able to help out, but it didn't work out. We can't really dwell on the guys that aren't here or aren't able to play, so we've got to move on."

After losing Chown, Matt Reynolds, Cullan Maumus, Mike Athas and Sean Sarno to graduation, as well as losing would-be junior catcher Frank Curreri to a minor league contract with the Arizona Diamondbacks, it's no secret that youth was going to flood the 2005 Minutemen. Hence, the need for leadership from upperclassmen, and they've found some in the likes of seniors Curt Szado and Jason Twomley and junior Derek Durepo.

Szado currently leads the team in batting, with an average of .389, four runs batted in and seven hits, including a 4-for-4 day in their only win against New Orleans in the three-game February series. Twomley is right behind him, with a .293 average to accompany a team-high two home runs, four runs scored, 11 total bases and a .647 slugging percentage. Enter Durepo (.273, six hits) into the mix and you've got a foundation that can be looked up to.

"We really have asked them to [lead by example], and I think they have definitely responded," Stone said. "It's a great challenge to have so many new people playing that it would be very satisfying to get to the point where we have a good ball club, and we've experienced success — a lot of success."

Now, for some bad news. Twomley broke his wrist last weekend in Delaware and won't be seeing any playing time down in Florida.

As for Florida, the Minutemen are hoping to come out of Bradenton with a winning record this time around, after going 3-5 in 2004.

The Maroon and White start off the week against the Eastern Kentucky Colonels, a team that has been struggling as of late as well. Although the Minutemen got shelled 13-0 and 13-1 in consecutive games, they have nothing on Central Michigan's 19-1 rout of EKU.

Later in the week, UMass plays Miami of Ohio in a game that has been a year in the making. In 2004, the Red Hawks rallied from a 5-2 deficit in the seventh inning, aided by a momentum-changing three-run homer by All-American Mike Ferris that put them in the lead for good, to upset the Minutemen in the spring training finale, 8-6.

But It's just another game in Stone's mind, as he refuses to look ahead to anything beyond Eastern Kentucky.

"We're approaching every one of these games the same," Stone said. "We're not looking ahead."

Minutewomen look to improve record against Great Danes

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

The youthful Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (1-2) will take on the slow-starting Great Danes of Albany (1-4) tomorrow at a cold and potentially snowy Garber Field in Amherst.

The Minutewomen are looking to rebound from a hard fought 12-7 loss last week at Harvard. It will be the small things that will have to get the team back on the winning track as they had 21 turnovers against the Crimson last Saturday. Coach Carrie Bolduc has been stressing the importance of these fundamentals all week in practice.

"We've been focusing on discipline, details and pretty much just stepping it up another level," said Bolduc, "but really emphasizing discipline, the small things, the basic fundamentals."

The problem is that discipline and those small things don't come as a surprise this year as there are only three seniors on the team, and as many as eight freshmen were on the field at one point last week in Cambridge. In order to win on Saturday, the Minutewomen will have to learn quickly from their early troubles and use their never-give-up mentality.

"It's the small things like cutting back to the ball, and our transition is hurting us now," Bolduc explained. "Really knowing what we're good at and making sure that we do that in the game. We're not taking care of the ball. Transitions [have] got to pick up."

Of course the Minutewomen won't just be competing with their disciplinary problems; they'll have to deal with Albany's strong sophomore duo of Sarah Spillett, who has five goals and six assists, and Kate Fontana, who has eight goals and one assist in the young season.

Boston College chokes in final Big East game in school history

By Dennis Waszak Jr.
Associated Press

NEW YORK — West Virginia made sure Boston College's last appearance in the Big East tournament was brief.

Mike Gansey scored 21 points and West Virginia hung on to upset No. 7 Boston College 78-72 in the quarterfinals Thursday, ruining the Eagles' bid for a final conference championship.

"It's a great feeling to come in here, play against a good team and prove that we're a good team," Mountaineers center Kevin Pittsnogle said. "We're having a lot of fun."

Pittsnogle added 17 points for the Mountaineers (20-9), who very likely wrapped up at least an NCAA tournament at-large bid by impressing the selection committee with the surprising win over the Big East's top seed.

"That committee is so thorough with this thing and they will choose the right teams," West Virginia coach John Beilein said. "Obviously, I'm biased, but they will choose the right teams and there's no doubt in our minds that we're one of the right teams."

West Virginia, the No. 8 seed, improved to 3-8 in the tournament and advanced to its first semifinals — against Villanova — Friday night at Madison Square Garden. Making the win even more impressive was the fact that the Mountaineers did it without top scorer Tyrone Sally, who missed the game with a stomach ailment.

Craig Smith scored 20 points and grabbed eight rebounds for Boston College (24-4), which leaves the Big East for the Atlantic Coast Conference after this season.

"They came out and were aggressive," Smith said. "When you're top dog, people are going to come for you. You know, this is a wakeup call for us. We still have a chance to do something special."

The Eagles, who shared the regular-season title with Connecticut, sputtered through their last eight games, going just 4-4 after starting off 20-0 and possibly hurting their chances at earning a top-3 seed.

"Guys have to take a little pride in themselves and with their team and go out and work harder," Boston College coach Al Skinner said. "It's just that simple. Our preparation, our focus has got to be there. Right now, it's lacking."

West Virginia beat Providence 82-59 in the first round Wednesday and looked as though it would run away with another win against Boston College before the Eagles stormed back.

The Mountaineers took their biggest lead — 25 points — just 19 seconds into the second half on Gansey's three-point play that made it 47-22.

"We didn't come out and play the way we're capable of playing," Boston College's Jared Dudley said. "West Virginia came out, were more aggressive and executed their offense. We didn't defend them at all."

Trailing 50-26, Boston College went on a 10-0 run, capped by consecutive dunks by Sean Marshall to get the Eagles within 14 at 50-36 with 13:16 left.

The Eagles continued to whittle away at the lead, but the 6-foot-11 Pittsnogle hit a 3-pointer with 8:16 left to make it 58-44.

Boston College went on an 11-5 run, capped by Marshall's 3-pointer, to make it 62-58 with 4:41 left.

"We imploded there for I don't know how long it was — it seemed like a year," Beilein said.

West Virginia scored the next three baskets — including the third of Pittsnogle's 3-pointers on the day — to push the lead back up to 11 and prompt fans to chant "ACC! ACC!"

"Thank goodness Kevin hits the big 3 and then we did some other things well, but we're going to take it," Beilein said. "We're going to take it and move on to the semis."

As the teams traded foul shots during the last minute, the fans got on Boston College even more, chanting "Overrated!"

West Virginia, which shot 10-for-18 from 3-point range, was 8-for-11 from long distance at halftime — a major reason the Mountaineers led 44-22 at the break.

Dudley scored 17 points and Marshall 15 for Boston College, which had won seven of the last eight meetings.

"They were just way too comfortable in the first half," Skinner said. "There was no real defensive energy for us."

TOM LYNN/MCT WIRE FOR FINAL

Jermaine Watson couldn't handle losing to Georgia Tech on March 21, 2004, and the Eagles choked again as they couldn't knock off lower-seeded West Virginia in the Big East quarterfinals yesterday. WVU made sure BC left the Big East for the ACC on a bad note.

Child care fee increase worries faculty

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

Last week, the University of Massachusetts informed the University Child Care Center it will be raising fees for their full-day scheduled classrooms. With this change in rate, parents with children in this program will be paying $13,540 a year for full-day care the next two years.

Parents, although satisfied full-day classrooms will remain open in the future, expressed their concerns towards this increase. In 2000, it cost $4,732 a year for families; and members of UMass' Graduate Employee Organization pointed out this climb will effect international students and lower-middle class families with children in the program the most. Some of them do not qualify for subsidies, such as childcare vouchers provided by the Graduate Student Senate; as well as assistance from Commuter Services, the Housing Resource Center, and undergraduate Student Government Association. As fees increase, these subsidies will shrink from the 15 to 30 percent deductions now provided for families in need of aid.

"These new fee increases are part of a disinvestments in campus families under the current Chancellor," stated Jen Turner, GEO president.

The University Child Care Center, which provides full-day and flexible schedules for UMass undergraduate, graduate, international students as well as faculty members, serves as a place to bring children when at class and work. Under the flexible schedule, two classrooms at UCC allow 9 to 50 hours of childcare a week. Nearly 100 children go to the center under both programs. A union for graduate students who work on campus, such as class TA's; the Graduate Employee Organization, focuses on improving working conditions, wages, healthcare, and childcare. GEO funds flexible-care classrooms at UCC, a part of the group's labor contract.

"When the cost goes up for full-time, families will miss out," said Megan McDonough, Family Issues Advocate for GEO. McDonough, a graduate student in regional planning at UMass who has a three-year-old in preschool enrolled at UCC told of the limitations to this new plan. She feels it will be hard for graduate students, especially international ones to afford the rate.

"I know families who left UCC last year because of fee increases," McDonough said. "If you add this to you're health care fees and cost of living, you really can't afford it as a graduate student. It really makes ends hard to meet."

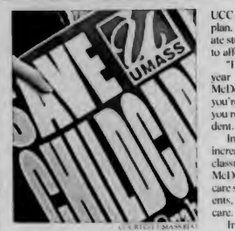
In the past years, UCC has faced rate increases before in order to keep full-day classrooms running for the children. McDonough stated before the flexible-care schedule was made available for parents, UMass helped more with full-time care.

In January 2000, the University claimed it would close UCC's full-day classrooms. However, UMass decided in later months they would remain open. A statement was released by the University that said, "fewer classrooms will be open and not all of the 22 employees who received lay of notices will be called back. There will also be an increase in parents' fees and a different program."

"After flexible care was created, UCC was told to be more self-sufficient and less aid was given," added McDonough. "We fought really hard for funding with this schedule and made it so UMass cannot raise its fees without negotiating with GEO."

Others stated raising the fee for full-day care was necessary in keeping the classrooms open for children.

"In the past, we've had to make these changes, but it's important we keep this program going," said Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life.



Gargano, working with UCC Center Director Mary Anne Gallagher, approved the budget plan for the fee increase.

"The good news is full-day classrooms will continue, that was uncertain the past few years," added Gallagher. "But at the same time, you have to take the good with the bad."

"UMass's proposals can mean that a parent pays over 80% of their income in childcare fees, which will make attending UMass out of the question. In contrast, the total cost to run the Center with its current fees is less than 1/1000th of UMass' budget," expressed GEO member Chelsea Dacres-Smith.

Lynn Hatch, UMass graduate student in the Economics department, had her son enrolled in UCC's full-day program but had to look elsewhere for care after fees increased last year. For three years, Hatch tried to keep her child at UCC, working as a TA and assisting in teaching Economics courses.

"My son had been there since a toddler," explained Hatch. "When the fees went up last year, I had to leave. He made many friends there and was in a full-day classroom 3 days a week. He learned a lot there and I was able to go to class, work, and study. I wasn't worried about if he was not having a good time. I couldn't have done it on my own, he needed the socialization and I needed the support."

Chancellor releases report

A new chancellor's tax is set to be taken from UMass' general fund following University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi's report that he reviewed recommendations given by the Commission for Campus Diversity.

On Saturday, March 12, Lombardi issued a 17-page report on the Commission's website. The Commission issued recommendations to Lombardi in an 86-page report on March 1.

The report outlined many specific recommendations that Lombardi feels will help out diversity on the campus. The initiative would cost more than $1 million, and of that, $800,000 would go to a chancellor's tax. The tax will be made up of existing budgets in a wide range of university departments.

The biggest change that Lombardi recommended was a plan to reorganize more than 40 student groups into an umbrella that falls under a new center that will be developed. Heading the center will be a new associate vice chancellor.

Since the center would be a part of the University's Department of Student Affairs and Campus Life, it would untimely be led by the head of that department, Michael Gargano, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Included in the groups are the Office of ALANA Affairs, Office of Jewish Affairs, Lesbian, Gay, Bi-Sexual, Transgender and The Daily Collegian, among many others. One of the recommendations that the Commission made that Lombardi did not grant was a central request for the university to hire a senior-level administer to initiate efforts to boost the inclusion of minorities.

Besides the new center, Lombardi plans to increase undergraduate advising and increase the number of minority students who are involved in the university honors programs. He plans to reward departments who succeed in hiring a diverse group of faculty and graduating seniors.

Currently, the plan is going through a review period that will last through April 1. During this time, people can express their objections to the plan by e-mailing campusdiversity@umass.edu. The plan is supposed to go into affect on April 11, after the public comment period.

The entire statement, as well as the Commission's recommendations two weeks ago, can be viewed at the Commission's Web site at http://www-.umass.edu/campusdiversity/.

Tasers for UMass?

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The use of Taser weapons by police departments has sparked heated debate nationwide over whether the weapons are humane or even necessary.

Here at the University of Massachusetts, the police department announced in September 2004 that it is looking into purchasing the weapons, which have been deemed "non-lethal" by officials in the past.

UMass is currently awaiting a review from the Executive Office of Public Safety before purchasing the Tasers. The EOPS review may take a few months to complete.

"UMass is not currently purchasing Tasers," said UMass Chancellor John Lombardi. "The state is evaluating the safety of the devices and we await further information before considering these devices."

The University may not currently have plans to purchase Tasers, but UMass Police are definitely considering the weapons as an option. Four officers are in the process of being trained as Taser instructors, including Det. Lt. Robert Thrasher.

"The Tasers give us a tool to add to [our arsenal] that's much more humane," Thrasher said. "It's a very humane tool."

Currently, the four UMPD officers must receive an additional four hours of training to be qualified as training instructors by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In terms of a plan to implement the use of Tasers on campus, UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor explained. "We're not even there yet."

"We continue to do more research on [the Tasers]," she said.

Recently members of the Student Government Association, who have expressed strong disagreement with the Taser idea, spoke with O'Connor and other police officials on the Taser issue.

"We had a good exchange of ideas," O'Connor said. "I think the SGA is going to be working with police on this matter."

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante said he was pleased with the meeting.

"It's an example of the administration listening to students," Bustamante said.

Taser International, a manufacturer of the weapon, says Tasers can fire at a target between 16 and 21 feet away. The weapon fires two needles, which penetrate the skin and deliver an electric shock for about five seconds. The wires deliver a 50,000-volt charge at 1.36 joules of electricity. By comparison, a heart defibrillator has 300 joules.

Thrasher experienced the effects of the Taser firsthand while participating in Taser instructor training. He described the pain as being immediate, but intense.

"Someone pulls the trigger and your body immediately tenses," he said. "You're in pain for about five seconds and it's over. That's all the time we need to put handcuffs on someone."

The issue of Tasers being used on the UMass campus has sparked discussion after it was first publicized in a January Boston Herald article. Many student leaders are against the idea. The SGA even went so far as to post giant letters that spell the words "NO TASERS" across their Student Union

Massive earthquake rocks Japan, injuring very few

By Kenji Hall
Associated Press

TOKYO — A powerful earthquake rattled southern Japan on Sunday, swaying buildings and briefly prompting warnings of tsunami. At least five people were injured and smaller aftershocks continued to rattle the region.

The magnitude-7 temblor, which hit west of Kyushu Island at 10:53 a.m. local time, was centered at an "extremely shallow" depth below the ocean floor, the Meteorological Agency said. An hour after the initial temblor, aftershocks followed — at least one a magnitude-4.2 quake.

An hour after the initial quake, the agency said the tsunami danger had passed.

"There may be some disturbance of the ocean's surface, but we aren't worried about tsunami damage," said Masahiro Yamamoto of the Meteorological Agency.

At least five people were injured, most in the southern state of Fukuoka, some struck by toppling cabinets or items falling off shelves, and one burned by a cooking stove, public broadcaster NHK TV said.

In Okawa city, a 56-year-old man suffered broken bones after trying to jump to safety from the second floor of his home, the network said.

One person was reportedly pinned inside a collapsed home.

Officials reported water main breaks, and the possibility of power blackouts. Local and bullet train railway service was halted, after an automatic safety mechanism was triggered by the tremors, NHK reported.

Local officials Fukuoka, about 562 miles southwest of Tokyo, told NHK that the shaking, which lasted as long as 30 seconds, toppled desks and knocked books off shelves and made it difficult to stand.

NHK showed tall office buildings and street lamps in the center of Fukuoka, nearest the epicenter, shaking violently. In residential areas, cracks appeared in sidewalks and parts of retainer walls flaked off.

Authorities warned of landslides around the states of Fukuoka, Saga and Nagasaki.

Sex offender stands trial for young girl's murder

By Mike Branom
Associated Press

HOMOSASSA, Fla. — The convicted sex offender who authorities say confessed to kidnapping and slaying 9-year-old Jessica Lunsford returned to Florida in shackles Sunday as her family grieved for the girl who vanished from her bedroom.

John Evander Couey was booked early Sunday on a probation violation and failure to register as a sex offender, officials said. He was being held without bail.

Couey, 46, confessed to kidnapping and killing Jessica after taking a lie-detector test Friday in Georgia, officials said. The girl's body was found early Saturday, more than three weeks after she was snatched from her bedroom.

Jessica's father, in an emotional statement, expressed a desire to mete out justice of his own.

"I won't get the wish, but I wish I could see him, just one time," said Mark Lunsford, his eyes hidden by dark sunglasses.

Lunsford said he and his relatives would soon begin planning Jessica's funeral.

Couey had not been charged in her death, although that was expected soon.

"If he's not charged today, he probably will be tomorrow," sheriff's spokeswoman Ronda Hemminger Evan told The Associated Press. "It shouldn't take that long."

At Jessica's church on Sunday, the pastor asked for prayers for the Lunsfords.

"Lord, we don't always understand your

Congress passes law for Schiavo

PINELLAS PARK, Fla. — While Terri Schiavo lay in her hospice bed Sunday, the severely brain-damaged woman's parents and husband made competing pleas to the public and Congress on her third day without food or water.

As protesters and TV satellite trucks gathered outside the hospice, the Senate passed a bill that could prolong Schiavo's life while a federal court considers her case. House Republicans scrambled to bring enough lawmakers back to the Capitol for an emergency vote early Monday after Democrats objected to a vote by a small handful of lawmakers.

President Bush was cutting short a stay at his Texas ranch and returning to the White House to sign it. An attorney for Schiavo's parents said every federal judge that could hear the case has agreed to take it on an emergency basis once the bill passes. A judge will be chosen at random, and the attorney hopes to immediately have Schiavo taken to a hospital to have the tube reinserted.

"We feel every moment is urgent; we are considering every second as precious in terms of saving Terri," said David Gibbs II, an attorney for Bob and Mary Schindler.

Schiavo's husband, Michael Schiavo, said he was outraged that congressional leaders were intervening in the contentious right-to-die battle with Schiavo's parents, Bob and Mary Schindler. They have been fighting for years over whether she should be permitted to die or kept alive by the feeding tube.

"I think that the Congress has more important things to discuss," he told CNN, calling the move political and criticizing House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who helped broker the congressional compromise.

Mary Schindler pleaded for parents nationwide to call their congressional representatives and pressure them to vote for a bill to prolong her daughter's life. "There are some congressmen that are trying to stop this bill," she said outside her daughter's hospice. "Please don't use my daughter's suffering for your own personal agenda."

Outside the hospice, a subdued crowd of about 50 people prayed and sang behind signs bearing such slogans as "Let Terri Live" and "President Bush Please Save Terri." One man played "Amazing Grace" on a trumpet, as a pickup truck pulled a trailer bearing 10-foot-high replicas of the stone Ten Commandments tablets and a huge working version of the Liberty Bell.

Missing girl's body found in FL

ways," the Rev. William LaVerle Coats told 175 grieving people during Sunday's services at Faith Baptist Church, where many people saw the girl for the last time on the night she disappeared. "We accept what has taken place here, and ask that you would give us some peace."

Coats asked churchgoers to forgive Couey. Jessica's father said he may have a hard time with that request.

"He needs to stand up and be a man now and take his death penalty," Mark Lunsford said.

Earlier, Couey appeared before Circuit Judge Stephen Spivey at the Citrus County Detention Center. He was declared indigent and was told a public defender would be assigned to his case.

He answered that he was doing "all right," when the judge asked how he was.

Couey answered all other questions with either "Yes, sir" or "No, sir" replies.

At the end of the hearing, Spivey wished the man luck. "Thank you," Couey said softly, before turning and shuffling away, his shackles clanging together.

Couey was returned to Florida in an unmarked sheriff's vehicle, wearing a bullet-proof vest and under the cloak of darkness.

He was being held in isolation at the jail for his safety, Henminger Evan said.

As a precaution, the timing of his arrival from Georgia was kept secret, although the sheriff's office was not aware of any threats against Couey.

Down the street from the Lunsford home and the church, well-wishers piled dozens of stuffed animals, flowers and candles high on a makeshift memorial. "God's newest little angel," one sign read.

At the memorial, businessman Joseph Dawson joined Jessica's father and circulated a petition calling for harsh penalties on sexual predators. The petition called for predators to face 50-year mandatory sentences and the indefinite wearing of electronic monitoring bracelets.

"It's time for us not to get angry. It's time for us to do something," Dawson said.

Jessica, a third grader, was last seen in February when she went to bed after attending church.

She was discovered missing the next morning, with the door unlocked and her stuffed animal gone.

The clothes she had laid out for school were still in place, and her shoes weren't missing.

Her body was found near a mobile home where Couey had been staying at the time of the abduction about 150 yards from Jessica's house.

Couey's half-sister and two others who lived in the home were charged with obstructing police for failing to notify authorities when Couey allegedly told them he had committed a crime.

UMass rethinks use of tasers

office windows.

Coincidentally, the human rights group Amnesty International released a report about Tasers around the same time UMass announced its plans to look into purchasing them. Amnesty International says Tasers can be linked to at least 80 deaths in the United States and Canada since 2000. Another study by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference released in February stated that 86 deaths in the United States could be linked to Tasers since 1999.

O'Connor says she thinks Tasers are a good option for officers who come into contact with dangerous situations.

"Do I think that there could be times when we could use this weapon? Sure," she said.

O'Connor gave several examples of officers who have been assaulted in the past, including one incident of a male officer who was beaten by several individuals. One of the individuals kicked him in the head and another stole his police radio in Southwest.

"Just speaking for myself, I was assaulted three separate times on my first year on the job," she said.

Thrasher says although officer assaults aren't frequent on campus, they happen often enough to warrant additional precautions.

"With the number of violent altercations my officers deal with in a year, it's not uncommon to address seriously violent subjects," Thrasher said. "The other option is to seriously beat them with a baton."

O'Connor stressed that the use of Tasers would "not be a crowd control option."

Tasers are already the norm for police departments in other states, but its usage has not come without controversy.

A Jacksonville, Fla. TV station, WJXX-TV reported March 8 that a 13-year-old girl was tasered at least twice by officers trying to subdue her.

The incident was discussed at a community meeting in the city's Lincoln Villa section. Residents discussing the recent use of Tasers by police in that community's high school got a unanimous response by local parents.

"Please do not taser our children," pleaded one woman, who admitted her children were grown, but worried about the next generation possibly being harmed. WJXX reported.

Two highly publicized cases involving Tasers in Chicago happened the week of Feb. 10 when a 34-year-old man died and a 14-year-old boy was critically injured when police tasered them within four days of each other.

The 34-year-old, identified as Ronald Hasse of Cedar Lake, Ind., allegedly made statements to officers such as: "If you come near me, I'll give you HIV," and "I'm going to kill you with my blood."

Paramedics transported Hasse to the hospital where he died 90 minutes later. An autopsy to determine his cause of death was "inconclusive."

Hasse's death came four days after Chicago Police made headlines when officers used a Taser to subdue a 14-year-old boy. The boy, who weighed 220 pounds and was 6-feet 2-inches tall, allegedly injured three female workers at his group home and "advanced on the sergeant with his fist drawn," when police arrived, according to Chicago Police Superintendent Robert Cline.

The boy's legal guardian appointed to him by Cook County disputes Cline's claims saying, "it is definitely my understanding that he was just sitting on the couch when he was tasered."

Since Tasers were legalized in Massachusetts six months ago, no police department has yet implemented their use. Some towns including Brookline, Monson, Holyoke, Springfield, Leverett and Belchertown have been talking about implementing their use in the future.

Greenfield has already purchased Tasers, but is not using them yet.

The department that has shown the most promise in implementing the weapons soon is Raynham, a quiet town in the southeastern part of the state.

O'Connor says UMass will be carefully studying the effects of the Tasers before implementing any policies regarding their use.

Above all, she wants to maintain the best level of safety for her officers. "I believe in giving my officers as many possible options," she said.

Chair dictates journalism ethics

Allison Edles

A sigh of relief came over many journalists throughout the country as the chairman of the Rutgers University department of journalism lifted the ban previously placed on students enrolled in an investigative journalism class to report on-campus issues.

Although the University's journalism program is now the same as it was before, this ban should have never even been placed, as it is a violation of freedom of the press.

The department's chairman, John Pavlik, implemented the ban originally as a response to what he viewed as sloppy reporting. According to the New Jersey Star Ledger, "Rutgers restricted students in its investigative journalism course to reporting on off-campus topics this semester after university officials complained about ill-prepared students pressing the administration for information for their stories. Pavlik said the course was stirring up trouble on campus and students would learn more working on off-campus stories."

By restricting what [students] can and can't write about, what is the lesson [they] are supposed to walk away from the situation learning? Students should not be taught that certain issues are off limits solely because of their ability to write about it.

Journalists have a responsibility to their readers to report the truth, whether they work for a newspaper or are in a journalism class. No less merit should be placed on those stories written for a class than those written for a published newspaper. The writer still has to follow the same guidelines and codes of ethics that professional journalists do.

Granted, a journalism class isn't the same as a newspaper. Some things can be overlooked and leeway given depending on the story, the writer and the goal of the assignment in the context of a deadline. However, this class is potentially preparing those students to become qualified journalists. By restricting what they can and can't write about, what is the lesson the students are supposed to walk away from the situation learning? Students should not be taught that certain issues are off limits solely because of their ability to write about it.

Oftentimes, it is a lot harder to have access to certain information if you do not have the backing of a newspaper behind you. Under that light, it is apparent how students in a journalism class may not be able to get all the information needed to report of major issues concerning the university, such as the administration, academics, athletic department, etc.

However, lack of information does not a sloppy reporter make. Very often, reporters for professional newspapers have holes. It's quite common, and it's even more common for those holes not to get filled as of press time. This is what the whole journalism experience entails, though. Babying the students because they are just that, students, is no way to adequately prepare them to enter into the journalism profession.

Being students, those enrolled in the investigative journalism class at Rutgers were presented with many topics easily available to them right on their own campus in New Brunswick, NJ. There is where the material is most easily accessible and also most challenging to report on because of how close to home it hits. Therefore, it serves as the perfect arena for students to learn off of, especially since there's that cushion of safety in the sense that there's no guarantee of publication, even though many of the pieces are submitted for publication to the Rutgers University newspaper, The Daily Targum.

Those who work on a college campus are more open-minded and aware of what a student needs to accomplish. Therefore, those on campus who find themselves being interviewed by journalism students may be more understanding in the students' cause and goal of the assignment. The interview may be a little easier. Off campus, however, people are more skeptical and don't see a student interviewing them, but a reporter. That may make for a slightly rockier interview in comparison.

The fact that this ban was even considered, let alone put into action, says something about the University. It speaks of the journalism department's own hesitation and doubt in their students' abilities, and it also portrays the university as having something to hide. A university should be encouraging their students to excel and go that extra step, rather than discouraging them from doing work they'll be expected to do in the real world because they may not be able to handle it as a student.

The Rutgers journalism department should have more faith in its students and its students' capabilities. Every journalism student, at least once in their career, should write something that goes against the grain and isn't received well by everyone. The aftermath that they will experience, from the media, from the administration and from fellow students, is something that they will always remember and is a skill that can't be taught in an investigative journalism class.

Golden bodies vs. the golden rule

Chris Eckel

March is notable for three things: Saint Patrick's Day, my birthday (it's today) and spring break, the ultimate excuse to party or just bum around. Some of you spent the spring break with sun, beer and bikinis. I spent my spring break with fluorescent lights, apple juice and galoshes. Some of you, no doubt, found new love, or at least love, in the tropics. If I found new love, I'd be seated in court next to Michael Jackson right now.

You see, I spent the week substitute teaching. I worked in an elementary school and a middle school, and neither was a piece of cake. Kids seem to be getting rowdier each year. And yet, I'd argue I had a better experience last week than all you bronzed party animals.

That's because, in between the flying applesauce cups and the kicked shins, those kids showed off a lot of wisdom and the sort of polite behavior we all wish we saw at UMass. In fact, I think that college students could learn a thing or two from the next generation that would improve everyday college life.

Kids show off a lot of wisdom and the sort of polite behavior we all wish we saw at UMass. In fact, I think that college students could learn a thing or two from the next generation that would improve everyday college life.

College students have somehow forgotten that using a friend to tell that cute girl or boy how you feel is far superior a method than doing it yourself. Call me a coward, but waiting that second or two for a response is horrifying.

Every possible humiliating outcome races through your head in the time it takes for him or her to figure out what he/she might be doing Saturday afternoon. It's as bad as those few seconds sitting in the dentist's chair waiting to see which pick or drill he'll pick up to torture you with first.

I'd much rather tell a friend to go in with the message, then idly live my life not knowing when the big conversation will go down, and thus not worrying about the moment of truth. Ignorance is bliss.

Middle schoolers, in particular, have also exploited a sweet gap in the "what they know versus what other people think they know" spectrum. Teachers seem to assume that kids ages 11 - 14 seem to be completely ignorant of the world around them, and thus, they don't give them much work. In reality, they know what weed, 40's, and sex are all about. (In fact, I got asked several times about all of them. For those of you worrying about my contribution to teenage delinquency - if Mark McGwire can answer "no comment" to a group of Congressmen, then I can sure use it on a bunch of eighth graders.)

Depending on your viewpoint, blame or give credit for this surplus of extracurricular knowledge to 50 Cent and "The O.C." If we were able to convince our professors we were so clueless, then we'd be living the good life of a middle school student.

Book reports on "Where the Red Fern Grows" and a geography project on Egypt sure sound a lot better than your thesis, right? Get to work on convincing your professors you're overwhelmed by life, and it might pay off in the long run.

Most significantly, the golden rule has been all but forgotten on campus today. For those of you who forget that one, it goes something like this: "Do unto others as you want others to do unto you." This rule is almost always followed in the primary schools.

Kids share supplies, they lend lunch money and they have a natural sense of inclusion: you hardly ever see a kid sitting alone at the lunch table.

The last time I saw anything approaching the golden rule at college was when I took turns buying pitchers at McMurphy's. I bought one for the guys, because I wanted to take the next four turns off to concentrate on drinking while they bought for me.

Somehow, this seems to be a bit of a cynical twist on the rule. Instead of the golden rule being followed, I see people flipping people off as they drive, people puking on the hallway floor and people sleeping with other people's girlfriends.

Now, you can't honestly tell me anybody does these things because they want them to be done to them. It seems more likely that college students are operating off of the "do what makes me feel good and screw other people" rule.

Class seems to be the worst part of college life. On the other side of the coin, there's a reason that younger kids smile when they get to school - it's a good experience because they play the system right and treat each other right.

Let's take a cue from the kids and keep our dating pressure down, our fingers down, the puke down and the pants up.

Same-sex couples still unequal

Vanessa Adel

I am writing to express my concern about the imminent policy change regarding domestic partners and family health plans at the University of Massachusetts. As I was completing my family health insurance forms for the upcoming semester, I was told that the University will soon be instituting a policy whereby same-sex couples will need to show a certificate of marriage as a prerequisite for obtaining spousal or family health insurance. This new requirement would incur more discrimination for same sex couples despite the apparent legal gains made by the new marriage laws in Massachusetts.

My partner and I have been in a loving relationship for 15 years. We have a three-year-old daughter and are also currently working with a private adoption agency who has advised us not to get married in order to increase our chances of securing a match and going through with an out-of-state adoption.

While my partner and I are thrilled about the legal gains made in Massachusetts, we are faced with a situation in which we will soon be forced to choose between health care and adoption.

In adoption processes, same-sex couples often circumvent anti-gay state policies. In international and domestic adoption by presenting a single-parent home-study.

All interested parties such as birth parents and social workers know that a child is being placed in a same-sex home, but on paper, the home study is written as a single parent plan that becomes a two-parent adoption upon legalization within the home state. However, if we got married in Massachusetts, we would have to declare our legal relationship to anti-gay states, thereby severely limiting our options for adoption since only six states will officially recognize gay couples as worthy of adopting children.

The key issue is that the federal Defense of Marriage Act does not recognize the legality of gay marriage in Massachusetts. Neither do most of the states.

While my partner and I are thrilled about the legal gains made in Massachusetts, we are faced with a situation in which we will soon be forced to choose between health care and adoption. If we get married, we will not be able to adopt from 44 states. If we do not get married, we will not be able to benefit from a family health plan even though we are a family. Of course, many other couples will face this same predicament, including couples who are planning to adopt internationally.

In addition, there are other reasons why committed, loving couples may choose not to get married in a context of ongoing oppression against gays and lesbians in other states, and within extended families. Without the federal protection afforded to heterosexual marriage, making a relationship legal and therefore public through Massachusetts state marriage could put some couples in jeopardy in other communities, especially if they later move to another state or, for instance, if they are enlisted in the military.

Another example of the ways in which gay marriage doesn't offer the full rights and benefits of marriage is through unequal taxation of family insurance plans. For instance, under the current contradictory state and federal marriage laws, same-sex married couples who sign up for spousal insurance as state employees are faced with a situation in which the qualifier of the health plan is taxed for the full value of the spouse's insurance plan by the federal government. Hence, although the state of Massachusetts guarantees full family health coverage for married couples, gay and straight, only gay couples are taxed on their spouse's plan since the federal government does not recognize the couple as married.

I understand the challenge that the new gay marriage law in Massachusetts presents to University Health Services and the University at large. They are faced with the position of implementing effective insurance policies and providing health care to families while abiding by contradictory state and federal laws. However, I have always been eligible for this benefit and it is discriminatory to suddenly make me ineligible by requiring me and my partner to sign into a legal contract that cannot be upheld or respected in other states.

Also, requiring a marriage certificate for health coverage puts same-sex couples and families in the position of having to choose between different, yet equally discriminatory outcomes. Until gay marriage really is the same as heterosexual marriage in terms of federal protection, rights and responsibilities, please urge UMass to refrain from linking marriage to the right to receive family health benefits.

A fresh look at string music

Old Crow Medicine Show
Tonight
Iron Horse
Northampton
$15 & $18

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

Look at you. Take a good look, man. You're tired, run-down. You've got bags under your eyes, greasy hair. You need to relax buddy.

You know what you should do? Pick up a hot drink, head over to the Iron Horse, and check out the band tonight. They're called Old Crow Medicine Show. You'd like 'em.

They're an old-time string band, just like Gramps used to listen to. Except it's 2005, and they know that (they're a bunch of young dudes, for crying out loud), so they rock.

And when someone tells you that two banjos, guitar, fiddle and upright bass rock, you'd better believe there's something going on.

And if you won't believe, you're probably in the minority here. The Old Crows performed at the inaugural Bonnaroo Music and Arts Festival in 2002, and they'll be there again this summer. And Norah Jones performed one of their songs (the awesome "We're All In This Together") on Television in January. And Doc Watson, preeminent elder statesman of all things folky, discovered them. The story goes that they were playing on the street in Boone, North Carolina when Doc moseyed on up. He asked them to play at Merlefest, his annual four-day romp through roots, acoustic territory. They couldn't say no.

Likewise, they couldn't say no when, following their performance at the fest, it was requested that they play on the street in front of Nashville's uber-prestigious Grand Ole Opry. After that, they couldn't turn down an invitation to play the Opry itself (where they received a standing ovation for their debut at the venue). And, well, you can see where I'm going with this.

The boys gathered steam and their instruments, and hit the road. They opened for Dolly Parton. They opened for the Del McCoury Band. They toured with Merle Haggard.

Their fourth full-length album, "O.C.M.S." was coaxed from the industry early last year and it hasn't left the stereos of any self-respecting folkies or bluegrass aficionados since, and for good reason. The eleven songs featured on O.C.M.S. are classics in the making. Songs like "Wagon Wheel," "Tell It To Me," and the anti-war tune "Big Time In The Jungle" are destined to be sung and listened to for many years to come.

And, not incidentally, Old Crow Medicine Show are destined to be listened to for many years to come, too. They're off to such a good start, they can't stop now. EMI has released their new record all over the world, they've got a video on the Country Music Television channel, and just last year they received the Nashville Scene Music Award for best "Bluegrass/Old-Timey" band.

So, if you know what's good for you, you'll head over to Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall tonight around 7 p.m. Old Crow Medicine Show is going to put on a show, and you need to be there. After all, bluegrass is good for what ails ya; tickets are $15 in advance, and $18 at the door.

Orlando's Boyle brothers create comic-book empire

By Nancy Imperiale
The Orlando Sentinel

ORLANDO, Fla. _ Phil and Brendan Boyle run a parallel universe where gamers, artists, writers and those who just like large statues of Wonder Woman can all commune.

It's a feat worthy of Superman. But the Boyle brothers come across more like Clark Kent times two _ mild-mannered and middle-aged, with kids and schedules. As the CEO and general manager of Florida's Coliseum of Comics, they are out to bust the geek stereotype that plagues comics fans.

ZAP!

POW!

BOOM!

"The average comic reader doesn't wear a Starfleet uniform, doesn't live in Mom's basement and has actually been on a date," Phil, 42, chided in an e-mail.

The Orlando boys who used to ride their bikes to the dime store to buy comics now run the largest comics chain in the Southeast.

"Behind the scenes," said Brendan, 40, "it is a serious business."

So serious, the brothers go all Wolverine at the notion they should appear as anything but darn-normal businessmen.

Still, when your entire life's work has been devoted to comic books, sometimes your secret identity will peek through.

Like when Brendan, the general manager, is called upon to offer advice to the staff.

"Some customer will want to know what happened in issue 38 of some Marvel comic," said Sea Oh, who works in the Orlando store. "Brendan will know it."

And hey, Phil, do you remember the home worlds for the Legion of Superheroes?

"All more than 20 of them," he said with pride.

Coliseum of Comics' headquarters is in a strip center between a beauty salon and a vacuum-repair shop. It's the kind of neighborhood where you lock your car doors by instinct. But the Boyle brothers remember a gentler time when they were free to roam.

"My dad managed the Sambo's (restaurant) across the street," said Brendan, pointing outside.

"We would come to work with him and make the circuit, buying comic books at the Magik Market, Eckerd's, 7-Eleven, Handy Way, Pantry Pride. This," he said, pointing at the floor, "was Ellis Drug Store. We would buy comic books here."

Back then, you could get a comic for 35 cents. Brendan was into Marvel Comics, home of Spider-Man and the X-Men. Phil was partial to DC Comics, where Batman and Superman were born.

Then their mom's friend gave them an old box of comics that had belonged to her son. Soon they were buying more and more comics.

At some point, all that buying turned into selling. Some folks were worried when Phil, at age 20, dropped out of the University of Central Florida to launch his comic-book empire.

"I said, 'Well, you'll be closed in six months,'" said Mike Kott, owner of Intergalactic Trading Co., which at the time sold sci-fi collectibles via mail order and now does business online.

"Phil worked part time for me, and I told him I just thought it was a dumb idea to open a comic-book shop. It (the business) was all mail-order and conventions."

But "it was just something Phil really wanted to do," said his mother Mary Boyle, who still lives in Orlando. "He had our blessings and our encouragement, and we helped him out. ... My father, Phil's grandfather, oh, he hated comic books. ... He just thought it was a waste of time."

Phil opened his first 800-square-foot Orlando store in February 1985. Several moves later, and with Brendan joining him in the business, the Orlando store now boasts 4,500 square feet.

There is also a Coliseum of Comics in Kissimmee, Fla., owned by the Boyles, and five "affiliate" stores. These stores are owned by others who lease the Coliseum name and business systems.

Phil has become the Captain Marvel of Central Florida comics.

"He's been calling me every year for 22 years to tell me I guessed wrong," Kott said.

A sign on the bulletin board reads: "Help Stop Gamer Funk!!! If someone you know stinks . . . tell 'em!"

Thankfully, the only smell in the air this night is pizza.

Fifteen gamers, mostly men under the age of 30, sit at long tables playing rounds of Magic: The Gathering. The room is silent save for the slapping down of cards and the occasional, "Ooh, I'm hurtin'!" or "I'm dropping a 12!"

You need to possess the wisdom of Professor Xavier, or be 13, to understand the rules. But the cards are lovely, with elaborate artwork and names such as Beacon of Unrest and Arrogant Warm.

"Anything you don't understand, they have people here who can help," said gamer David Garrett, 25, of Orlando.

Gamers regularly play in tournaments at the store, and it is because of them that you'll find for sale such items as an inch-high silver Battle Nun or a bag of

'Sideways' journey to success

By Patrick S. Pemberton
Knight Ridder Newspapers

In the film "Sideways," Paul Giamatti plays Miles, a screenwriter and wannabe novelist wounded by divorce, beaten down by rejection and flat broke.

In other words, Rex Pickett.

"My life was in pretty sad shape in '98 when I wrote the book," Pickett said from his home in Santa Monica. "I was living basically day to day, trying to pay the rent, I had a 12-year-old car, and I was really just about ready to walk away from the film business."

Unlike Miles, Pickett actually landed a book deal. The movie adaptation would reinvigorate the careers of two actors, create a boon for the Central Coast wine industry and allow Pickett to spend a little money.

"I have a new car, my rent's paid every month and will be for the next couple of years, I wear nicer clothes. So financially things have improved," said Pickett. "But I live in the same rent-controlled house in Santa Monica."

The movie, which was nominated for Best Picture at this year's Academy Awards, was a remarkably faithful adaptation of Pickett's novel. In both, Miles embarks on a Central Coast wine tasting tour with his womanizing friend, Jack, a washed-up actor getting married the following week. Frolicking times ensue as the two imbibe daily, hook up with two wine-tasting women and (just what will be a bygone chapter in their friendship,

The book had been rejected by 15 publishers when Pickett's agent sent the manuscript to Alexander Payne, who directed the movie "Election." After reading it, Payne said he wanted to adapt it for the screen.

The unpublished book was eventually optioned by Fox Searchlight for $12,500. Meanwhile, as Payne began work on his next film, "About Schmidt," St. Martin's agreed to publish the book, offering Pickett a small $5,000 advance.

After the book was published in June, St. Martin's decided not to market it, forcing Pickett to pay for his own expenses on book signings.

"The book sold slowly in June, July and August, really," Pickett said.

When the movie version came out in October, critics loved it. Fox Searchlight promoted it heavily, and moviegoers flocked to Central Coast wineries and restaurants featured in the movie. Meanwhile, the movie landed Oscar nominations for Best Picture, Best Supporting Actor and Best Supporting Actress, and screenwriters Payne and Jim Taylor won Oscars for Best Adapted Screenplay.

The Academy doesn't offer awards for authors whose books are adapted into screenplays. Pickett, 52, would go on to make six figures from book royalties and a percentage of the movie's budget. Now he has a better book deal with Alfred Knopf.

He sometimes feels slighted by the movie's actors and producer who, he said, don't give him credit for creating the characters that put them back in the limelight. And during the Academy Awards, he was lucky to get a balcony seat, far from the movie cast. But, Pickett said, he doesn't want to sound like he's complaining.

"If it hadn't been for the movie, the book probably would have died at a thousand copies," he said.

Pickett had previously written screenplays, though he'd never had a commercial success (one did win an Oscar for best short film, though the awards were given to the producer and director). He had written a previous novel, which was never published.

He started "Sideways" as a screenplay but didn't like it, so he eventually wrote it as a novel that reflected his life with a few fictionalized scenes added to spruce it up.

"It was really a low moment in my life," he said. "And I said if I'm going to write about some despairing novelist licking the wounds of a divorce, I'm at least going to lace it with humor because if I don't, no one's going to buy it."

The story, told in first person, takes place mostly in the Santa Ynez Valley, where Pickett often retreated for two-day getaways during the 1980s. Unlike the movie, the characters also visit Morro Bay, Paso Robles (the scene of Jack's wedding) and Hearst Castle, which Miles describes as an eyesore, the product of William Randolph Hearst's "demented hubris."

"Funny thing is, I've never been to Hearst Castle," Pickett said. "You can really research that stuff on the Internet."

He has spent time at every other place in the book, including San Luis Obispo County, where his favorite place for wine is Justin Winery.

If there's one clear difference between the movie and the book, it's Pickett's impressive vocabulary (a few words used: pusillanimously, ignominy, alacritous and impecunious).

Pickett said he once kept a journal of big words he'd encountered. And, like Miles, he does The New York Times' crosswords.

After a hectic speaking and book-signing schedule, Pickett is ready to get back to the words. But he doesn't expect to ever write another book that has the impact of "Sideways."

"It's sort of hard to start writing, knowing that," he said. "When I wrote 'Sideways,' I had nothing to lose. I didn't care how self-revealing I was. I didn't care how many F-words I used. I didn't care about anything."

Director Alexander Payne chose to shoot on location in the California wine country for the filming of his new movie "Sideways".

Eagle sets to soar in to record books with historic flights

By Luke Timmerman
The Seattle Times

SPANAWAY, Wash. — Some people set audacious goals in life, like climbing Mount Everest. A couple of guys from Washington state have their sights on moving faster than anyone has ever gone before on land.

Ed Shadle, a retired IBM engineer, and Keith Zanghi, a Boeing manager, have spent tens of thousands of dollars, hours and brain cells in their quest over the last decade.

They now have most of the requirements in place to break the world land-speed record: A restored Lockheed fighter jet with the right aerodynamics. A 52,000-horsepower jet engine. A team of 35 engineers and mechanics. Three dozen sponsors pitching in equipment.

Saturday, the team took a small step ahead at a Spanaway, Wash., airstrip. They revved up the jet engine to full throttle, and for the first time, nothing went wrong. This Saturday, they will take their car, the North American Eagle, on the road to see how smoothly it runs at 50 or 100 or maybe even 300 mph. If all goes well on that airstrip in Toledo, Wash., and in further tests this summer, they will have an outside chance this fall to break the land-speed record of 763 mph.

The ultimate goal: 800 mph, faster than the speed of sound, fast enough to cover a mile in four seconds.

They still lack one all-important ingredient — money.

The owners figure it could cost up to $1 million to house up to 80 crew and family members for a month on a long, flat stretch of dirt in the Black Rock Desert of Northern Nevada.

There are day jobs, permits, hazmat cleanup, security, a medical helicopter and international judging bodies to consider.

Why do it?

"Nobody's ever done it before," said Shadle, 63, the driver.

"The Brits have held the record 22 years, and they did it on U.S. soil. We figure it's time for a few boys from Washington state to bring it back," said Zanghi, 50.

Volunteer Jon Higley, a seventh-grade science teacher in Federal Way, put it this way: "Challenges can be stepping stones or stumbling blocks; it's just a matter of how you view them."

The group has already overcome some big challenges. Shadle and Zanghi had to scrap a prototype car they had worked on for years when the British team put the record beyond its capabilities in 1997. To compete, without their own hefty research and development budget, they tried a novel idea — converting an old fighter jet into a car.

They found a jet in 1998 at an aircraft surplus dealer in Maine. It had a badly dented fuselage with holes and graffiti on it. They brought it home, at a cost of $30,000. Ever since, they have been fixing it up.

The car now has 40 percent new aluminum panels on the body, at least 5,000 new rivets, and a red paint job done courtesy of students at Bates Technical College. Shadle and Zanghi used their contacts to find a loaner engine from a British Columbia supplier, and an expensive jet-engine starter on loan from a California company. They bought a trailer to haul it, and borrowed a semi-tractor.

A million things could go wrong.

The engine could break down. Bad weather could spoil ground conditions. A sponsor could back out. A catastrophe could strike, like the car flipping over, an axle breakdown, a failure of the braking system.

Or they could succeed, and have a place reserved in the Smithsonian. If that happens, how would they celebrate?

"I don't know, we haven't really thought about that yet," Zanghi said.

Dave Selby helps push the North American Eagle into place for an engine test at an airstrip in Spanaway, Washington. The group hopes to break the land speed record in the fall of this year.

A comic collector's dream

Glow-In-The-Dark Zombies.

"This is like an oasis, a sanctuary for people," said Juan Murcia, 19, who hung out at the store as a kid and now helps out at the Saturday-morning Yu-Gi-Oh! tournaments.

Sometimes, the shop holds autograph sessions with comic artists and writers. This weekend it sponsors Megacon, an annual comics and collectibles expo at the Orange County (Fla.) Convention Center.

The Coliseum is also a resource for budding talent, with titles such as Drawing Dynamic Hands and a Writer's Block section featuring the work of graphic novelists who use comics to express serious adult themes.

"There's still stuff for kids," Brendan said. "But there's now stuff for adults. I read more comics now than I did when I was a kid. There are a lot of very poetic, intelligent people who are putting together new comics."

The oldies also are covered. Protected in plastic and sorted alphabetically are many of the titles your brother stole from you in third grade.

Phil still dreams of world comic domination.

"Would we like to be a national chain? Of course we would," he said. "It's one of those things, though, that's one step at a time."

Frank Dowler was the Boyle brothers' competitor at Enterprise 1701, an Orlando store he owned for 25 years before selling it and retiring in 2001.

"They are businesspeople, top to bottom, front to back," Dowler said. "Phil's built himself a little empire in Central Florida, and he runs a tight ship."

Still, there are those who keep expecting the Boyle brothers' "comic-book phase" to end.

Phil said, "My aunt, for the longest time ... she'd always say, 'And how's the boy's funny-book stand doing?' You'd want to say, 'Aunt Rina, the funny-book stand is now a chain of seven stores!'

"Even people who know me and know what I do, until they walk into the store, they have no idea."

Eagles top Minutemen

Gionta was left all by his lonesome in front of UMass goalie Gabe Winer, and he faked a shot left and beat him right for the game-winner at 10:32 of the extra frame.

After the game, Gionta, the younger brother of former Eagle superstar Brian Gionta, called this goal the highlight of his career.

"I just saw it and started to take off, and it happened to fall into the center of the ice, and I was all alone... I just closed my eyes and shot," Gionta laughed. "I faked a shot and kind of brought it to my forehand, and it went off the post and in. It was a nice bounce to get in the overtime."

"We worked real hard all night not to give them that type of situation, and a little bit of our exuberance and the bounce of the puck created that so it's a real lousy way to lose a game," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

After a scoreless first period, the Minutemen were able to get on the board first in Game 1 just 2:02 into the second. James Solon centered a pass to Obi Aduba, who one-timed the puck to the back of the net for his second career goal.

Just over two minutes later, UMass survived a tough defensive struggle in its zone and brought the puck up the right side of the ice where Mark Matheson was able to feed P.J. Fenton with a pass, and Fenton beat BC goalie Matti Kaltiainen to shock the 2,105 fans in attendance by giving Massachusetts a 2-0 advantage.

The 2-0 lead wasn't uncharted territory for the Minutemen at Kelley Rink, though, as they skated to the same advantage earlier this season on Nov. 12. TheEagles scored the next three goals in that game, too, which finished in a 3-3 tie.

BC gained some momentum heading into the locker room for the second intermission when Patrick Eaves collected a turnover in the UMass zone, drove into traffic and snuck the puck passed Winer to cut the lead in half.

The Eagles wasted little time in the third period to tie the score. With David Leaderer in the box for charging along with Matt Burto and John Adams serving matching roughing penalties, BC had a 4-on-3 advantage.

Eaves hit an unguarded Brian Boyle with a pass at the right point, and Boyle fired a shot that hit Winer's pad and bounced high over his head. Winer appeared to lose sight of the puck as it landed behind him and rolled into the net at 2:52 of the third period.

"We're down 2-0, and we kept our resolve," York said. "There wasn't any panic set in at all, and that's a hard test for us, down 2-0, a one-seed against an eight-seed on home ice, so I thought we kept our resolve and slowly got back in the game."

Game 2 wasn't the nail biter that Game 1 was, but the Minutemen did provide the Eagles an early scare. Cory Schneider made his first appearance between the pipes for the Eagles since the Beanpot consolation game on Feb. 14 when he tore his left MCL against Harvard, and the Minutemen quickly took advantage of his rust.

Butto curled around Eagle defenders at the right point and beat the freshman goaltender top-shelf to put UMass ahead 1-0 just 42 seconds into the game.

"Cory has had a good week of practice," York said. "He has recovered fully from his sprained knee. We put him in tonight, and, bang, [UMass scored on the] first shot of the game. But the kid's got a will of steel because it didn't rattle or shake him at all, and you would think three weeks without playing, and bang, it's 1-0. He looked so confident and strong in the goal."

The Eagles capitalized on a 5-on-3 at the 14:18 mark of the first when Shannon blasted a one-timer from Boyle into the net to knot the game at 1. BC took the lead for good just over two minutes later. Andrew Alberts advanced the puck down the ice and crossed it to Shannon, whose shot was saved by Winer. The rebound landed on Eaves' stick, and he put it home for a shorthanded goal.

Boston College increased its advantage to two goals when Eaves sent a shot into traffic in front of the net, and Joe Rooney deflected the puck passed Winer at 4:45 of the second.

Ryan Murphy added his fourth goal of the season and Joe Rooney scored his second goal of the game, a career high, to close out the scoring in the third period for the Maroon and Gold.

UMass senior goaltender Tim Warner played the final 7:19 in net and made two saves while allowing no goals in his last appearance as a member of the Massachusetts Minutemen.

NOTES: Make sure to check tomorrow's Collegian for a complete wrap-up of the Hockey East semifinals and championship game from the FleetCenter this weekend.

UMass has mixed results

EKU 5-0. Szado batted in two of the five runs as he went 3-for-4 from the plate.

UMass wasn't so fortunate the following day, however, as the Yale Bulldogs toppled the Minutemen 6-1. Jeremy Demers (1-2) gave up five runs on eight hits in his third start of the season as the Maroon and White registered their only run of the day off an RBI single from Bryan Garrity.

Doherty then notched his first win of the season against the Red Hawks on Mar. 15, fanning six batters and allowing just four hits in his first complete game shutout of the season. Durepo went 2-for-4 at the plate while Szado, Bryan Adamski and freshman Andy Teutken all notched one RBI apiece in the blanking.

The Minutemen weren't as fortunate in the last stretch of games, dropping their final three games of the tour. On Wednesday, UMass allowed Bucknell (1-9) to notch its first win in 2005.

The Bison tallied their first run in the top of the fourth inning after Chris Pieper was caught in a run-down between first and second base, allowing Kyle Walter to score from third. Ed Rubbo made it a 2-0 game in the next inning when he singled in Evan Weiss from third.

The Minutemen fought their way back to a tie score on the bats of Durepo (3-for-5) and Bill Rankin, but the Bison would take the lead for good in the sixth when Walter and Pieper hit consecutive doubles off of Chris Sarguy (0-1).

Torra was back on the mound Friday morning against Illinois State (7-9), but once again his efforts accumulated to no avail. Though he struck out eight, it was the five hits and two runs (one unearned) that gave the Redbirds a 2-1 win in the pitchers' duel.

Dan Frega (2-3) outlasted Torra in a game that was shortened to seven innings due to the weather, allowing two hits despite fanning six batters, compared with Torra's eight. UMass's only run came in the sixth, when Rankin scored following an error by second baseman Lee Fischer.

As brilliant as Doherty was against Miami on Tuesday, he couldn't follow it up with another win, as the Minutemen wrapped up their trip with a 3-0 loss to the Army Black Knights.

UMass came across yet another great pitcher in full stride as they were only able to register three hits off of preseason All-America Nick Hill (3-0).

The sophomore threw eight innings of scoreless baseball and fanned eight, compared to Doherty's nine hits allowed, three earned runs and seven strikeouts in as many innings.

Minutewomen fall to Syracuse

WOMEN'S LACROSSE from page 8

Reny, 7:21 into the action, the Minutewomen answered abruptly again, scoring three goals in succession to make it 6-1 UMass early in the first half.

Albany scored two more times to make the score 6-3, then traded goals with UMass until Connerty added her fourth goal of the day to make it 9-5 Minutewomen heading into the half.

This was the deflating blow for the Great Danes as, after the two traded goals to start the second half, UMass riled off four straight to take a 13-5 lead and seal the deal. Two of the four goals were scored by junior Jackie Nesbitt while Connerty and freshman Melinda Zwick added the other two. Junior goalkeeper Lauren McCarthy finished the day with 15 saves.

Kerri Connerty was named Atlantic 10 Performer of the Week after her six goal tirade against Albany, while Typadis was awarded the honor of Atlantic 10 Co-Rookie of the week.

The next obstacle for the Minutewomen came in the form of the number 13 ranked Syracuse Orange on March 19. It was the second time the Minutewomen faced a ranked opponent this season and the results from both games were similar.

The Orange defeated the Minutewomen 17-8 at Garber Field Saturday. Syracuse started the game with four straight goals, putting a damper on the UMass chances early in the game.

Sophomore Samantha Sepulveda cut the lead down to 6-5 at one point in the first half with two straight goals, but Syracuse quickly answered with a goal to go into the break up 7-5. That is the closest UMass would get as the Orange cruised out of the gate with four straight goals.

Syracuse outscored the Minutewomen 10-3 in the second half, out-shooting UMass 40-14 on the game.

Danes 51-31 in the game, including the first 20 shots of the second half, but were unable to overcome a slow, decisive Albany offense.

Albany's Luke Duquino led the way for the Great Danes with three goals and two assists. Merrick Thompson also had a strong offensive output putting in two goals with two assists in the game.

UMass was paced by preseason All American Sean Morris, who had four goals and two assists.

Morris had a hat-trick in the Maroon and White's 10-7 victory over Stony Brook on March 12. Both teams were undefeated going into the game, with Stony Brook riding the efforts of starting keeper Brendan Callahan.

Callahan had 17 saves in the game, but it was not enough to slow down Morris and the Minutemen.

Gene Tundo also had a good game for UMass, scoring two goals and dishing out two assists in the game.

Stony Brook's Sean Chamberlain had two goals and two assists in the game, but it was not enough to outlast the relentless UMass offense.

NOTES: New England Patriots head coach Bill Belichick was in attendance for UMass' game against Brown on Saturday.

one run. She struck out 11 batters and at one time retired 13 straight.

The bats for UMass were quiet until the fifth inning when Lesley Ferrara broke up BYU pitcher Summer Tobias' perfect game with a double. Sarah Hurd came into run for Ferrara and was moved to third Lauren Proctor's single. UMass pushed a run across by executing a double-steal.

With the game tied at one in the bottom of the sixth, Candice Molinari smashed a triple to the right-centerfield gap. Kelley then came to the plate and knocked Molinari in for the go-ahead run with a single up the middle.

UMass struggled against jacksonville, as Busa (2-5) took the loss on the hill. The lone bright spot was Kelley, as she swatted two homeruns, providing all of the offense for UMass. Kelly has four homeruns this season, and is now just one shy of tying the school-record of 26.

UMass got to the semifinals against Baylor by winning two games on the third day of the tournament. The Maroon and White downed Illinios-Chicago, 4-2, and Central Michigan, 5-4.

LaFogg came through again for UMass, recording the win in both games. On offense, it was a balanced attack against Illinois-Chicago, as seven players had a hit. In the Central Michigan game, Denis had a big day, going 3-for-3 with three RBI and a homer.

UMass split a pair of low-scoring games at Villanova on Saturday. UMass opened with a 3-1 loss to Villanova, but bounced back with a 3-2 win over Brown later in the day.

LaFogg was the tough-luck loser against Villanova as she allowed only one earned run and the offense squandered many scoring chances early in the game. UMass left seven runners on base in the first threinnings, and nine for the game. Wasted in the loss was a strong offensive day by the reigning A-10 Player of the Year Hilary Puglia. Puglia went 3-for-4 with three doubles.

Against Brown, Busa was strong on the mound, as she went the distance allowing only one run. Kelley provided some run support with her fourth homerun of the season in the first inning.

BC soars over UMass

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL — It wasn't the most memorable of seasons, but the Massachusetts hockey team wanted to make sure that the Boston College Eagles and the rest of Hockey East wouldn't just forget about them.

Though the Minutemen (13-23-2 6-16-2 Hockey East) closed out the 2004-05 campaign with three consecutive losses, including being swept 2-0 in the quarterfinals against BC (25-6-7 14-3-7 HEA), the pesky play from seasons past returned in their last month of the season, garnering a ray of hope and some momentum for next year.

UMass failed to become just the fourth No. 8 seed to drop a No. 1 seed since the Hockey East tournament began in 1985, and the Eagles made sure they didn't become the first No. 1 seed to lose a quarterfinal series two seasons in a row.

And even though the Minutemen held leads in both games, Boston College came out victorious at Conte Forum on each occasion, 3-2 in overtime on March 11 and 3-1 on March 12.

"We saw [UMass] last time, and it was 6-0 we beat them up in Amherst," Boston College coach Jerry York said. "They're a way, way better club now than they were at that juncture. I think they showed a lot of improvement and pushed us. It's a lot of credit for an eighth-place team in here; OT in the first night and 1-0 to put us back on our heels right away [on March 12]."

After rallying back from a 2-0 deficit in the second period, the Eagles caught a huge break in overtime when defenseman Peter Harrold deflected the puck off the boards in the BC zone, and it caromed way out to center ice where Stephen Gionta was able to collect it.

See HOCKEY on page 6

Junior captain Stephen Werner had 14 goals on the year for the Minutemen, with his last coming against Northeastern on March 5. Werner and the Minutemen finished the season 13-23-2 after getting swept by Boston College in the Hockey East playoffs.

Minutemen find a groove

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (4-1) was all but unstoppable going into spring break.

Over the first two games of the season, UMass had outscored its opponents 24-to-13 and were exhibiting a balanced attack that had it ranked No. 13 in the nation. Even a day after spring breakers left Amherst behind, the Minutemen downed previously unbeaten Stony Brook 9-6 and appeared to be in full control of their momentum.

Then, in a game that had the Minutemen favored on paper, the University of Albany proved to be the spoiler outlasting UMass in a 10-9 offensive clinic on Tuesday in Troy, N.Y.

With its three-game winning streak snapped, the Minutemen had to prepare for No. 17 Brown, who was coming to Garber Field on Saturday. UMass demoralized the Bears 12-5 and showed that not only can it go on winning streaks, but it can respond to trying losses as well.

The Minutemen return to action tomorrow in Fairfield, Conn. where they will take on Sacred Heart for a 3 p.m. face-off.

UMass scored the game's first two goals before Brown sophomore David Maderia broke the ice for the Bears. Maderia led the offensive charge for Brown, scoring three goals in the game.

After Maderia's goal, the Minutemen went on to score three unanswered goals and went into the half with a 5-1 lead. The momentum continued into the second half as UMass scored six unanswered goals in the third period to put the game all but out of reach.

Leading the way for the Minutemen was the play of Jeff Zwyicki who had three goals in the game. Brett Garber and Jamie Yaman each had two goals for UMass.

The Minutemen were also 3-for-3 when a man up. A total of eight players scored for UMass en route to its most dominating performance of the season.

Although the Minutemen were able to flex their offensive muscles for most of the contest, it was the stellar defensive play of junior Jack Reid that changed the pace of the game.

Reid was in charge of covering Brown's preseason All-American Chazz Woodson. Woodson has six goals and an assist on the year for the Bears, but was held scoreless by Reid. Woodson was also forced to turn the ball over five times and had only one shot on goal.

In its game against Albany, UMass showed what happens when the offense outplays the defense.

Minutewomen tame Danes

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

After a loss to the Harvard Crimson at Jordan Field on March 5, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (1-2) had an entire week to prepare for its next challenge.

That would challenge be the Albany Great Danes, who came into the March 12 showdown with the Minutewomen struggling, posting a 1-5 record on the young season.

Melynda Zwick has five goals and three assists this year for the Minutewomen, good for third on the team.

After a forgettable performance at Harvard with turnovers dominating the afternoon, the Minutewomen came into the Albany game with something to prove. UMass rebounded successfully as the Minutewomen went on to trounce the Great Danes by a score of 19-10 at Garber Field.

Junior Kerri Connerty had a stand out game with a game and career-high six goals. She also added two assists to finish with eight points on the afternoon. Connerty has scored 10 goals and dished out seven assists in her career against Albany.

Freshman Kathleen Typadis recorded yet another hat trick, making it her fourth in as many games. It was the first time in the last decade that a freshman has recorded a hat trick in each of her first four games.

Freshman Ashleigh Szawlowski also recorded a hat trick against Albany, providing another contributing underclassman for coach Carrie Balduc's young squad.

UMass got off to a fast start against the Great Danes, jumping out to a 3-0 lead. Connerty and Szawlowski scored in the first minute while Typadis added the third goal 5:37 into the game.

The Massachusetts baseball team faced more obstacles as it headed to Bradenton, Fla., for spring training last week, but only overcame roughly half of them.

In a string of six games over eight days at the IMG Baseball Academy and Twin Lakes Park, the Minutemen (3-9) went 2-4. Over the last three seasons, UMass has now gone 8-12 in games played in the Sunshine State.

Pitching, especially relief, was a big concern at the start of the season, having lost close games to New Orleans and Delaware. While junior Matt Torra (1-1) maintained his ace status, as he picked up Atlantic 10 Co-Pitcher of the Week honors mid-week, there were and are still kinks to be worked out.

That isn't to say they haven't improved, however.

Keith Doherty (1-3), for one, had a rocky start to the 2005 season, giving up 15 runs over his first two starts. But in a four-hit, complete game shutout of the Miami, OH Red Hawks, the senior captain showed some strides of improvement.

"I think Doherty stressed a little from being captain," coach Mike Stone said. "It was a matter of him getting comfortable. He had a much more fluid break point, more fluid release point. He's more relaxed on the mound now."

Having senior captain Jason Twomley sidelined with a wrist injury didn't help matters either, but the Maroon and White still managed to get their hits in, with Curt Szado (.333) and Derek Durepo (.261) leading the charge.

However, the lack of experience of this youthful team continues to show.

"We need some experience, the kids need at bats," Stone said. "The only way you gain confidence is by doing well at the plate. We're trying to get them into the process of hitting as opposed to getting hits, but at the same time having some presence at the plate. It's difficult to balance right now."

The Minutemen started off the week by garnering their second win of the week against the Eastern Kentucky Colonels. Torra was brilliant on the mound, pitching a four-hit, complete game shutout to earn his first win of the season as UMass went on to down

The Massachusetts softball team had a busy schedule during spring break playing eight games in nine days. The Minutewomen fared well, going 5-3 and improved their overall record to 8-9.

The Minutewomen return to action on Thursday as they host a double-header against Syracuse in their home-opener.

UMass participated in two different tournaments during break, traveling to Clearwater, Fla. for the Speedline Invitational and to Villanova University for the Villanova Challenge.

The Minutewomen held their own in the Speedline Invitational finishing in third place with a 4-2 record. UMass fell in the semifinals to No. 10 Baylor, 10-2. The Maroon and White made it easy on the Bears as its defense was shaky, allowing nine unearned runs behind pitcher Barb LaFogg.

LaFogg and catcher KJ Kelley were both selected to the All-Tournament team. LaFogg was also named the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week last week and Dinn Brothers/UMass co-Athlete of the Week, while teammate Denise Denis was named A-10 Player of the Week.

UMass opened the tournament with a 9-2 win against Buffalo. The Minutewomen blew a 2-0 lead in the sixth inning, but exploded for seven runs in the ninth inning to record the win. LaFogg (6-6) came into the game in the seventh inning to relieve Jenna Busa and pitched three scoreless innings to record the win.

UMass split the second day of the tournament, toppling BYU, 2-1, and losing to Jacksonville, 7-2.

Against BYU, a team receiving top 25 votes in the polls, UMass received a huge effort from LaFogg on the mound. The senior pitcher held the Cougars to four hits and allowed only

One last gander

The swans of the campus pond move on

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

Most of the students who now attend the University of Massachusetts cannot remember a time when the campus was swanless — that is until now.

It may be a long time before anyone sees swans in the campus pond again. The two swans that students and faculty were accustomed to seeing last semester have been moved to the Livingston Ripley Waterfowl Sanctuary in Litchfield, Connecticut.

"People really love those swans...they have always been a campus image," said Marc Fournier, the former director of grounds at the UMass.

Swans have been residing in the campus pond for a very long time. Jim Larose, a former grounds supervisor who retired last year after 37 years at UMass, said that is has not been since the mid 1980s when there were no swans on campus.

"Basically, we had decided that we are not the keepers of animals," said Larry Snyder, the associate director of building and ground services. "They were a beautiful addition, but I'm not sure we did the animals great justice by keeping them here."

The Physical Plant was in charge of the care and safety of the swans, but as Snyder noted it was not their expertise. The Physical Plant is responsible for the up keep of buildings and grounds according to Snyder, and is "not the right type of organization to take care of an animal like that."

After being a fixture of the UMass campus pond for decades, the swans of UMass have been removed to a wildlife habitat.

The two swans that used to live on the campus are half of the original number purchased by the Physical Plant's grounds department about seven years ago. UMass purchased four trumpeter swans for about $1,600 from a farm in Rhode Island that specialized in raising waterfowl. This discredits the rumors that the University rents the swans for thousands of dollars a year. The only money spent on the swans after their purchase was a few hundred dollars for food a year.

Of the four swans, only two were sent to the sanctuary. One contracted a serious infection in 2002 and died, and another simply disappeared. This is not out of the ordinary because it has happened before with other swans. This past December a third one got sick and was sent to the vet, but it recovered and made the trip to Connecticut with the final swan.

The swans that the University used to keep were mute swans, which are not native to the north because of this, they required special housing in the winter months. They were often kept in the horse barns or at in the old Tilton chicken coups. Mute swans are also known to be much more aggressive than trumpeter swans.

The last time mute swans were on campus was about 1993 when one disappeared and the other grew ill and died. It was the five-year span from 1993 to 1998 that was the last time the campus went without swans. The students and other members of the University at the time were very disheartened when the swans were no longer around.

This outcry from the campus community caused Fournier, who was the head of grounds at the time, to begin researching the purchase of new swans, when he came across the four trumpeters.

The swans were about a year old at the time and had been somewhat domesticated so Fournier thought they would be the perfect accoutrements to the campus pond. Since trumpeter

Gunman kills seven in school shooting

RED LAKE, Minn. (AP) — A student went on a shooting spree Monday, killing his grandparents and five people at his high school on an Indian reservation. The gunman himself was later found shot to death, authorities said.

It was the nation's worst school shooting since the Columbine massacre in 1999.

Before the shootings at the school, the suspect's grandparents were shot in their home and died later.

Six people died in the mid-afternoon shooting at Red Lake High School in far northern Minnesota, including four students. Also killed were a teacher and a security guard. FBI spokesman Paul McCabe said at a news conference in Minneapolis.

He declined to talk about a possible connection between the suspect and the couple killed at the home, but Red Lake Fire Director Roman Stately said they were the grandparents of the shooter. Stately told several media outlets that the grandfather was a police officer whose guns may have been used in the shootings.

All of the dead students were found in one room. One of them was a boy believed to be the shooter, McCabe said. He would not comment on reports that the boy shot himself and said it was too early to speculate on a motive.

Fourteen to 15 other students were injured, including two critically, McCabe said.

The school was evacuated after the shootings and locked down for investigation, McCabe said.

"It will probably take us throughout the night to really put the whole picture together," he said.

It was the nation's worst school shooting since two students at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo., killed 12 students and a teacher and wounded 23 before killing themselves on April 20, 1999.

It was also the first fatal school shooting in more than four years. The last shooting, on March 5, 2001, happened in San Diego County, where a 15-year-old student killed two classmates and wounded 13 others at Santana High School. The gunman, Charles "Andy" Williams, was sentenced to 50-years-to-life in prison.

Red Lake High School, on the Red Lake Indian Reservation, has about 300 students, according to its Web site.

The reservation is about 240 miles north of the Twin Cities. It is home to the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians.

Right to die case stirs political debate

By Vickie Chachere
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Armed with a new law rushed through Congress over the weekend, the attorney for Terri Schiavo's parents pleaded with a judge Monday to order the brain-damaged woman's feeding tube reinserted. But the judge appeared cool to the argument.

U.S. District Judge James Whittemore did not immediately make a ruling after the two-hour hearing, and he gave no indication on when he might act on the request.

The hearing came three days after the feeding tube was removed. Doctors have said Schiavo, 41, could survive one to two weeks without the tube.

The hearing also followed an extraordinary political fight that consumed both chambers of Congress and prompted the president to rush back to the White House.

During the hearing, David Gibbs, an attorney for the parents, said that forcing Schiavo to die by starvation and dehydration would be "a mortal sin" under her Roman Catholic beliefs.

"It is a complete violation to her rights and to her religious liberty, to force her in a position of refusing nutrition," Gibbs told Whittemore.

But the judge told Gibbs that he was not completely sold on the argument. "I think you'd be hard-pressed to convince me that you have a substantial likelihood" of the parents' lawsuit succeeding, said Whittemore, nominated by former President Clinton in 1999.

George Felos, one of the attorneys for husband Michael Schiavo, told Whittemore that the case has been aired thoroughly in state courts and that forcing the 41-year-old severely brain damaged woman to endure another re-insertion of the tube would violate her civil rights.

"Every possible issue has been raised and re-raised, litigated and re-litigated," Felos said. "It's the elongation of these proceedings that have violated Mrs. Schiavo's due process rights."

Terri Schiavo's feeding tube was removed at 1:45 p.m. Friday, the third such time it has been disconnected. On both previous occasions, the tube was re-inserted by court order.

The House, following a move by the Senate, passed a bill Monday to let the parents ask a federal judge to prolong Schiavo's life by reinserting the tube.

41-year-old Terri Schiavo, a severely brain damaged Florida woman, remains at the forefront of intense political debate.

President Bush applauded the dramatic legislative maneuver.

"Democrats and Republicans in Congress came together last night to give Terri Schiavo's parents another opportunity to save their daughter's life," Bush said at an event on Social Security in Arizona. "This is a complex case with serious issues, but in extraordinary circumstances like this, it is wise to always err on the side of life."

Michael Schiavo said he was outraged that lawmakers and the president were intervening in the bitter right-to-die battle. He has fought for years with his wife's parents over whether she should be permitted to die or kept alive through the feeding tube.

"This is a sad day for Terri. But I'll tell you what: It's also is a sad day for everyone in this country because the United States government is going to come in and trample all over your personal, family matters," he told ABC's "Good Morning America" on Monday.

Report deems law school 'high risk'

By Michael Kunzelman
Associated Press

BOSTON — The University of Massachusetts' plan to create the state's first public law school is a "high-risk, low-reward proposition" that would cost taxpayers up to $39 million over the next seven years, according to a report commissioned by two private law schools.

Earlier this month, an independent review board concluded that allowing UMass to absorb the Southern New England School of Law in Dartmouth probably wouldn't cost the state much money.

UMass President Jack Wilson

However, a 50-page report issued Friday by Suffolk University Law School and New England School of Law in Boston claims UMass officials have "dramatically underestimated" the costs of the proposed merger.

The plan would cost the state a minimum of $2.5 million annually, or $17.5 million over seven years, and could cost as much as $39 million if UMass is unable to retain all of the tuition revenue generated by a new law school, according to the report.

"Three years of budget cuts have taken their toll on the (UMass) system. ... The system is not in a position to absorb the additional expense of subsidizing an unaccredited law school," says the report, written by policy analyst Charles Chieppo.

The report also questions whether UMass can meet its goal of getting the law school accredited by the American Bar Association by 2007. It could take six years, if not longer, for the school to be accredited, and without being accredited, it will be "virtually impossible" for the law school to increase its enrollment and increase its revenue, the report concludes.

"There seems to be no countervailing argument to merit (UMass) absorbing the true and continuing costs of merging with and expanding Southern New England School of Law," Chieppo wrote.

UMass spokesman John Hoey said the report, produced by two direct competitors of the proposed law school, was "clearly tainted." The independent panel, which concluded the school posed little financial risk to the state, was led by the dean of the Nebraska School of Law and is far more credible than a report by two rival schools, he said.

"They have been waging a campaign of disinformation that has been discredited by experts who truly are independent," Hoey said.

UMass' Board of Trustees approved the proposed merger in December. The state Board of Higher Education is scheduled to vote on the plan at its March 31 meeting.

In the meantime, Suffolk and New England law schools hired Chieppo, a former policy director in Gov. Mitt Romney's budget office, to analyze the merger plan and share his findings at a board subcommittee next week.

Chieppo also worked for the Pioneer Institute, a Boston think-tank best known for its support of charter schools.

A UMass-run law school could create serious competition for smaller, private law schools like Suffolk Law School and New England School of Law.

"That doesn't change the fact that the information we're providing is accurate," John O'Brien, dean of New England School of Law, said of Chieppo's report.

Illegal immigrants on the rise in US

By Michelle Morgante
Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — The tightening of homeland security since 2001 has not stemmed undocumented immigration into the United States, with a report released Monday showing the number of illegal immigrants growing by roughly 485,000 people a year.

An analysis of government data by the Pew Hispanic Center, a private research group in Washington, showed an estimated 10.3 million undocumented immigrants living in the United States last year, an increase of about 23 percent from 8.4 million in 2000.

"The numbers are astounding," said Cathy Travis, a spokeswoman for Rep. Solomon Ortiz, a Texas Democrat who has pressed for greater funding for border security and immigration control. "Until we match our budgetary priorities with our national security priorities, this is going to be the case."

Critics of illegal immigration said there is little political will to stop the trend, despite the lessons of the Sept. 11 terrorists attacks, because businesses benefit from the supply of cheap labor.

"There's been a greater amount of lip service, but there hasn't been a greater amount of attention to border security," T.J. Bonner, president of the union representing Border Patrol agents. "It's a shell game, and the American public are losers in this game."

The union has sharply criticized the Bush administration's proposed 2006 budget, which would provide $37 million to hire 210 Border Patrol agents. The intelligence reorganization bill Bush signed last year called for hiring 2,000 more agents a year

Suspect charged in child death

John Evander Couey appears in court Sunday for his arraignment on charges of kidnapping and murdering a 9-year-old Florida girl.

INVERNESS, Fla. (AP) — A convicted sex offender was formally charged Monday with capital murder and other crimes in the abduction and death of a 9-year-old Florida girl.

John Evander Couey, 46, was also charged with burglary, kidnapping and sexual battery on a child under the age of 12, officials said. His arraignment is set for Tuesday, officials said.

Authorities said he confessed to kidnapping and killing Jessica Marie Lunsford after taking a lie-detector test in Georgia. The girl's body was found Saturday, more than three weeks after she vanished from her Florida bedroom.

Couey was brought back to Florida and booked Sunday on a probation violation and failure to register his change of address as required as a sex offender. He has been held without bond.

Sheriff's officials and the girl's father, Mark Lunsford, have said they will urge prosecutors seek the death penalty.

"I don't believe you have two chances when you get involved with a young child," Sheriff Jeff Dawsy told ABC's "Good Morning America" early Monday.

Jessica, a third grader, was last seen the night of Feb. 23 when she went to bed after attending church. Her body was found near a mobile home where Couey had been staying at the time of the abduction about 150 yards from Jessica's house.

The 5-foot-4, 120-pound Couey entered the Lunsford house through an unlocked door and later sexually assaulted her, Dawsy said. Authorities believe Couey was under the influence of drugs.

Medical examiners determined that Jessica died from asphyxiation, the arrest report said.

"The defendant stated that he knew the victim was dead and that everyone would know that he did it after the body was found," the arrest report said.

Down the street from the Lunsford home, well-wishers have piled dozens of stuffed animals, flowers and candles high on a makeshift memorial. "God's newest little angel," one sign read.

Israel hands over West Bank town to Palestinians in deal

TULKAREM, West Bank (AP) — Israelis and Palestinians reached a deal Monday about handing over security control of the West Bank town of Tulkarem — another boost for a fledgling peace process.

The handover could help Palestinian officials carry out a new directive restricting weapons in the hands of militants, who insist they'll comply only if Israel withdraws from West Bank towns.

Tulkarem is the second of five towns to be delivered to Palestinian security as part of an agreement to end four years of bloodshed that Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon announced at a Feb. 8 summit. Palestinian militant groups issued truce declarations last week that reinforced the accord.

Violence has dropped since the summit. But not all confidence-building measures — transfer of the towns and release of more Palestinian prisoners — have been implemented.

Adding to Palestinian anger, Israeli officials confirmed Monday that the government has approved construction of 3,500 new housing units in and around the West Bank's largest settlement, Maale Adumim near Jerusalem, in violation of the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan.

Israeli and Palestinian security officers hammered out a compromise over Tulkarem in two meetings Monday.

The senior Israeli commander, Col. Tamir Hayman, told The Associated Press that Palestinian police would be in control of the area as of Monday evening, and the main roadblock at Tulkarem would be dismantled Tuesday morning, completing the process.

After the agreement was announced, Palestinians celebrated in Tulkarem, with masked men firing weapons in the air. Palestinian police watched without taking action.

Former BTK suspect wants his DNA sample destroyed

By Roxanna Hegeman
Associated Press

The investigation of the now confessed serial killer Dennis Rader, known as "BTK," subjected an innocent man's home to a police search.

WICHITA, Kan. — Police hunting for the BTK serial killer kicked down Roger Valadez's door and went in with guns drawn. They handcuffed the Wichita man, then took a sample of DNA from his mouth with a swab.

That swab proved Valadez was not BTK. Now he wants it destroyed, and he wants some answers about why police took it in the first place.

The genetic sample, taken on Dec. 1 as police searched and seized items from Valadez's home, was one of 1,300 tested during the BTK investigation, making it one of the biggest DNA sweeps ever in the United States. When authorities arrested Dennis Rader and accused him of 10 BTK slayings, it came as a result of old-fashioned police work.

Civil rights advocates say the investigation is the latest example of a DNA dragnet that failed to get its man.

"As the case has unfolded, it proves our basic point of our report: This mass swabbing is really unproductive. This is not how they caught the guy," said Sam Walker, a University of Nebraska-Omaha professor who has conducted a national study of DNA sweeps.

Police arrested Rader last month shortly after the BTK killer sent a computer disk to a Wichita television station. Rader's pastor said police traced the disk to the church where Rader was council president.

Valadez, who was arrested on minor housing violations after the December raid, is asking a court to order his DNA sample destroyed and its profile purged from any database. He is also after an explanation from authorities as to why they barged into his home with a search warrant for his DNA. A court hearing is set for April 1. "Now that they claim the search for BTK is over, we cannot see any reason for them to continue to conceal from Roger Valadez why they were looking in his house and his mouth for BTK," said Dan Monnat, Valadez's attorney.

Monnat warned: "DNA information is maybe the most intimate information about a person. There is no reason for that information to be unnecessarily in the government's files. Who knows what future use the 21st century will find for DNA?"

District Attorney Nola Foulston declined to comment last week on Valadez's request. At a news conference, she sought to reassure the public that DNA profiles collected during the BTK investigation would not be placed in any database.

The samples themselves are evidence in a criminal investigation, she said. Under Kansas law, once they are no longer needed, a judge can decide what should be done with them.

"We need to look at the good things DNA has done," Foulston said. "I think some people are overwrought about their concerns."

Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology liberty project at the American Civil Liberties Union, said DNA sweeps like the one employed in Wichita are used too often when "police are frustrated and don't have any hard evidence."

UN now ready for Haitian showdown

Peacekeepers react to criticism after 10 months of inaction

By Stevenson Jacobs
Associated Press

TERRE-ROUGE, Haiti — U.N. peacekeepers, criticized for inaction during their 10 months in Haiti, are taking on soldiers from the disbanded army in clashes that left two peacekeepers and two Haitian fighters dead — and the mission leader says more is to come.

The showdown signals a tougher stance against armed factions in Haiti ahead of fall elections and reflects a broader determination to crack down on militias that threaten civilians where U.N. troops are deployed.

The offensive in Haiti began Sunday when U.N. forces raided a police station occupied by armed former soldiers in Petit-Goave, 45 miles west of Port-au-Prince, setting of a gunbattle that killed two former soldiers and one Sri Lankan peacekeeper. The Sri Lankan was the first fatality suffered by the 7,400-member force since it arrived in June 2004.

Later Sunday, Nepalese soldiers driving to the central town of Hinche exchanged gunfire with a different group of former soldiers, and one Nepalese peacekeeper was killed, U.N. spokesman Damian Onses-Cardona said.

Then on Monday, about 300 Brazilian and Nepalese peacekeepers backed by armored cars and helicopters raided the town of Terre-Rouge, where former soldiers had occupied a police station. The U.N. force retook the area without casualties as the fighters retreated into the hills, U.N. officials said.

"The message is clear. We want these people (ex-soldiers) out. They must give up their guns and submit to the law," said Lt. Gen. Augusto Heleno Ribeiro, the Brazilian commander of U.N. peacekeepers in Haiti. "We would prefer to have a peace dialogue, but if we can't we won't hesitate to act."

"We aren't finished yet. This is all part of our strategy," said Heleno Ribeiro.

The clashes marked the first major confrontation between the U.N. force and former members of Haiti's disbanded army, who helped oust former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in a 1991 coup and again in an armed rebellion a year ago.

A U.S.-led peacekeeping force was deployed after Aristide was forced into exile in February 2004 and this force was replaced by U.N. peacekeepers in June. Despite their presence, armed rebels and former soldiers still control much of the countryside.

For months, the peacekeepers have been criticized for being too passive toward armed groups, including ex-soldiers and street gangs. The groups are blamed for more than 400 killings since September and some fear they could disrupt fall elections.

"This is a real moment of truth for the United Nations," said Daniel Erikson, a Caribbean affairs expert with the Washington-based Inter-American Dialogue. "They've suffered their first casualties, and now the question is whether they will back down in the face of opposition or reinrench and move forward."

The U.N. peacekeepers in Haiti have what's called a Chapter Seven mandate, which gives them broad power to protect civilians. While the United Nations has made no formal announcement, there has been evidence in other missions — most notably Congo — of peacekeepers running more patrols to deter violence rather than sticking to their bases.

On Feb. 25, nine U.N. peacekeepers were killed by militiamen in Congo. Soon after, U.N. peacekeepers raided a village occupied by the militia responsible for that attack and killed up to 60 people. Officials denied the two events were connected.

Michael Jackson arrives late to court

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. — A feeble-looking Michael Jackson arrived late again Monday to his child molestation trial, walking slowly and stiffly into court, but the judge took no apparent action against the pop star.

Jackson, who is said to have back problems, trembled and wept at the defense table as lawyers and a doctor who came to court in hospital scrubs conferred in chambers with Judge Rodney S. Melville.

The judge, who previously threatened to arrest Jackson and revoke his bail when he was late on March 10, gave no explanation of what was discussed and simply ordered testimony to resume.

Jackson spokeswoman Raymone K. Bain said she spoke with the singer late Sunday and he told her he was having severe and sometimes excruciating back pain. "He said his back was killing him," she said in a telephone interview from Washington.

Jackson, 46, arrived just minutes late, unlike the March 10 incident, when he turned up more than hour late in pajama bottoms and slippers.

This time Jackson was fully dressed, wearing a black suit, brocade vest and a blue armband, but his hair was mussed and his steps were tentative. He turned weakly to acknowledge fans on the street, and then walked unsteadily into the courthouse with his brother Jackie and a security guard holding his arms.

Jackson sat through a morning of testimony in which a child abuse expert described the behavior of youngsters who have been molested.

Jackson is accused of molesting a boy at his Neverland ranch in 2003, giving him alcohol and conspiring to hold the boy's family captive.

Anthony J. Urquiza, a child psychologist called by the prosecution, did not immediately say whether he had interviewed the accuser, who was a 13-year-old cancer patient at the time of the alleged abuse.

Urquiza told the jury about what he called "child sexual assault accommodation syndrome," in which youngsters become secretive, feel helpless and trapped, delay reporting acts of abuse, and finally learn to cope with the situation.

He said that boys who are assaulted by men have more trouble disclosing the abuse than do girls. "To be sexually abused and have this issue of whether you are homosexual or not is added into this very difficult time," he said of adolescence.

The witness told of relationships in which a child likes or loves the person who is abusing him. "The need they have for affection and someone who cares about them helps to sustain the relationship," Urquiza said.

Urquiza said children often under changes in behavior because of the abuse, including "acting out, becoming defiant, name-calling." Under questioning by the prosecution, the witness said that can include talking back to teachers and getting into fights — the kind of misbehavior seen in Jackson's accuser.

No more swans in the campus pond swans are native to the north they could live in the pond year round, the only additional needs would be food in the winter months.

Jack Rogala, head of grounds and services, who was in charge of the care of the swans, was an integral part in the decision to send the swans to the sanctuary.

It was "a very hard decision," said Rogala, "I spent a lot of times with those birds since day one." The swans were to the point where they were very friendly and even eating out of the hand of some workers.

Rogala and his team took great pride their care of the swans but the major question faced by the members of the physical plant was: "are we harming these birds by keeping them here?"

According to Rogala the swans needed "quiet and serenity" which can be hard find at UMass sometimes. In the spring they often traveled into Amherst looking for a quiet place and members of the grounds crew would have to track them down.

The fact that the pond is not a suitable habitat for the the swans also contributed to the final decision.

The decision was made purely for the benefit of the swans, it was clear that the University did not have the tools nor knowledge to care for the birds as well as they can at the Livingston Ripley Waterfowl Sanctuary.

The Physical Plant has received some phone calls about the missing swans and people are informed of the decision and their new location. Snyder and Rogala made it clear that the swans are much better off then they were here; they have a private pond, will be given mates, and have all the peace and quiet they need.

The campus community will have to adjust to this change, yet it may not have been hard for those who never even noticed the swans, and those who disliked the swans. Still most might miss the picturesque image of the two regal birds floating in the pond. Either way the campus is just a little less bright as it has to say farewell to the swans.

Report criticizes law school plans leagues question the need for a publicly funded law school in Massachusetts.

"The private law schools have more than adequately fulfilled the need for legal education in the state," he said.

Lynette Robinson-Weening, associate vice chancellor of the Board of Higher Education, said all of the board members received copies of Chieppo's report this week.

"We're in the middle of digesting it," she added.

Board Chairman Steve Tocco did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Tuition at the UMass law school is expected to cost roughly $19,000 a year, almost half the tuition at some private law schools. The new law school's proposed operating budget, around $5 million a year, would account for less than a third of a percent of the UMass system's $1.7 billion annual budget.

Last week, in response to the independent panel's review, UMass President Jack Wilson and UMass-Dartmouth Chancellor Jean MacCormack recommended proceeding with the merger.

"Nothing has been found in the review that indicates that we should cease or delay our establishment of the UMass School of Law," Wilson and MacCormack wrote. "The benefits very much outweigh the risks."

Pope's health may affect church services

VATICAN CITY (AP) — Pope John Paul II won't hold his traditional audience this week, a Vatican official said Monday, but it remained unclear if he would greet pilgrims from his apartment window as he continues to recover from throat surgery to help him breathe.

John Paul has scaled back his public appearances since his back-to-back hospitalizations and has designated cardinals to take his place during this week's busy Holy Week ceremonies. The Vatican has only confirmed one appointment for the pontiff — an Easter Sunday blessing.

A Vatican official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said John Paul wouldn't hold his traditional Wednesday audience. It was unclear if he would bless pilgrims and tourists who are expected to gather under his apartment window in St. Peter's Square that day.

The pope has made three public appearances since being discharged from the hospital a week ago _ his latest on Palm Sunday when he blessed the crowd silently from his third-floor window. During that appearance, the pontiff pressed his hand to his head and pounded a lectern in apparent frustration over his difficulty in responding to the crowd.

The 84-year-old pope has been convalescing at the Vatican following Feb. 24 throat surgery to insert a tube in his windpipe and ease his second breathing crisis in less than a month. He also suffers from Parkinson's disease, which affects muscle control and makes it difficult for him to speak clearly.

US forces kill 26 insurgents in response attack

By Tracy Carl
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. soldiers, ambushed by dozens of Iraqi militants near the infamous "Triangle of Death," responded by killing 26 guerrillas in the largest single insurgent death toll since last fall's battle for Fallujah, the U.S. military said Monday.

The high number of deaths in Sunday's daylight battle south of Baghdad was attributed to the large number of attackers, unusual in a country where most clashes are carried out by small bands of gunmen or suicide bombers.

"I was surprised at the numbers," said Staff Sgt. Timothy Nein, a squad leader for the 617th Military Police Company of Richmond, Ky., and a native of Henryville, Ind., involved in the firefight. "Usually we can usually expect seven to 10."

As the U.S. military reported that and other successes against the insurgency, attackers struck several times Monday, killing seven civilians and three Iraqi soldiers. A roadside bomb in Aziziyah, 35 miles southeast of Baghdad, killed four women and three children, police said.

Reporting on Sunday's big firefight, the U.S. military said MPs and artillery units from the Kentucky National Guard were traveling along a road 20 miles southeast of Baghdad around noon when 40 to 50 militants emerged from a grove of trees and a roadside canal firing automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades.

The soldiers returned fire, killing or wounding all the insurgents in a field and driving away those attacking from the canal. Seven Americans were reported wounded, but no details were given on their conditions. Commanders said seven wounded insurgents and one unwounded attacker were captured.

The guerrilla death toll — 26 — was the highest in a single clash in Iraq since U.S. forces took control of the formerly insurgent-held city of Fallujah west of the capital.

In late December, an attack on a U.S. military outpost in Mosul resulted in the deaths of 25 insurgents and one U.S. soldier.

Military officials said the road where Sunday's attack occurred has seen a surge in violence against coalition forces, including an ambush Friday in nearly the same spot that killed a foreign driver. They blame a nearby village believed to be an insurgent hideout.

After the battle, U.S. troops recovered six rocket-propelled grenade launchers, 16 rockets, 13 machine guns, 22 assault rifles, more than 2,900 bullets and 40 hand grenades.

It was one of several blows to the insurgency that were reported Monday.

A pre-dawn raid Monday by U.S. and Iraqi forces in Kirkuk captured 13 people believed tied to a fatal attack on a local police officer and the bombing of his funeral procession that killed three more officers. Thirty other suspects were detained Friday in Karbala.

U.S. officials also said two suspects were arrested in the suicide bombing Sunday that killed the anti-corruption director in the northern city of Mosul, Walid Kashmoula.

Iraqi Number of undocumented immigrants rising in US

Currently, there are fewer than 11,000 agents to patrol more than 6,000 miles of the nation's perimeter around the clock, Bonner said.

Harry Pachon of the Tomas Rivera Policy Institute in Los Angeles said the growth in illegal immigrants has risen with the U.S. economy, with American businesses such as Wal-Mart looking to contractors who rely on undocumented workers "to fill jobs no one else will fill."

Arizona and North Carolina have some of the fastest-growing populations of illegal immigrants. Both have metropolitan areas booming with new construction, restaurants and other service-oriented businesses — job sectors that often hire undocumented workers.

Mexicans by far remain the largest group of undocumented migrants at 5.9 million, or about 57 percent of the March 2004 estimate. Some 2.5 million others, or 24 percent, are from other Latin American countries.

Pachon said immigration reform must be part of the answer. Immigrants who are forced to wait years to legally bring over family members have a strong incentive to look instead to smugglers.

Immigration will be a central topic of discussion when Mexican President Vicente Fox meets with President Bush in Texas on Wednesday.

Bush has promoted a guest-worker program that would allow migrants to work in the United States for a limited time. Critics of the plan say it will drive down wages for legal workers and encourage illegal immigrants.

Rep. John Hostettler, an Indiana Republican who chairs a subcommittee on immigration and border security, said the government has failed to punish employers who hire illegal workers or sufficiently fund efforts to find and deport illegal immigrants.

"The idea that we're going to completely seal the border, even with the National Guard or 20,000 to 30,000 Border Patrol agents is a little naive," he said.

A time for confession

Zach Oelschlegel

I'm coming out of the closet, UMass. I'm a Christian. One of those guys you may want to lump in with Jerry Falwell or George W. Bush. I'm a guy who believes in Jesus, who reads the Bible, attends church, prays a decent amount of the time and tries to love his neighbor.

I don't blame readers for feeling ire towards anything associated with the name "Jesus." We Christians have screwed up, and we've been at it for almost 2000 years. Some prominent Christians have already expressed regret over many of these instances, and I want to follow suit: I'm sorry.

Throughout history, Christians have used the Bible for political or economical gain. The Bible has been used to justify what transpired during the Crusades, or to validate enslaving Africans to pick cotton, or to oppress women. I ask your forgiveness for people past and present who contort the Bible to push their own agenda.

Too often, Christianity today still misrepresents the teachings of Jesus. For example, instead of truly loving people, sharing your faith means holding a bullhorn on the beach during spring break telling non-Christians to repent now, or burn for eternity. I apologize for the obnoxious attitudes people use spreading the name of Christ. I'm sorry if anyone has ever tried to force you into following Jesus.

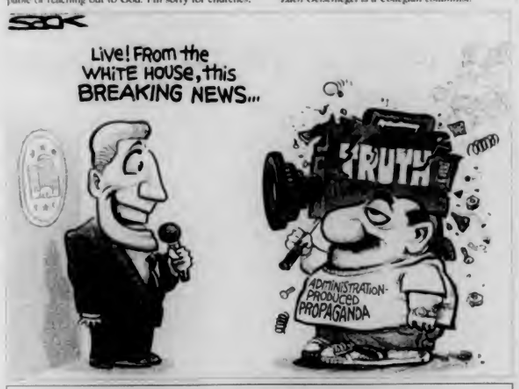
I'm sorry for any homosexuals out there who have heard televangelists preaching about Jesus' love while simultaneously teaching that "God hates gays." This is not the heart of God.

I'm apologizing to every woman on her way to have an abortion who had her picture taken by freaks wearing hats that read, "I love Jesus." They said you were going to hell for what you had done, and then posted your photo online. I'm embarrassed by those so-called Christians who try to change people's minds through sheer intimidation.

I'm sorry if you have heard the lie that being a Christian means being a Republican. I ask your forgiveness for politicians who pimp the name of Jesus to garner more votes.

I'm sorry if you've walked into a church feeling like you had to fake it. I apologize if any Christian has led you to believe your past makes you worthless and incapable of reaching out to God. I'm sorry for churches, pastors, and deacons who tried to manipulate you with guilt. I share your anger if you've ever walked into a church knowing immediately that you wouldn't be valued there — that people would judge you, and not love you.

I'm sorry for those pastors or priests who never actually have real dialogue with you, either from the pulpit or while speaking directly to you. I apologize for pastors who never address real problems, but are only concerned about getting on their favorite soapbox, the next election, or how you can give more money to the church. I want your forgiveness for church leaders who are quick to condemn, while turning a blind eye to their own sin.



I'm sorry for anything I have ever said, out loud or in a column, that wasn't coming from love. I'm sorry for not treating people as I am made to, and I'm sorry for ever thinking of myself as better. I'm sorry for any of you who have not felt the grace and love of God from anyone who said they are a follower of Jesus.

I just want you to know that real Christianity isn't always voting Republican, it isn't bullhorns and desperate pleas, it isn't fire and brimstone, and it isn't hate.

I know that everything I have written above doesn't make it all "okay." I don't expect anyone reading this to immediately feel better about how they have been wronged in the past. It's okay to still feel angry, to feel hurt, even saddened. I just want you to know that real Christianity isn't always voting Republican, it isn't bullhorns and desperate pleas, it isn't fire and brimstone, and it isn't hate. It's not ridding the world of "sinners," or of people who don't believe in God, or of homosexuals. Real Christianity is something that loves God and neighbor. It doesn't judge those who don't. It invites everyone to experience a life of freedom abounding more deeply than any of us can ever fathom.

A passage in the Bible makes the following statement: "Love is not rude, it is not self seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. Love does not delight in evil but rejoices in the truth. It always protects, always trusts, always hopes, always perseveres. Love never fails" (1 Corinthians 13). This is the kind of love that keeps me committed to Christ. It is my hope that whoever reads this knows this kind of love from God is always available, and that it could flow through me to others.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CAMERA CLARIFIES ITS ROLE

A recent column printed in The Daily Collegian by Ramzi Kanazi mischaracterizes the work of the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA), as well as the state of the American media.

CAMERA seeks to promote accurate and balanced media coverage — a goal shared by media organizations themselves. When we find an inaccurate or distorted account of events in the Middle East, we bring this to the attention of the media and the public and, just as importantly, carefully substantiate our points with factual information.

This substantiation provides the "transparency" referred to by Kanazi.

Ironically, Kanazi did not substantiate his own false claim that reporting is biased in favor of Israel. If he feels that this is the case, he should certainly provide the media with concrete examples backed up by fact, as does CAMERA.

Those looking to better understand CAMERA's work, and better understand the state of the U.S. media can visit our Web site or sign up for our campus newsletter.

PAYANO FOR PRESIDENT

Pavel Payano '06! ... and I disagree on nearly every national political issue.

Of course, stem cell research funding is not likely to make the SGA's 2006 calendar.

We, the students, need to be represented by someone competent, someone who is devoted, someone who has the character to mend the deteriorating relationship between the UMass students and the school's administration.

So let me tell you why I'm sure Pavel Payano can do just that:

Pavel is one of the more vocal members of the SGA, but despite constantly being in the public eye, he has avoided becoming embroiled in the kind of controversy that has plagued so many members of late. Pavel has exhibited presence of mind and forethought in his handling of these issues. His competence as a public figure is exemplified by his ability to handle difficult issues the SGA faces without furthering the conflict by misspeaking or acting rashly.

Pavel's devotion to the student government association is unquestionable. I have seen Pavel work tirelessly despite frustrations with the system to further the cause of the SGA; meeting with state reps, drafting new legislation and working to campaign for what he believes in. The kind of devotion Pavel has to the students of UMass is an invaluable trait for a leadership position that requires great sacrifice of time and energy.

What most impresses me about Pavel, and what made me want to speak up on his behalf, is the content of his character. I've known Pavel since freshman year, when I roomed next door to him. Despite political disagreements, discussions between Pavel and I have always been characterized by fairness and mutual respect.

There isn't room here for me to describe the many instances wherein I've seen Pavel's character first hand. I've learned to respect Pavel for his friendly attitude and openness to other's viewpoints, as well as his devotion to his friends and fellow students alike.

I doubt how much weight my word will carry here — in my experience, Collegian readers give Republicans around campus about as much credibility as they give our President (God bless him). But, as far as I'm concerned, Pavel Payano has the devotion, competence and character to be an outstanding president for the SGA.

I'll be voting for Pavel this week, and I'm certain I won't regret it.

The winds of hypocrisy

Yousef Munayyer

Last week in a press conference President Bush talked about his new appointee, Karen Hughes, who he has picked to "improve the United States' image in the Middle East". This is at the heart of the problem of U.S. foreign policy. He went on to talk about how the United States is a compassionate nation and that Karen Hughes would work to convince this vital part of the world of that fact. This statement should have triggered a red flag in the mind of everyone who heard it.

It is not bad enough that the United States is openly starting a public relations campaign with the Middle East for the purpose of making itself look better. What should have struck everyone about this is simple. If you need to convince people that you are compassionate, there is something fundamentally wrong.

Washington fails to understand that it is simple policies like this that make it look arrogant and hypocritical. The so-called Christian compassion, which has in many ways been the ongoing theme of the Bush presidency, is put into an ironic light when placed in the context of this fitting passage from St. Ignatius' letter to the Ephesians "Therefore let them be instructed by you, at least by your deeds".

The United States can send ambassador after ambassador to the Middle East in the hopes of improving its image, but if it continues the path it is on, it would be better off saving the state departments' budget money.

Washington willingly criticizes Iran for its treatment of women and its authoritarian government yet it is in bed with the kingdom of Saudi Arabia where woman are not allowed to drive or work in offices with men, even though these are rights that women enjoy in Iran.

Washington arrogantly marches into war on Iraq, making a total mockery out of the international law system, under the premise of weapons of mass destruction only to find there are no weapons and to then attempt to convince the world that it was a liberation effort.

Washington willingly criticizes Syria and wants to hold them accountable for U.N. resolution 1559, which calls for their withdrawal from Lebanon. However, it fails to criticize Israel on the basis of countless U.N. resolutions calling for its withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza, which began 1,317 Security Council resolutions ago, along with resolution 242.

Washington continues to use labels like "terrorist" and "enemy combatant", vague terms which carry legal repercussions at their own disposal, so that they can demonize who they want when they want.

The United States can send ambassador after ambassador to the Middle East in the hopes of improving it's image, but if it continues the path it is on, it would be better off saving the state departments' budget money.

Washington looks at popular movements in the Middle East, specifically in Palestine, Iraq and Lebanon, and wishes to claim credit for them. The Lebanese opposition, which the United States has supported in its rhetoric, wants to have nothing to do with the United States because they know that will weaken their position domestically.

President Bush claims the winds of democracy are spreading into the Middle East because of the Iraq war but he forgets that Yasser Arafat was democratically elected yet he would rather deal with the oil princes then with the late Palestinian leader.

Iraqis are now writing their constitution. The administration claims that this puts them on the road to democracy, but any one who believes this is ignorant not only to the history of the Middle East but to that of the United States as well. The Constitution of the United States was written in 1789 and has lasted as a strung document that serves as the backbone of the American political system. The United States has brought Iraq to that point in linear history.

The idea is simply end a regime, add democracy and watch it grow. Unfortunately we have modeled this after our linear history, not Iraq's. We forget that the United States spent a few centuries developing the society that it had separated by two vast oceans for external interference before it got to 1789. We ignore that a free public political discourse is absent in Iraq. A large middle class is absent in Iraq. Economic parity is absent in Iraq. Democratic institutions are absent in Iraq. Not to mention a history of western political development is absent from Iraq.

This does not mean that Iraq or any other country in the Middle East is unable to reach a democracy, but the efforts of the United States are not helping it reach that goal. On the contrary it may be hurting it.

If the United States wants to improve its image in the Middle East it first has to open its ears and listen. Then it has to take a long hard look at its history of involvement in the Middle East and realize where this negative image came from. Lastly, the hypocrisy has to end because the United States now has a reputation in the Middle East not so different from the boy who cried wolf.

It seems, however, that President Bush is not ready to take this initiative. In the meantime, he gives the world Karen Hughes. She will smooth things over.

Bush didn't want Iraq elections

Mike Sances

A critic who thought that Washington seeks to protect Americans from further terrorism would naturally be asking what the connection is between fighting terror and promoting freedom. After all, didn't the president tell us on Sept. 20, 2001, that the reason we were attacked was because of the terrorists' hate of freedom? But now George Bush would have us believe that, no, what they really hate is not having freedom. Am I the only one who sees a contradiction here?

Apparently, yes I am. I can only guess this is because I'm of the very small minority of Americans who actually keep track of official explanations for 9/11, or take them seriously. Indeed, those of us still clinging to the old-fashioned notions that events happen for reasons, and that arguments should be built upon evidence, are truly an endangered species.

Personally, however, I don't believe the public has been given any reason — beyond rhetoric, anyway — to think that fighting terrorism is at all high on the list of our leaders' priorities. Same with promoting democracy. Space is limited, so I'll stick to the second for this column; particularly, the elections in Iraq.

Contrary to popular lore, Bush opposed them. "The American plan was not to hold elections this January," Fareed Zakaria accurately reported in the Feb. 14 issue of Newsweek. The Bush/Bremer plan involved total foreign ownership of the Iraqi economy, as well as an elaborate caucus system from which the Iraqi public was to be excluded. "Washington stood firm on this plan," writes Zakaria — until mass nonviolent resistance forced the administration to consult with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the most popular figure in the Iraqi Shiite community, and Lakhdar Brahimi, the UN envoy.

Personally, however, I don't believe the public has been given any reason — beyond rhetoric, anyway — to think that fighting terrorism is at all high on the list of our leaders' priorities.

Some of you might counter that even the possibility of elections wouldn't have come up if not for the war. That's probably correct; but why stop there? Why not ask how Saddam Hussein was able to remain in power before the war? If we were to ask Mr. Brahimi, he would likely tell us — as he told Charlie Rose on June 26, 2004 — that the sanctions in the 90's made Hussein stronger, made the Iraqi people weaker and that all this was well known long before the current hype over the Oil for Food scandal (a "scandal" only if you don't think blackmailing a country for its resources is in itself scandalous).

We could also look into the reasons why Hussein was able to remain in power after the first Gulf War; specifically, how Washington provided tacit support for the brutal repression of the postwar Shiite uprising. It's very strange, as Naomi Klein has pointed out, how this particular manifestation of a "desire for freedom" has been erased from history, and how the January elections have been received as the first sign that Iraqis dislike tyranny.

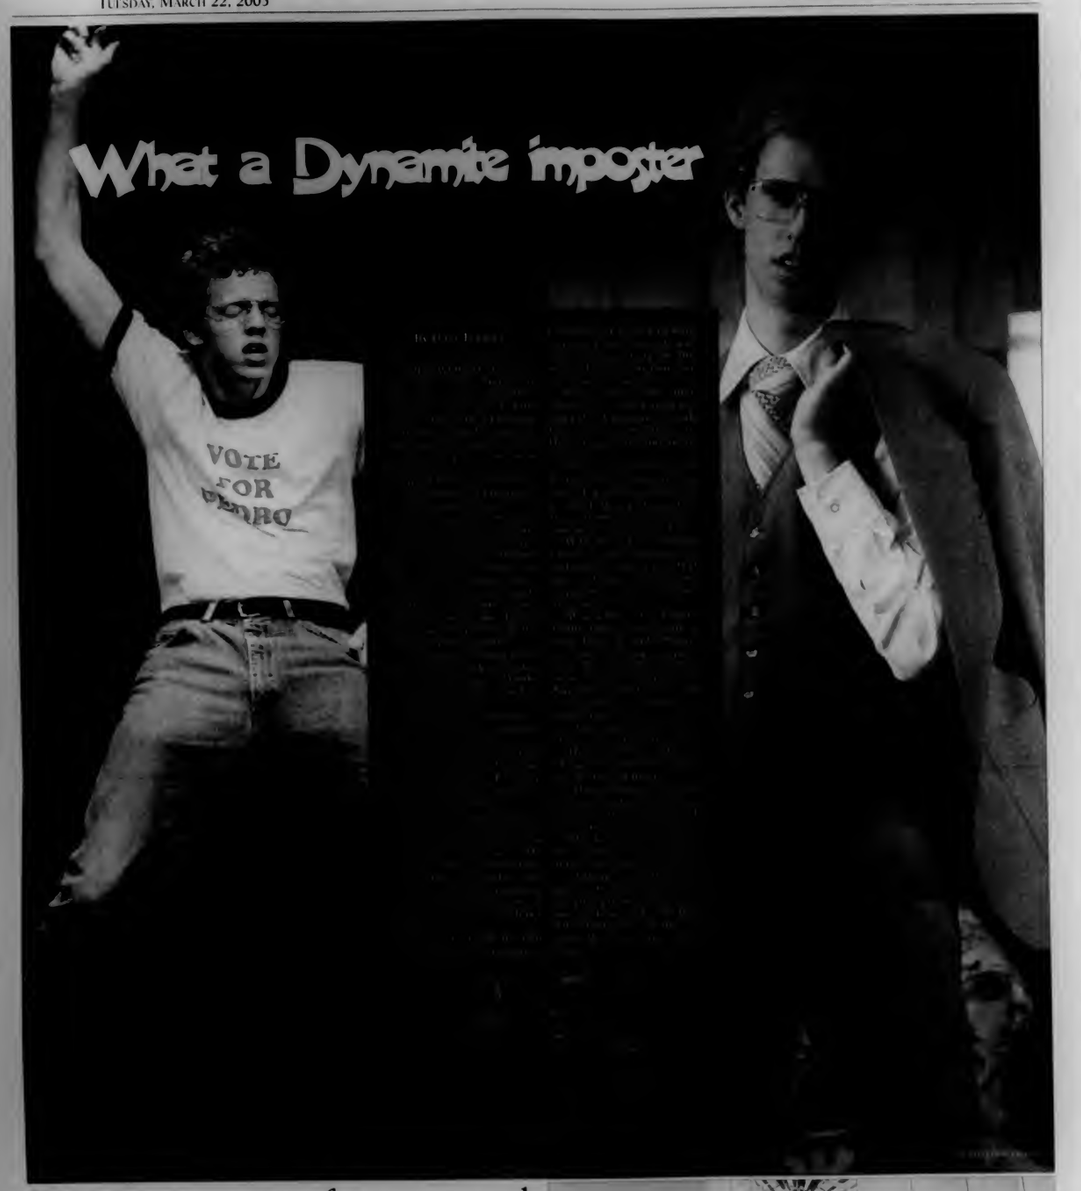
Is it necessary to restate here the history of American support for Hussein in the 80's? Ah, but we are told by the Secretary of State that the past policy of "trading liberty for stability in the Middle East" has now been unilaterally terminated. Forgetting that long and incredibly bloody history for the moment, we again ask for some evidence to back up Ms. Rice's claim.

What we find isn't very pretty. I would advise those of you who are non-veterans against Googling for images of the victims of the Uzbek ruler Karimov, a monster some would compare to Saddam Hussein, and whose crimes we don't even bother reporting in our newspapers due to the basing rights he has provided us.

But even staying within Iraq, if we care to examine the elections that Bush didn't want just a millimeter further than the mass media tells us to, we'd see that the party who won those elections, the UIA, has as the second plank in their platform a demand for a timetable for American withdrawal.

Meanwhile, there is still no timetable, and the Pentagon has announced that it will keep the current levels of troops in Iraq until at least 2007. That's not to mention the military bases we're building.

If you're confused by the apparent contradictions in the administration's thinking, don't be. It's really quite simple, and perhaps best demonstrated by the recent protests in Lebanon. While the first and third of these were hailed by Bush and his supporters as signs of a budding democracy, the second was completely ignored. The reason? The pro-Syrian demonstrators were advocating a position contrary to U.S. interests. Democracy, in short, is something that every American president, in every party, has always supported — but only as long as the votes are in our favor.



While a change of direction here would be most welcome, it is not likely to come out of the simple benevolence of our politicians. It is instead far more likely to result from those same types of activities that forced the president to let Iraqis cast their votes. Indeed, of the many questions raised by a realistic account of the Iraq elections, foremost among them is how a long-oppressed people in an occupied country would seem to hold more power than we do over our allegedly democratic government.

Designers strive for eco-cool

By Eils Lotozo
Knight Ridder Newspapers

PHILADELPHIA — A display of felt hats in a manufacturer's window caught Jaime Salm's eye one day as he walked down 12th Street.

"It was a bright, sunny day, and in the light the felt was translucent," says Salm. "And the shapes were so sensuous. I thought, 'I have to do something with these.' "

Salm, the 26-year-old design force behind the Philadelphia company Mio Culture, turned that moment of inspiration into the Capsule Light, a pendant lamp with a two-tone molded wool felt shade and compact fluorescent bulb.

"Aha" encounters with a raw material happen regularly to Salm. He transformed the rugged cardboard that goes into egg cartons into Mio Culture's "V2" 3-D wallpaper tiles. And a stack of discarded paper and cardboard inspired a product now in development, the "Bale" chair, a laminated plywood seat designed to strap over a base of old phone books and other items meant for the recycling bin.

But what truly drives Salm's ideas, and forms the central mission of the firm he and his older brother, Isaac, launched in 2003, is what he calls "eco-intelligent" sustainable design.

Mio Culture products don't just attend to function and aesthetics, but address a whole checklist of issues that include an emphasis on recycled or renewable materials, limited product packaging, a concern for how objects will be disposed of when they outlive their usefulness, and the human impact on local economies.

"Sustainable design ... takes into account all of our actions in regard to the environment, and to the people in that environment," Jaime Salm says. "This is a movement that is gaining speed and momentum. It's not just a crunchy, granola-bar thing. This is where things are going."

The Salms, who grew up in Medellin, Colombia, and share a home in Society Hill, run Mio Culture out of a big-windowed third-floor studio in a former industrial building north of Chinatown.

The company is still very much in the start-up mode. The brothers not only do all the design and marketing work, they handle the shipping, too, including orders from their Web site, www.mioculture.com. They used to spend many a night and weekend assembling their Capsule Lights. (They now pay the New York manufacturer of the lamps' lighting component to handle that task.)

For the fledgling firm, recognition has come quickly. At the New York International Gift Fair in January, a market for retail buyers, Mio won a "best collection" award for its line.

Among the products: a powder-coated aluminum stool called Stoop Social Seating that looks like an upside down bowl; the Shroom lamp, whose molded felt shade gives it the appearance of a fairy-tale toadstool; and the Grid wall pocket, made from die-cut and stitched recycled felt.

But it is their very first product, the V2 wallpaper tiles, that remains the biggest attention-getter for Mio ("mine" in Spanish).

Last fall, Neiman Marcus used V2 as a backdrop for window displays in stores across the country. The paper tiles, which manage to look simultaneously retro and futuristic and whose curvy bas-relief forms can be configured into different

Church protests Shepard

By Blake Parsons
Daily Mississippian

OXFORD, Miss. — Judy Shepard, mother of hate crime victim Matthew Shepard, will present a lecture on diversity Tuesday at 7 p.m. in Fulton Chapel, and protestors from a church in Topeka, Kan. will be on campus.

Sponsored by the University of Mississippi Gay Straight Alliance, the event is part of the GSA Annual Lecture Series.

On Oct. 8, 1998, Matthew Shepard was reportedly beaten because he was gay. He died four days later.

Since then, Judy Shepard has been speaking out for hate crime victims and advocating legislation against hate crimes.

Shepard and her husband founded the Matthew Shepard Foundation to continue their son's legacy and fight for social justice.

The Foundation's work includes efforts for gay and lesbian equality as well as helping to prevent hate crimes.

Shepard's campaign for social justice continued in 1999 when she appeared before the U.S. Senate Judicial Committee to support the Hate Crimes Prevention Act. Shepard also appeared in two public service television announcements advocating a greater understanding of gay issues.

Produced by the Matthew Shepard Foundation, the ads focused on stopping anti-gay violence. Shepard has continued her effort to stop anti-gay violence by speaking to audiences nationwide about the topic.

Since the killing, information gathered by ABC News suggests that the killing may have been motivated by robbery. One of the defendants was using crystal methamphetamine in the days leading up to the attack. Both defendants Aaron McKinney and Russell Henderson were both a part of the Laramie drug scene, and McKinney admitted to having a serious drug habit, and said robbery was the motive, according to the report.

The visit drew the attention of a church in Kansas, whose pastor is has been protesting Shepard since the killing.

A group from the Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka will be making a 700-mile trip to Oxford, Miss., to protest the speech according to Fred Phelps, pastor of the church and Meridian, Miss., native.

"We are coming to inject a little truth and sanity into that orgy of sodomite lies that Judy Shepard is spreading," Phelps said.

Phelps runs three Web sites, godhatesfags.com, godhatesamerica.com and hatemongers.com.

Phelps and his group protested the funeral of Shepard.

"He sinned against god and wound up in hell," Phelps said. "She is using that unfortunate event to propangandize."

J. Thomas Vasser Jr, vice president of the GSA, organized the effort to bring Shepard to Ole Miss. He said her availability and the power of her message influenced the GSA's choice to have Shepard speak here.

Vasser collected 16 sponsors for Shepard's lecture, from both the university and the Oxford community. He began gathering support with Campus Programming.

"Campus Programming gave support from the very beginning because (Director) Jennifer Taylor heard Judy Shepard speak before; she knew she was a very powerful speaker," he said.

Vasser then went to the city for additional support. According to Vasser, the city, while supportive of the lecture, has no discretionary funding for speakers.

He found additional sponsors in university organizations and offices. The Division of Student Life provided a Student Life Development Grant and Student Housing and Residence Life supported the speaker fee of $4,500 as well as helping with ad costs. The Sarah Isom Center for Women and Gender Studies is also sponsoring the lecture. Isom Center director Mary Carruth said the Center wanted to support the Shepard lecture because her message brings attention to topics such as homophobia, as well as sexism.

"First of all, Judy Shepard's mission and lecture reflect the theme of this year's national Women's History Month, which is 'Women Change America,'" she said. "Secondly, the Center's gender studies courses analyze the existence and causes of the ignorance and hatred that Shepard brings to our attention."

"Homophobia and sexism, for example, reinforce each other. Homophobia usually insists on rigid gender roles that may prevent us from achieving full personhood."

Marc Showalter, director of the University Counseling Center, believes events like Shepard's lecture bring up topics that can positively affect diversity on campus.

"Events like Mrs. Shepard's lecture begin conversations that ask about her message and what she's trying to say," he said, "It's important to have these conversations even if they're uncomfortable or controversial."

designs, have been added to the permanent collection at the Smithsonian Institution's Cooper-Hewitt, National Design Museum in New York.

"There is really a market for it," says Isaac Salm, 27, a former financial analyst for Kimberly-Clark Corp. who left the corporate world to run the business side of Mio. Architect Rem Koolhaas' firm has contacted them about using V2, he says, and Mio has heard from designers and architects in Spain, Greece and India.

"I stumbled upon it in a magazine, and I knew I would use it as soon as I found the right space," says interior designer John Bruce, who is featured on the TLC home-makeover show "While You Were Out."

Bruce got his chance with V2 last year, when he redid a loft apartment in Atlanta for the program. He covered a wall with the tiles, painted them white, and positioned a colored light to rake the surface.

"The effects were stunning," Bruce says. "This product is fantastic. It's light, made from recycled material, is easy to paint and install, and it's super-affordable."

In the works is a new V2 design that will be fire-retardant and come in colors. But getting the V2 to market in the first place was a long haul for Mio, one that points to the challenges of sustainable design.

Jaime Salm, whose father has a box company in Medellin, had first worked with the formed, recycled-cardboard material for his senior thesis when he was an industrial-design student at the University of the Arts. That led to a project, just after his 2001 graduation, for the Anthropologie retail chain, which asked him to design 3-D cardboard "sale" signs.

"I just loved the material," Salm says. "It's 100 percent recycled. It's just waste paper."

But its manufacturers were used to it being stamped into bulky rough-hewn trays to cradle fruit in crates or machine parts during shipment. Salm needed something smooth and perfectly uniform in dimension for his wallpaper tiles.

"I'd go to visit factory owners, and they'd say, 'You want us to do what?' " recalls Salm, who eventually found a company with the right technology and a willingness to innovate.

Persuading the Philadelphia hat manufacturer whose goods Salm spied in the window to apply his felt-molding techniques to lamp shades was easy. Persuading a steel-plant operator to alter his ways was more of a challenge.

The Salms found a firm that could stamp out steel patterns for a new design they're calling the Bendant lamp, its flower-petal-like metal arms can be bent in various ways, but there was a catch: no imported steel, whose shipping increases pollution.

Says Isaac Salm: "Ninety percent of manufacturers don't care where materials are coming from, and we are just one client. We had to try to get this guy to understand that for our product to be considered sustainable, it had to be made only from domestic steel."

They succeeded. And the Salms, who are branching out into corporate consulting on sustainability, view that victory as equally important as an uptick in sales for Mio's products.

"It is possible to start moving on the path of sustainability in all sorts of ways," Jaime Salm says. "Fundamental change can happen, but you have to take the small steps."

Mio Culture's products are available at the company's Web site, www.mioculture.com.

Available at Target.com are "V2" 3-D wallpaper tiles, which cost $27.99 a box, and the "Grid" wall pocket, which costs $59.99.

Sophomore forward Brian Boyle, who scored two goals in the championship, was named tournament MVP. Boyle, who hails from Hingham, Mass., had a nicely sized local crowd, including family and friends, backing him.

"I don't even know if it's hit me yet," Boyle said. "It's pretty neat. There are a lot of people in the house, a lot of local people, which is pretty cool... The MVP stuff doesn't even matter. The battle we just had, we became so much closer as a team. And those guys in the locker room, we're all brothers now. We have been through the season, but we're tighter than ever now. It's an unbelievable feeling when you've got that many guys pulling for each other like that."

Also making a serious name for himself this weekend was BC freshman goalie Cory Schneider, who improved his collegiate record to 12-0-4 after getting the nod from York during both games.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Boston College forward Matt Greene and UNH's Daniel Wittick battle for the puck on a face-off.

Schneider made 39 saves in the 2-1 double-overtime win over Maine while standing between the pipes for 89:09 — the longest semifinal game in Hockey East history, on his 19th birthday, no less — and came back strong to make 26 more against the top-rated offense in Hockey East in the championship on Saturday.

"I don't even think I should have been the MVP today," Boyle said. "I think the guy sitting next to me [Schneider] should have been."

After a stalemate through most of the first period and a plethora of tough saves to keep the Eagles off the board, UNH goalie Jeff Pietrasiak finally gave in to the BC offense. Boyle won the faceoff at the left point in the UNH zone and muscled his 6-foot-7, 235 pound frame through a series of Wildcats before squeezing a shot between Pietrasiak's right side and the post to give Boston College a 1-0 edge 13:59 into the game.

The Wildcats were able to answer that score just over three minutes into the second period while Taylor Leahy was serving time in the box after being called for holding. Robbie Barker passed the puck into the Eagle zone across to the left side of the ice to Preston Callander, who fed Sean Collins with the puck while he was charging to the net in the slot. Collins returned the favor to Callander, who was able to beat Schneider to tie the game at 1.

The Eagles broke the tie before the end of the second period when Ryan Shannon fired a slap shot into traffic from inside the blue line. The puck deflected off a defender and landed directly on Boyle's stick, and the tournament MVP easily scored a power play goal as Pietrasiak was caught off guard and out of position.

In the third period, when New Hampshire was able to gain little momentum and virtually zero quality scoring opportunities, the Eagles iced the game with a Chris Collins goal with only 2:27 to play in regulation. Collins picked up a dancing puck in the UNH zone, skated around Wildcat defenseman Craig Switzer and backhanded a shot off Pietrasiak's left glove to seal the championship.

NOTES: Each night recorded a sellout crowd of 17,565 at the FleetCenter for a two-night total of 35,130 fans, which broke the 2003 tournament record of 34,328. It was the third consecutive year that the semifinal games were sold out, and it was the first time the championship game was sold out, breaking the 2002 championship record of 17,122.

Schneider was named to the All-Tournament Team as the goalie. The two defensemen named were Brian Yandle of UNH and Andrew Alberts, who scored the game-winning overtime goal to beat Maine the night before. Daniel Winnik of UNH, plus Boyle and Callander were named the forwards.

up," Miller said. "Our guys do a great job of practicing hard everyday and it really doesn't matter whether we play our first against our first."

In their last game the Minutemen put together an offensive clinic against the Brown Bears, but did not get the typical output from its preseason All-American Sean Morris who had a goal and an assist. Morris leads the team in goals with 15.

Cannella was pleased with Morris' output regardless of what it looks like on paper and is pleased that he has other options that maintain the continuity of the Minutemen's offense.

"You need to have a lot of people contribute. When someone has an off day, not that Sean had an off day whatsoever, its good to see other people do a good job," Cannella said. "Sean had some opportunities and went one-and-one (one goal, one assist), maybe its not on par with what people think he should be doing, but he's a team guy."

UMass attackman Sean Morris goes for a shot against Brown on Saturday. Morris had a goal and an assist on the game, UMass won 12-5.

Cannella also mentioned that regardless of the last game, he hopes his team approaches each game with equal confidence stemming from ample preparation.

"You hope that through proper preparation your guys are ready regardless of the situation, regardless of how you played in the last game," Cannella said. "If you prepare the right way, you can be ready for anybody."

Minutemen look for offense

the season wasn't foreseen previously, it now looks to be an inevitability, as part of the leadership role in the outfield now falls unto Derek Durepo (.261) in light of the two stars' absences. The lack of plate experience from the youth-filled majority of the Minutemen doesn't help matters either.

"The key thing is manufacturing runs," Stone said. "That's something we haven't really done a good job with."

Jeremy Demers (1-2) will get the start on the mound tomorrow for the Minutemen, though he figures to get no more than three innings of work as Stone will be using a variety of pitchers. Through four appearances in 2005, the junior from Easthampton, Mass., has given up 10 earned runs, second highest to senior captain Keith Doherty (15), and accumulated an earned run average of 5.87.

In his last start, Demers gave up five runs on eight hits in 2-1/3 innings as the Minutemen dropped a 6-1 decision to the Yale Bulldogs in Bradenton, Fla. However, he proved adequate in relief of Doherty on Saturday, as he came on in the ninth inning and provided one inning of shutout pitching. The effort was to no avail, as the Cadets cruised to an easy 5-0 victory behind preseason All-American Nick Hill's two-hit, eight-strikeout shutout.

"He's been keeping his hand behind the ball, staying on top of his breaking ball, pitching downhill, and did a nice job on Saturday night in one inning of relief," Stone said.

The Huskies are coming off a come-from-behind 9-8 victory over Centenary College last Sunday in Shreveport, La., giving them the 2-1 edge in the weekend series and eight wins in their last 10 games. Freshman Matt Karl came up big for UConn in the top of the seventh when he smacked a two-run single with the bases loaded to put the Huskies up for good.

Because of a two-hour rain delay early in the game, the game had to be shortened to seven innings due to UConn's travel accommodations, and the Huskies held on for the win behind the pitching of Ted Garry (2-0).

two-run homer by Chip Ambres. Schilling's first pitch to nine of the 12 batters was a strike and he struck out three while walking none.

"I feel very good about it," he said.

Schilling said his surgery was more extensive than he anticipated and involved four separate operations.

He said a bone bruise that bothered him most of the season was more severe than expected. And he revealed that the dislocated tendon which had been slipping out of place sustained a 6-inch tear during Game 6 of the AL championship series against the Yankees.

He pitched with the injury in Game 2 of the World Series against St. Louis.

"The tendon stopped dislocating because it had split in half and wedged itself over the bone," Schilling said. "So it wasn't dislocating as much, which was actually a good thing."

Before those two games, a unique procedure was done to stitch the tendon to the skin so it would stay in place.

Schilling's recovery affected his normal offseason preparations for spring training and kept him out of games until Monday.

Mueller said Schilling's ball had "a lot of life" in the third when he doubled.

Mueller expects no problem being ready by opening day and said, "I feel like I'm caught up to the guys playing games now and now it's just a matter of going three days, possibly, in a row."

Schilling was encouraged after throwing all his pitches, and Varitek said, "today was a very positive outing."

He expects to pitch Thursday in another minor league game. Then, he said, he could pitch in his first major league spring training game next Monday and in one of Boston's last two exhibition games, in Arizona on March 31 or April 1.

Monday's performance "felt like a walk in the park," he said. All his pitches "felt good. I gave up the home run on a pitch that I'm just as apt to make in August as I am now. It wasn't because my stuff wasn't there. I hung a split."

Until Monday, Schilling had thrown to batters twice - one batting practice session and a simulated game in which he threw 63 pitches last Wednesday.

He was scheduled to throw two innings on Monday but had only 18 pitches at that point and came out for the third. Pitching coach Dave Wallace was encouraged by the game setting in which Schilling ran to cover first on Mueller's first-inning groundout and whirled to try to pick Berg off second.

"It was quicker than the simulated game, so it was good," Wallace said. "You're not concerned (about his ability to run) but it's just nice to see him react naturally and get over" to first.

Schilling threw with greater speed than in recent workouts but said he didn't know if he'd be ready for the home opener April 11 against New York. Francona has said Tim Wakefield will start that game.

But Schilling "absolutely" will be with the team for the season opener.

Silas fired amidst playoff hunt

By Tom Withers
Associated Press

CLEVELAND - Paul Silas was fired as coach of the Cleveland Cavaliers on Monday, his team fighting for a playoff spot after leading its division earlier this year. Longtime NBA assistant Brendan Malone was appointed interim coach.

Silas told The Associated Press he was informed at a morning meeting with general manager Jim Paxson and new owner Dan Gilbert. Silas' son, assistant Stephen Silas, also was fired.

"They didn't think the team was performing as well as it should be and they wanted to make a change," Paul Silas said.

Malone's first game as the Cavaliers' head coach will be Tuesday night at home against Detroit.

Despite superstar LeBron James, fellow All-Star Zydrunas Ilgauskas and a veteran bench, the Cavaliers have struggled since the All-Star break. They have lost nine of 12 and nine straight road games, including Sunday's 105-98 loss to Toronto when James scored a franchise-record 56.

"We believe in our players, and that progress just wasn't being made," Paxson said at a news conference Monday. "We have 18 games left in this season. We're fifth in the Eastern Conference right now, and we felt that if we didn't make this decision that we were jeopardizing our ability to be a playoff team this year."

The Cavaliers entered the All-Star break at 30-21, then went into a slide, the decline marked by personnel issues.

The trouble may have culminated Sunday when Silas benched starting guard Jeff McInnis and replaced him with Eric Snow. Snow did not score in Cleveland's loss at Toronto and McInnis, despite dressed and available, didn't play.

Earlier this season, Silas threw Snow off the bench after the two exchanged words during the first quarter at Detroit, a move that stunned the team because of Snow's reputation as a leader.

Last week, Silas was fined $10,000 by the team for a derogatory comment he made about Utah forward Carlos Boozer.

Silas made the remark to reporters a day before Boozer was to return to Cleveland after leaving the Cavaliers as a free agent last summer. Boozer didn't travel with the Jazz because of a foot injury. Silas later apologized.

The 61-year-old Silas joined Cleveland in June 2003 after being fired by the New Orleans Hornets, having led them to the playoffs four straight times.

Malone, in his first season with the Cavaliers, was the first coach of the expansion Toronto Raptors, spending one season with the team. He's been an assistant with New York, Indiana, Seattle and Detroit in 19 years of NBA coaching.

"We felt the change today was necessary. It's going to put us in a better position to win," Gilbert said.

The Cavaliers are ninth team to make a coaching change since the start of the season, nearly one-third of the league. They join Dallas, Denver, Los Angeles Lakers, Memphis, Minnesota, New York Knicks, Orlando and Portland.

Silas and James made for a formidable duo last season, leading the Cavaliers to a 35-47 record last season - an 18-game turnaround. He seemed to have the respect of his players, who played hard for him and were improving.

However, in the offseason, the club lost Boozer after allowing him to become a free agent. It was the first sign of real trouble.

The Cavaliers started this season strong, staying in first place for most of the first two months of the season, but injuries and inconsistency led to the recent losing streak.

Silas was hired to be James' first professional coach and to mentor the 18-year-old star. James has soared from rookie of the year last season to All-Star this year, but the rest of the team has struggled.

That became apparent Sunday in the team's third straight loss. While James had a career day, becoming the youngest player in NBA history to score 50 or more points, the Cavaliers were weak on defense and the reserves were outscored 34-1.

During 16 seasons as an NBA player, Silas was fierce under the boards and on defense. He was twice selected as an All-Star and won three NBA championships - two with Boston, one with Seattle.

As a coach, he had a record of 355-400 with the Clippers, Hornets and Cavaliers. His Hornets teams (both in Charlotte and New Orleans) went 13-16 the playoffs.

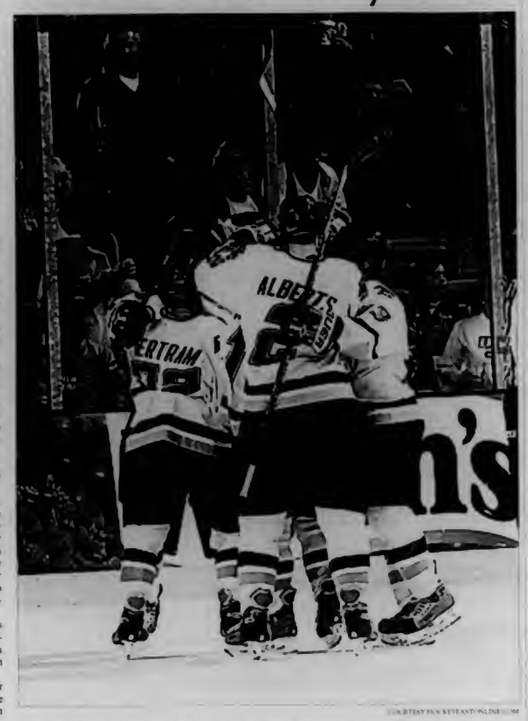
Eagles soar in Hockey East

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — When Friday night's round of semifinal games concluded, the lights at the FleetCenter turned dark, the two victorious teams returned to their respective hotel rooms and Saturday's championship appeared to be a virtual lock for the New Hampshire Wildcats.

UNH was rolling through the Hockey East playoffs, sweeping Northeastern in the quarterfinals by scores of 6-1 and 4-0, and knocking Boston University out of the semis, 5-2.

Boston College, on the other hand, struggled mightily to get past Maine and a ferocious effort from Black Bear goalie Jimmy Howard in double overtime on Friday night, and the Eagles had lost two of their most talented players for possibly the remainder of the season in the week leading up to the conference championship.



Hockey East Player of the Year Patrick Eaves suffered an apparent chest injury during the team's series with the Minutemen, and Stephen Gionta, who scored the game-winning breakaway goal in overtime against UMass in Game 1 of the quarterfinals, was taken to the hospital for a possible broken clavicle during the Eagles' victory over the Black Bears.

But what seemed to be a setback on the surface apparently set a fire within the BC locker room, as every player on the roster stepped their play up to give the Eagles a 3-1 win over the Wildcats in the Hockey East Championship. BC was faster to every loose puck and quicker to cut off every passing lane to completely stifle the Wildcat attack.

The win gave Boston College its record-setting sixth postseason conference championship, breaking a three-way tie with Boston University and Maine.

"What a great feeling it is for myself, coaching," Boston College coach Jerry York said. "I've been in

UMass prepares to face a similar foe

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After its most dominating performance of the year, a 12-5 victory over Brown on Saturday afternoon, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse (4-1) team ventures to Fairfield, Conn. today to take on a Sacred Heart team that nearly mirrors its approach to the game.

The Pioneers (4-1) have been on a tear this season winning its last four games, including a 9-8 victory over Dartmouth on Saturday. Sacred Heart has outscored its opponents 60-45, exhibiting a spread out offense that has seen 21 different players in the points column.

"They're excellent, they're an excellent program and just beat Dartmouth which may be the biggest victory in the program's history," UMass head coach Greg Cannella said. "They've played very well this year and have been playing a lot of players that have contributed for them. It's really been a concerted team effort: they are really a good group of athletes. It's going to be a battle."

Sacred Heart has been led by Matthew Robideau who has seven goals and eight assists on the season. Robideau was named the Sacred Heart Student-Athlete of the Week Award for this past week for his two goals and two assists against Dartmouth.

Even though he leads the team in points (15), Robideau is tied for second on the team in goals with Kiel Adams. Sophomore attackman Matt Greco leads the team in goals with 11.

The Minutemen had their best defensive performance of the year on Saturday, shutting down Brown's preseason All-American Chazz Woodson. Cannella, however, is not ready to rest on his team's laurels and sees Sacred Heart's as much more than a one man team.

"They have four or five guys like Woodson, all of their leading scorers have a bunch of points. So it's not one particular guy that you can key in on," Cannella said.

"Certainly Matt Robideau is an excellent player, but if you look at the team's statistics people are contributing in different ways."

UMass assistant coach Jason Miller, whose primary focus is the Minutemen's defense, sees the Pioneer offense as a intriguing challenge. Sacred Heart tends to keep a top-heavy frontline, as they attack with as many as six attackmen and eight midfielders.

This style tends to open up a lot of shots and has proved to be an advantage for Sacred Heart this season as it has out-shot its opponents 178-to-147, with an outstanding .635 shots on goal percentage.

This run and gun approach has also been the bread and butter for UMass this year, which makes for an interesting match-up today.

"They are similar to the way we play, they are very open and take a lot of shots," Miller said. "The first challenge is going to be getting matched up the right way, the second challenge is going to be defending them in a way that we don't give up a tremendous amount of looks at the goal."

The fact that both teams play at the same tempo can be seen as both a positive and a negative for the Minutemen. The last time UMass went against a team that played a spread out offense was against Stony Brook on March 12, a game the Minutemen lost 10-9.

However, since the Maroon and White are already accustomed to the way the Pioneers play, it can pit its offense against its defense without making many alterations. Miller is pleased with his team's depth and the fact that regardless of the line, both sides will get a good workout.

"It varies by the day, sometimes we practice our first guys against our first guys, sometimes we mix it

Softball's southern advantage

Eric Athas

There is a basic principle that tags along with being a college softball team.

The good teams are located in the southwest region of America and the not so good teams are located in the northeast region.

It's the simple concept of "practice makes perfect," because the teams that can practice and play in the warm weather all year long are just plain better than the teams that have to stay indoors from December through April. (In walks Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino.) Okay, now I have to stop writing about this myth and start writing about the Minutewomen.

At this point it is obvious that UMass is an exception to the rule, as the program's history is one of the most illustrious in the nation despite being located in the arctic-like New England. This is why it is important to look at the structure of each season rather than just give a perplexed glance at the team's 8-9 record.

At the start of every season, from mid-February to late March, UMass competes in tournaments located in the hot spots of the country in order to play catch-up with the rest of the nationally recognized college softball teams. Most of the teams that UMass plays during this first phase of the season have already competed in a hefty number of games before meeting up with the Maroon and White.

Let me throw some out some examples of what the Maroon and White faced to kick of the 2005 season. The team's second game of the season was a 4-3 loss against No. 16 Georgia and while this was the Minutewomen's second game in '05, it was Georgia's 13th. The following day UMass played its fourth game, losing to No. 17 Nebraska 3-1 (this was Nebraska's 24th game of the season) and then played its fifth game, a 6-1 loss to South Carolina (SC's 17th game). While the climate may be a deterrent to UMass, it certainly does not discourage the team, because four of the Minutewomen's eight wins have been against teams located in warmer territory (two of those wins were against No. 22 Florida International).

Game play, or lack thereof, is not the only disadvantage that a bitter climate gives any team. Preparing for games in a gym or on Astroturf is not necessarily the ideal location to practice. It's the small things that can disrupt the consistency of any program. Grounding a ball off of a hard gym floor is not the same as grounding it off of the infield dirt and you cannot swing away against a defense indoors without breaking a few lights or windows.

So now the question to be asked is: What is Sortino's secret? How has she managed to propel the cold-climate program that has made 10 straight trips to the NCAA tournament?

There's no real secret, it's more like a strategically planned mix of several factors that make up for the daunting weather early in the season. A combination of sound recruiting and solid coaching are two aspects that UMass has mastered, but one facet that Sortino makes sure to stress on is the basic fundamentals of softball. Fundamentals are a common necessity and no matter what part of the nation a team is in, without basic fundamentals, success is undetectable.

Seventeen games have been completed for the Massachusetts softball team thus far. 35 games remain. Spring is around the corner and for UMass, I don't want to say the easy part is over, but the playing field is certainly leveled and for this Atlantic Ten monster, it's feeding time. Normally the name of a softball team located in the northeast is not supposed to be used in the same sentence with the word "excellence." However by all means, UMass softball is a team with a southwest persona located in a run of the mill part of the country.

Minutemen set to face Huskies

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Just when things couldn't get any worse for the Massachusetts baseball team as they prepare to take on the powerful Connecticut Huskies (11-4) this afternoon, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse (4-1) team ventures to Fairfield, Conn. today to take on a Sacred Heart team that nearly mirrors its approach to the game.

Senior outfielder Curt Szado, who currently leads the 3-9 Minutemen in batting average (.333), runs (five), hits (12) and runs batted in (seven), will miss tomorrow's game due to a shoulder injury he sustained last weekend in Twin Lakes, Fla. The Monson, Mass., native jammed his shoulder last Saturday in a game against the Army Black Knights after diving for a ball that was hit into the gap. Szado is likely to miss this weekend's Atlantic 10 opener in Cincinnati, Ohio against the Xavier Musketeers as well.

Szado's injury comes at a very inconvenient time, as the Minutemen had already lost senior Jason Twomley earlier in the year to a broken wrist. At the time of his injury, Twomley was leading the team in slugging percentage (.647) by a mile and was second in the team in batting (.295).

"We've asked [Szado] to step up this year into more of a leadership role, and he's done that," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "He's been having a good season so far, and it's unfortunate that he got hurt on Saturday. Hopefully, we'll have some people that can fill in roles and contribute.

"It's difficult when you lose a guy like that, but that's why we carry 25 guys on the travel team, so when someone goes down, people are ready to step up."

Without Twomley — and now without Szado — the Minutemen are batting a measly .182 as a team. Meanwhile, the Huskies come to Bridgeport Blue Fish Stadium in Bridgeport, Conn., today with seven players batting at least .300.

Needless to say, the two squads are on polar opposites when it comes to plate performance.

"We need to be smarter at the plate and make the right adjustments," Stone said. "We haven't been doing a good job of that. We're pressing quite a bit, so we need to make some adjustments physically with our approach. Hopefully then, we'll be able to get back on track."

The UMass bats cannot afford to continue going as quietly as they have, amassing just 10 hits in their current three-game losing streak, especially when pitted against the likes of fence-swingers like Dennis Donovan (.327, 18 hits), Austin Wasserman (.322, 19 hits, 27 total bases) and Bryan Maier (.302, 19 hits, 14 RBI). The Huskies, in contrast, are batting 110 points higher as a team than UMass (.292).

Schilling makes first appearance

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Curt Schilling made his first game appearance of the spring Monday, allowing two runs and three hits over three innings against a team of Boston Red Sox minor leaguers.

Schilling, recovering from ankle surgery, already knows he won't be ready for the opener at the New York Yankees on April 3.

"Today, to me, was a very big day," he said. "I guess you could call it a breakthrough day, in a sense. Everything that I was hoping kind of would happen happened from a physical standpoint. I feel like I threw the ball better than I've thrown it all spring."

Manager Terry Francona has said David Wells will start opening day and Boston can get by without a fifth starter until April 18. Schilling, who underwent right ankle surgery last November, said it was too early to tell whether he'd begin the season on the disabled list.

"I've known for a couple of weeks now that it just wasn't going to work out" for him to pitch on opening day, he said.

The only other major leaguers in Monday's game were Jason Varitek, who caught Schilling, and third baseman Bill Mueller, who had minor knee surgery and wanted extra at-bats. The other players came from Boston's minor league camp.

Schilling threw 25 of 37 pitches for strikes and allowed doubles by Mueller and Dave Berg and a

UMass student starts webmagazine

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Coming to college can be a big change in a student's life. Many students feel isolated in the stress they may undergo during that change, and, often, they wish for a way to connect with other students to see that they are not alone.

One University of Massachusetts student wants to make that connection possible.

Jessica Zolotorofe, a sophomore Journalism major, is starting a webmagazine called "Your's Truly," aimed primarily at college-aged women with stories to tell. In an email interview Zolotorofe said, "it's basically a forum for students to express themselves and ask for help, offer advice or post stories that they want to share with others. It's also a great opportunity for students across America to gain writing experience, publish articles and learn how to work with an editor."

It's also important, says Zolotorofe, that the stories her magazine is looking for be told. "I just feel that with going to college being so life altering itself, it is a time when students should be able to open up and gain support from other students who have been through, or who are currently going through, similar situations."

In fact, the reason that Zolotorofe called her magazine "Your's Truly" was that she "wanted the magazine to have a warm feeling, and "your's truly" seemed to provide that. It's supposed to be people reaching out to each other or almost like writing letters to other college students, so "your's truly" being a friendly ending to a letter, it seemed appropriate."

By printing stories about coping with eating disorders, learning disabilities, losing family members, trouble adjusting to college, rape, breaking up, suicide and disease, says Zolotorofe, it will "offer the opportunity for people to reach out and realize that others want to hear their stories."

Zolotorofe's original intention was to start a print magazine, but realized through her work with the literary magazine, "Illiterati," that even one print edition of a magazine can run costs up into the thousands. "A web-based magazine was the practical way to get started." Zolotorofe hopes that, once her webmag gains popularity, she will be able to start up a print version.

ANDREW TARNOWSKI/COLLEGIAN

Jessica Zolotorofe, a UMass journalism student, created a webmagazine called "Yours Truly" aimed toward women.

Another benefit of using a web-based magazine is the audience it can reach, says Zolotorofe. "It's a great way to reach a large number of people at once. Technology has provided us with so many opportunities, I thought a web-based magazine was the perfect way to take advantage of that."

The web-based approach has allowed Zolotorofe to encourage students from across the country to submit to her magazine. She says that

UMass community has mixed reactions to report

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

In the aftermath of Chancellor John V. Lombardi's report on the Commission for Campus Diversity's recommendations, the University of Massachusetts community had mixed reactions.

"What they proposed is detrimental," said Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante. "I strongly oppose it."

Over spring break, Lombardi posted his recommendations on the Commission's Web site. On it, he lays out many proposals to help out diversity at the University. One of his proposals is to group more than 40 student organizations into one center, The Center for Student Development.

"The response to the report by the Commission on Campus Diversity is a proposal developed by many people and brought together in one place for the many campus constituencies to read and respond," Lombardi said in an e-mail to The Daily Collegian.

"Most of the programs operate independently and with little sense of common purpose," Lombardi said of the student groups he listed in his report. He said that many of these programs "exist in semi-isolation scattered throughout the campus bureaucracy."

Lombardi said in his report that the CSD will help these students, which range from members of African Latino Asian Native American community to the SGA to Student Legal Services, will give the student's a "sense of community and shared responsibility."

In the report, Lombardi outlined many things the Center would be responsible for. Lombardi said that the Center would help students with wellness, health, and help them with problem-solving and decision-making skills.

"Primarily, the CSD will focus on educational and social engagement and student development programs," Lombardi said in his report. Lombardi also listed types of educational programs that he feels the Center would give the students.

While Lombardi's report is supposed to bring the community of UMass together, many others have voiced their displeasure over what he plans to do.

Bustamante was very critical of the report, and was upset at what he thought was the ignoring of the Commission by Lombardi.

"It rejects all the Commission's recommendations," he said. "I couldn't be more disappointed."

Bustamante said that Lombardi ignored many of the important recommendations of the Commission in its 86-page report it issued on March 1.

SGA presidential debate 2005

Five candidates face-off in heated debate last night; cast your vote tomorrow and Friday. By Julie O'Donnell, Collegian Staff

James Washburn

Although not an SGA Senator, presidential candidate James Washburn told viewers of his high hopes for the SGA to progress, specifically to work with other student groups on campus.

"There is a common feel of student apathy towards the SGA," he said. " I am aiming to get students back involved, student apathy can be changed with RSO involvement."

He also criticized the current SGA members for not working with the administration, claiming that, "the SGA is acting like a bunch of teenagers with their parents." He said that the administration is like the parents, and they always make the final decision, even though the teenagers always fight.

"If we can get students more involved, they will be more willing to stay involved," he said.

Pavel Payano

Current SGA Senator Pavel Payano announced his goals and hopes for the student body while specifically talking about improvements in affordability and adjoin ability for the university.

"We can either be a useless tool or we can be useful," he said. "The textbook rental program will save students 45 percent on what they spend on books and that is just the start."

Payano said that he has been working hard with legislators all year to increase the public funding for UMass and that student support is vital.

"We want to work to expand the program to reach out to legislators and to open a line of communication that we can benefit from. We need to establish a relationship with the State house."

Payano also said that as one of the key advocates for Back to the

Sean Bliss

During last night's debate, presidential candidate, Senator Sean Bliss, expressed his interests and goals that the Student Government Association needs to establish in order to progress while emphasizing the "small things" getting accomplished.

"The small things may not seem significant," he said, "but they do mean a lot."

Bliss has been working this year in Back to the People meetings in local dining commons getting student input on what changes they would like to see.

"Paper towels are being installed in Central bathrooms right now," he said, "and this was because nine out of 10 students complained about it. [Back to the People meetings] are tremendously effective."

Bliss has also been in charge of recruiting support for student recy

Owen Moore

Student Owen Moore said that he wants to be President of the SGA, although he neglected to address any of the issues, and rather joked about the elections with sidekick and fellow presidential candidate Cornelius Nuggent.

In his opening statement, he said that he was running for president because he is the "go-to guy" and that he promises "to work hard because the zombies are after me telling me to run."

His goals for the SGA and the student body as a whole were to promote exactly opposite of the other candidates.

"I promise to promote the policy of chaos ... in a mild way. Just kidding. I am not cynical about running for president."

When asked about the current state of inefficiency of the SGA, Moore told viewers that he was thirsty, and proceeded to drink an

Cornielius Nuggent

Cornielius Nuggent, student and third time presidential candidate announced his return to the SGA hopeful of winning, however, like Moore, neglected to answer any of the questions asked and poked fun of himself and others.

"I have run for president the past two years," he said, " and this year I am going to do stuff to get kids involved in stuff ... at UMass."

Nuggent did however, set forth a 'plan' to improve the PVTA busing system on campus. "PVTA is the biggest waste of money on this campus," he said. "We need to revamp them to run on the power of soul, depending on how much badonka-donk there is. It will be Soul Transportation."

In regards to the recent recommendations of the Diversity Commission released last week, Nuggent said said that he can't wait to leave UMass.

Judge makes ruling in Schiavo hearing

TAMPA, Fla. — Warning that Terri Schiavo was "fading quickly" and might die at any moment, her parents begged a federal appeals court Tuesday to order the severely brain-damaged woman's feeding tube reinserted.

David Gibbs III, attorney for parents Bob and Mary Schindler, told the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta that the 41-year-old woman might die before they could get a chance to fully argue their case that her rights are being violated. The appeal came after a federal judge in Tampa rejected the parents' emergency request.

"Where, as here, death is imminent, it is hard to imagine more critical and exigent circumstances," Gibbs said in the appeal filed electronically with the court. "Terri is fading quickly and her parents reasonably fear that her death is imminent."

There was no immediate indication of when the appeals court might rule.

Late in the afternoon, the Schindlers arrived at the hospice and Terri's mother again pleaded with state lawmakers to save her daughter's life.

"Please, senators, for the love of God, I'm begging you, don't let my daughter die of thirst," Mary Schindler said.

With that, she broke down, and was escorted away.

Students mourn in shooting aftermath

By Joshua Freed

REDBY, Minn. — The suspect in the worst U.S. school shooting since Columbine smiled and waved as he gunned down five students, a teacher and a guard, asking one of his victims whether he believed in God, witnesses said. The teen's grandfather and his grandfather's wife also were found dead, and the boy killed himself.

Some of the victims were shot at close range, medical officials said.

Reggie Graves, a student at Red Lake High School, said he was watching a movie about Shakespeare in class Monday when he heard the gunman blast his way past the metal detector at the school's entrance, where an unarmed guard was killed.

Then, in a nearby classroom, he heard the gunman say something to his friend Ryan. "He asked Ryan if he believed in God," Graves said. "And then he shot him."

The death toll at the Red Lake Indian Reservation in far northern Minnesota made it the nation's worst school shooting since the rampage at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo., in April 1999 that ended with the deaths of 12 students, a teacher and the two teen gunmen.

The victims included the gunman's grandfather; the grandfather's wife; a school security guard; a teacher; and five other students. At least 14 others were wounded, and two of them remained in critical condition Tuesday at MeritCare in Fargo, N.D., officials said.

At least three of the victims were shot in the head at close range, said officials at North Country Regional Hospital in nearby Bemidji. One of those victims died and the other two were transferred to the Fargo hospital. Three victims remained at North Country Regional in noncritical condition.

Man pleads guilty in Letterman case

CHOTEAU, Mont. — A man pleaded not guilty Tuesday to plotting to kidnap David Letterman's 16-month-old son and nanny and hold them for $5 million ransom.

Kelly Frank, 43, faces felony charges of solicitation and theft and a misdemeanor charge of obstruction. The judge ordered him to remain jailed on $650,000 bail pending his next court appearance on April 5.

Frank, a painter who had been hired do to work on Letterman's ranch in north-central Montana, was arrested last week after an acquaintance told investigators he had planned to kidnap the talk show host's son, Harry Joseph, and the child's nanny.

The acquaintance said Frank talked about holding the two for 48 hours in the belief that he could extort $5 million from Letterman. According to court records, Frank said he had a key to Letterman's house and even knew where the child slept.

Frank's attorney, Jim Hunt, said his client "has agreed there were discussions about it, but with no purpose of carrying it out." He called it a "lighthearted conversation."

Frank's fiancee, Laurie Johnson, has said that Frank was falsely accused by a childhood friend he had a falling out with.

She said the estranged friend, who also worked at Letterman's ranch, has a "personal vendetta" against Frank because of a fight they had at work, and has been trying to incriminate him ever since.

The boy, Letterman's first child, was named after the comedian's late father, Harry Joseph Letterman. The mother is Letterman's girlfriend, Regina Lasko.

Journalism student promotes new webmagazine for women

this is important because, "while there is a significant mix of students on the UMass campus, many of us come from the northeast, and maybe similar economic or cultural backgrounds, obviously with exceptions. I thought that the further my magazine could reach, the more varying the stories would be." Zolotorofe hopes that her webmag will allow students to find out what they have in common with their peers from different regions.

Zolotorofe hopes that her magazine will provide an outlet for writing and expression that she often wishes she had. In fact, "I plan on contributing personal stories to the website as well. " says Zolotorofe.

Zolotorofe says she has enjoyed writing since she was a child, which she says is surprising since she comes from a family of attorneys. "I have assumed all my life that I would follow in their footsteps one day. I came to college as a political major, but quickly realized that history and politics are just not my thing. In an attempt to choose a major that really suited my needs, I thought about what I really loved to do and what my dream job would be- and what would be more glamorous and exciting future than owning a magazine like Vogue or Cosmo? I have been writing all my life, from poetry, to personal essays, to hard-news type pieces. So, I decided to become a journalism major."

It really shouldn't have been a surprise to Zolotorofe that her talents lay outside of political science, since, even as a child, "I would fill notebook upon notebook with stories, poems and essays. It has always been a sort of comfort zone for me. Whether it be a secret crush, a bad day, or a life-altering experience, there is no better confidant than a piece of paper."

Zolotorofe's favorite type of writing is for the feature/personal essay genre, which is the kind of writing she hopes to garner for her magazine. She says, "It's a way to get out a personal message, while not being tied down by the constraints of typical journalism. With a web-based magazine, it's an amazing feeling knowing that your essay has the potential to affect readers all over the world."

Although Zolotorofe's target audience is the female population, she encourages any men interested to send in their own submissions to the magazine. The webmag is open to anyone who wants to read it; Zolotorofe does not anticipate that she will ever require a subscription to read her magazine. In fact, the magazine depends upon students submitting their stories and articles.

Zolotorofe says that the magazine is so far running solely on student submissions, though she hopes that, in the future, she will have a staff to help her with the business aspects of running a website, someone to help her with web design and a staff to edit and write. "Hopefully," says Zolotorofe, "the webmag will gain a lot of public attention and become a big hit. I obviously hope that this magazine is a great success, but my primary goal is to gain experience that can help me in the future, and to provide a service for college students around the country."

If students are interested in submitting an article or a piece of writing to "Your's Truly," Zolotorofe says she is accepting work at her email: JessicaTGZ@aol.com.

Zolotorofe hopes that her magazine will be accessible at www.yourstruly.com in a month or two, but says that the speed of the magazine's availability depends upon how fast she is given submissions.

Reaction to report is mixed

Bustamante said the only recommendations Lombardi followed were any involving academics.

"The Commission's recommendations should be followed," Bustamante said.

In the e-mail, Lombardi explained why some of the Commission's recommendations were not followed.

"Some of the recommendations of the Commission may not be practical to implement as the Commission recognized, but at the same time the campus must address the issues that prompted the recommendations even if on occasion we are not able to fully implement every recommendation as suggested by the Commission," Lombardi said.

"For this reason, we have published a set of proposals, understanding that we will need to refine and revise them before moving to implementation," he added in the e-mail.

The CSD would be headed by a newly appointed vice chancellor, the Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life. This position would answer too Michael Gargano, the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Some of the groups that will fall under the Center, especially ALANA and the SGA, have voiced extreme displeasure over Gargano in the aftermath of the "KKK-9," the incident that brought light to the University's diversity problems.

Bustamante said he thought Gargano wanted total control, and that the administration wanted minimal feedback of the report.

"I like the idea of student self-initiated activity," Bustamante said, adding that this plan would take away from that.

Some people think that the moving all the groups together is a little too drastic.

"This is the biggest reorganization in UMass in 30 years," said Jeff Napolitano, the secretary of public policy and relation in the SGA. "This is a reversal of a good-faith agreement with the administration."

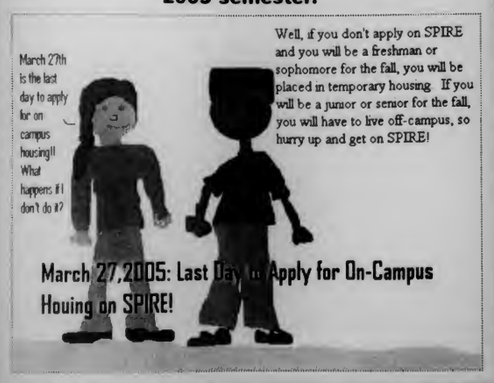
To pay for the changes, a chancellor's tax will be implemented in existing school funds. The tax will be $800,000, and students will not have to pay for it.

"[Lombardi] is taxing the existing budget to fund that," said Ed Blaguszewski, the Director of News and Information at UMass. "There's no additional charge for students."

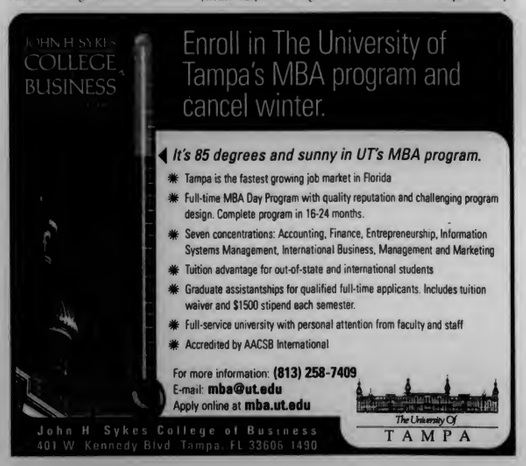
Bustamante said that he has drafted another proposal that he feels would help out the school more than Lombardi's report, and that alternative proposal will be made public soon.

For student who oppose the report, there will be a panel discussion in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union on Thursday at 12:30 p.m. Bustamante, among others, will be on the panel. Students can also attend the Faculty Senate meeting following the panel at 3:30. The Chancellor is expected to present the panel with his report.

On March 31, a "March for Fair Treatment" is being planned, and will start at noon at the Student Union.



Bustamante also said that students who oppose the proposal should e-mail campusdiversity @umass.edu by April 1, when the public comment ends.



To view Lombardi's proposal as well as the Commission's initial recommendations, go to www.umass.edu/campusdiversity.

This is a reminder for all students who have not reserved their room, chosen a new room in their hall, or placed an application for housing on SPIRE. The deadline for on-time applications is March 27, 2005.

If you will be a Junior or a Senior for the Fall 2005 semester and you do not apply for housing by this date you are not guaranteed housing. You will need to look for off-campus accommodations for the Fall 2005 semester.

If you will be a Freshman or a Sophomore for the Fall 2005 semester and you do not apply for housing by this date, you will be placed in a temporary space for the Fall 2005 semester.

Family begs judge to reinsert feeding tube

nected on Friday. Doctors have said Terri Schiavo could survive one to two weeks without water and nutrients. Her uncle, Mike Tammaro, said she appearing to be growing weak Tuesday.

"Over the past, when I've been in to see Terri, she responds and turns when you talk to her. She's not doing that today," he said.

The Schindlers have been locked for years in a battle with Schiavo's husband, Michael Schiavo, over whether her feeding tube should be disconnected. State courts have sided with Michael Schiavo, who insists his wife told him she would never want to be kept alive artificially.

Even before the parents' appeal was filed, Michael Schiavo urged the 11th Circuit not to grant an emergency request to restore nutrition.

"That would be a horrific intrusion upon Mrs. Schiavo's personal liberty," said the filing by Michael Schiavo's attorney, George Felos. Felos also said he would go to the U.S. Supreme Court if the tube were ordered reconnected.

Louise Cleary, a spokeswoman at Woodside Hospice, said she could not discuss Terri Schiavo's condition for reasons of privacy.

Over the weekend, Republicans in Congress pushed through unprecedented emergency legislation aimed at prolonging Schiavo's life by allowing the case to be reviewed by federal courts.

However, early Tuesday, U.S. District Judge James Whittemore of Tampa rejected the parents' emergency request under that legislation to have the tube reconnected, saying they had not established that they would probably prevail at a trial on their claim that Terri Schiavo's religious and due process rights have been violated.

Bobby Schindler, her brother, said his family was crushed.

"To have to see my parents go through this is absolutely barbaric," he said on ABC's "Good Morning America." "I'd love for these judges to sit in a room and see this happening as well."

Right to life supporters gather outside a courthouse in Tampa, Fla. protesting the judge's decision to remove Schiavo's feeding tube.

By mid-afternoon, about 75 protesters gathered outside the hospice, virtually all them upset with Whittemore's decision. They carried signs and shouted through bullhorns, and a Catholic Mass was celebrated. One woman was arrested for trespassing after trying to bring Schiavo a cup of water.

Shooter kills nine on deadly rampage at a morning news conference.

"There's not a soul that will go untouched by the tragic loss that we've experienced here," Floyd Jourdain Jr., chairman of the Red Lake Chippewa Tribe, told WCCO-TV of Minneapolis on Tuesday.

Police said the gunman killed himself after exchanging fire with officers. Red Lake Fire Director Ronan Stately said the gunman had two handguns and a shotgun.

"We ask Minnesotans to help comfort the families and friends of the victims who are suffering unimaginable pain by extending prayers and expressions of support," Gov. Tim Pawlenty said.

The shooter was Jeff Weise, a 17-year-old student who had been placed in the school's Homebound program for some violation of policy, said school board member Kathryn Beaulieu. Students in that program stay at home and are tutored by a traveling teacher. Beaulieu said she didn't know what Weise's violation was, and wouldn't be allowed to reveal it if she did.

There was no immediate indication of Weise's motive. Several students said he held anti-social beliefs, and he may have posted messages on a neo-Nazi Web site expressing admiration for Adolf Hitler.

A writer who identified himself as Jeff Weise of the Red Lake Reservation posted the messages under the nickname "Todesengel" — German for "angel of death." An April 2004 posting by him referred to being accused of "a threat on the school I attend," though the writer later said he was cleared.

Relatives told the St. Paul Pioneer Press that Weise was a loner who usually wore black and was teased by other kids. Relatives told the newspaper his father committed suicide four years ago, and that his mother was living in a Minneapolis nursing home because she suffered brain injuries in a car accident.

The governor said it appeared the school had "very rigorous security."

"It looks like you had a very disturbed individual who was able to overcome a lot of precautions to do a lot of damage," Pawlenty said.

Beaulieu said school was canceled Tuesday, but plans hadn't been made for the rest of the week.

During the rampage, teachers herded students from one room to another, trying to move away from the sound of the shooting, said Graves, 14. He said some students crouched under desks.

Some pleaded with the gunman to stop. "You could hear a girl saying, 'No, left, quit, quit, I leave me alone. What are you doing?'" Sondra Hopstrom told The Pioneer of Bemidji.

Roadside bomb kills civilians in Iraq

By Edward Harris
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Militants in the northern city of Mosul targeted a U.S. patrol with a roadside bomb Tuesday that killed four civilians, and Baghdad shopkeepers and residents traded gunfire with masked insurgents, killing three of them along a main thoroughfare.

In the south, officials found the corpses of six Iraqi soldiers, their hands bound and their bodies riddled with bullets.

The U.S. patrol was hit by a homemade bomb in a northwestern neighborhood of Mosul, damaging a Humvee as it crossed a bridge, hospital officials said, citing witnesses.

Four civilians in a car near the blast were killed, the officials said.

It was unclear whether any American troops were hurt, and U.S. military officials were not immediately available for comment.

Gunbattles erupted out in the streets of the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Doura, where militants wearing black hoods and riding in three cars opened fire on people shopping on a main street. Shopkeepers and residents returned fire, killing three assailants. A man, woman and child were injured and taken to a hospital.

Dr. Iyad Yass of al-Yarmouk hospital said four victims were admitted to the hospital with gunshot wounds.

"Two of them are risky. One of them was admitted to the operative theatre," he said.

Earlier, gunmen in the same quarter killed a policeman as he drove to work, said police Lt. Col. Hafidh Al-Ghrayri.

Iraq's next likely prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, indicated to a U.S. congressional delegation that he was in no hurry to have U.S.-led coalition troops leave.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said al-Jaafari was not as "upbeat as our people, who seem to be very excited about the quality of the Iraqi police force."

"My sense was, he was certainly in no rush to hand over security to his new police force," Boxer, a vocal opponent of the war, said during a visit to Baghdad.

The U.S. military reported the death of a Marine in a restive western province. The Marine, assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, was killed in action Monday in Anbar province, which contains the cities of Fallujah and Ramadi, the U.S. military said.

As of Monday, at least 1,522 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

The corpses of the six Iraqi soldiers were brought to the morgue in Kut, a city about 100 miles southeast of Baghdad, said Hadi Al-Habi of Al-Zahraa Hospital. The soldiers' hands were tied and their heads and torsos were riddled with bullets.

Iraq Defense Ministry officials said they had no information on the incident.

Six Iraqi soldiers were kidnapped in Anbar province, west of Baghdad, an area known as a rebel stronghold. Ramadi police major Mohamed Al-Dulaimi said Tuesday. Witnesses said about a dozen masked men grabbed the soldiers, who were dressed in civilian clothes, as they headed to a bus station.

In Mosul, a convoy of security officials was ambushed late Monday, sparking a gunbattle that killed 17 militants, said Col. Wathiq Ali, deputy police commander. No security forces were hurt, and 14 militants were detained, Ali said.

Among those in the convoy was top police chief Brig. Gen. Abu Al-Waled, he said.

Mosul residents said five mortar shells landed in a Kurdish enclave of the ethnically mixed city 225 miles northwest of Baghdad, injuring one person.

SGA presidential debate heats up in anticipation of elections

James Washburn

Unlike Bliss, Washburn said that he was not aiming for "small tangible results, but aiming for big goals."

He also criticized the delegation and trickle down effect of power in SGA. "We need to get students caring about UMass, if it's the same people getting elected, then it will be the same people carrying over the problem."

Mike Todd will be running as Trustee with James Washburn.

Pavel Payano

People meetings, he supports them and hopes that they raise student awareness.

Payano also said that although he voted no confidence in Gargano last November that there is a certain level of respect that needs to be maintained in the SGA's communication with the administration.

"The one key word is respect," he said. "I respect him as a vice chancellor and he needs to respect me as a Senator."

In closing, Payano said that he needs student support so that collectively, they can become institutionalized and lobby against the legislators.

Valerie Louis will be running as Trustee with Pavel Payano.

Sean Bliss

cling and told viewers last night that Southwest will be getting new reverse vending machines, or automatic recycling machines, that will allow students to recycle and redeem the money on their U-Cards.

Bliss also said that he plans to work with Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano, if elected, however he said that it doesn't necessarily mean that the SGA has to "roll over to him."

Craig Goldschmidt will be running as Trustee with Sean Bliss.

Owen Moore

entire bottle of water during his allotted answer time limit.

Moore also said that his stance on working with Gargano is "crime pays," and that he stole his closing speech from presidentialspeeches.com, even though he referenced movie quotes and Vin Diesel a number of times.

Cornelius Nuggent

"I hate this place," he said. Nuggent also commented that the Back to the People meetings have "been a failure."

In his closing speech, Nuggent talked about "Phasers," not Tasers, making a joke about the university's ongoing decisions on whether or not to implement the controversial non-lethal weapons.

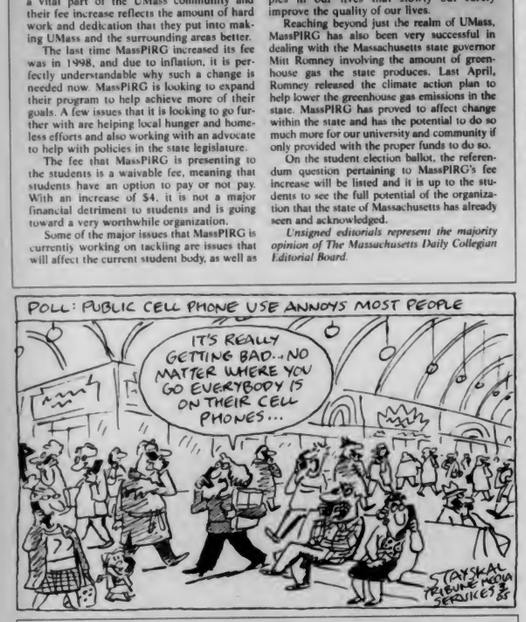
MassPIRG fee increase vital to ensure future

With the student elections just around the corner, many people will be focusing on the Student Government Association candidates that are appearing on the ballot. Additionally, the ballot will be posing many referendum questions to the student body. Among those organizations that will be polling the students is MassPIRG, who will be increasing their waivable fee that currently appears on tuition bills from $7 to $11.

MassPIRG is an organization that is dedicated to affecting social change and helping to eliminate environmental degradation, among other things. The organization itself is a vital part of the UMass community and their fee increase reflects the amount of hard work and dedication that they put into making UMass and the surrounding areas better.

The last time MassPIRG increased its fee was in 1998, and due to inflation, it is perfectly understandable why such a change is needed now. MassPIRG is looking to expand their program to help achieve more of their goals. A few issues that it is looking to go further with are helping local hunger and homeless efforts and also working with an advocate to help with policies in the state legislature.

The fee that MassPIRG is presenting to the students is a waivable fee, meaning that students have an option to pay or not pay. With an increase of $4, it is not a major financial detriment to students and is going toward a very worthwhile organization.



Some of the major issues that MassPIRG is currently working on tackling are issues that will affect the current student body, as well as the citizens of Massachusetts, years down the road. MassPIRG is looking to help with the conservation of many our resources that we are currently using, and are hoping to wake people up to the importance of their cause.

MassPIRG has already shown the citizens of Massachusetts how affective and constructive their organization can be. In the 80s, it helped implement the five-cent refund for recycled bottles in the state of Massachusetts, a system that is still widely taken advantage of by many college students. Its efforts, oftentimes, may go unnoticed at the present time, but in the long run; its work creates staples in our lives that slowly but surely improve the quality of our lives.

Reaching beyond just the realm of UMass, MassPIRG has also been very successful in dealing with the Massachusetts state governor Mitt Romney involving the amount of greenhouse gas the state produces. Last April, Romney released the climate action plan to help lower the greenhouse gas emissions in the state. MassPIRG has proved to affect change within the state and has the potential to do so much more for our university and community if only provided with the proper funds to do so.

On the student election ballot, the referendum question pertaining to MassPIRG's fee increase will be listed and it is up to the students to see the full potential of the organization that the state of Massachusetts has already seen and acknowledged.

Sex stereotypes go both ways

Amelia Sabadini

I recently watched the movie "Single White Female" with my sister. I did not choose to watch this movie for the sake of entertainment. The viewing was actually research for a paper I did regarding the wave of psycho-femme fatal movies that swept over the silver screen in the late '80s and early '90s. I had focused on these movies as the tools of an anti-feminist movement. To me they all seemed like larger than life stories that were pushing the message that women and girls don't get appropriately mad, they get inordinately furious and in doing so become so dangerous that they have to be killed.

In part, their collective purpose seemed to be to disenfranchise women from any rights to anger (understandable or not) and to place a light of suspicion on women with power. The demand for these movies was high. People wanted to see female villains, or, more precisely, they wanted to see a female murdered just as much as anyone who would sit down and watch "Last House on the Left." But they wanted that minty fresh, self-righteous, all-absolving swig of justifiable homicide to wash it down with. It was the premise that these were wicked women who got what was coming to them that made these movies popular.

Given the abundance of work that these films put into maintaining stereotypes about women and other dysfunctional expectations, such as only bad people get killed, I was surprised to find that one particular status quo assumption was up-ended right in the middle of "Single White Female." I was even more surprised to find myself unwilling to part with this assumption.

Midway through "SWF" the antagonist, played by Jennifer Jason Leigh, sneaks into bed with the protagonist's boyfriend. She has cut and dyed her hair to look like the girlfriend and he's half asleep so it isn't until it's too late that he realizes he's having sex with the wrong person. My sister says quite flatly, "She raped him." And I responded with, "Like hell" — which was foolish and utterly callous. I know a sleeping person cannot give consent. I knew it then but I was focused on the fact that he had actually ejaculated (or such was implied in the movie).

As it happens, the extreme nature of stereotypes makes them the sort of goals that can only be approached and never truly attained.

I couldn't not see this as proof of willful and therefore consenting participation on his part. His body had gone along with it even though the rest of him had not wanted it. A working definition of sexual assault could be the loss of control of one's body. He had definitely been subjected to that. So why did I not see this at first? Was I harboring notions that men are inherently invulnerable or perpetually craving sex? These are the expectations set down by the gender stereotypes that I so loathe. How the hell had they infected me?

In any given day, how much do you suppose the radio, T.V., newspapers, magazine racks, billboards, movie theater and internet get to say or maybe more insidiously impart to you? What do you suppose the most common message might be? I'd guess it wouldn't be anything along the lines of you're a complete, integrated person of worth who's fine just the way you are. You wouldn't need to buy too many things if that was the case. No, if the name of the game is increase the urgency of demand by any means possible, and it is with capitalism, then you've got to keep playing on and creating insecurities.

This can be done by repeatedly glorifying states of being that are pretty much unattainable for most people. As it happens, the extreme nature of stereotypes makes them the sort of goals that can only be approached and never truly attained. Having a totally gender stereotyped persona in full would require a sort of cognitive emotional amputation that no one is capable of. That's not to say that people don't hack themselves to bits trying but the man bleeding buckets to be G.I. Joe and the woman on the surgeon's table trying to be Barbie both have about the same chances for self actualization — next to nothing.

I'm certainly not jumping the fence to side with the likes of Hoff-Sommers, but I do have to admit I've put a lot of energy into pushing back against the stereotyped images of women so much so that it has been relatively easy to forget that the stereotyped images of men are false and harmful as well.

Good to the last drop

Colin Jones

It's the mantra of bathroom stall philosophers and rebellious spray paint artists everywhere. Two words in an ironically dead language, giving advice that is alternately inspiring and annoying. "Carpe diem." Seize the day. It's on the same level as a number of others. "No regrets," for example, my favorite way back in the day. Stupid tough-talking youthful naïveté. But if sorrow is deep regret over the loss of someone loved, then it can be hard for some of us to live that way.

If you've never experienced it, you'd have no idea what I'm talking about. It would be like trying to describe the color blue to a blind man. But if you have, then you know all too well. A record of where you were, what you were doing, the weather, the color of the sky — are all singed into your memory. Maybe you woke up with a feeling that something was going to change. Maybe it took you by surprise. Or it happened without your knowledge and you were left to find out after the fact. They're all possible.

Numbness and apathy are first cousins, once removed. Our ability to feel and the knowledge of our own mortality are a blessing and a curse that separate us from the rest of the animals.

The way your memory works when you think about them stands apart from everything else. I like the description given by Guy Pearce's character in "Memento." "You can just feel the details. The bits and pieces you never bothered to put into words. And you can feel these extreme moments, even if you don't want to. You put these together and you get the feel of a person. Enough to know how much you miss them." Or if there was just a close call, to remind you of how much you would.

It goes with saying that such things are tough to deal with, and rarely spoken of. And of course, there's always the fear that any words would fall upon deaf ears. It's like the rug gets yanked out from under your feet, and suddenly you're alone in every crowd, a stranger among all of your friends. And even after you reach the acceptance meter on the grief scale, there can still be aftershocks. Guilt over wanting to move on, yet not wanting to forget. Ambivalence, simultaneously wishing that it was someone else in your position, while at the same time knowing that you would never wish such a thing on anyone. And scars, survival's paler pain, unwillingly received and forever serving as a reminder of a period of time.

Numbness and apathy are first cousins, once removed. Our ability to feel and the knowledge of our own mortality are a blessing and a curse that separate us from the rest of the animals. And killing time is a crime for which we are all guilty. An hour. A day. Maybe longer. Maybe much longer. Pacifying ourselves with bitterness towards the likely unimportant and largely self-induced predicaments we find ourselves in day to day. Resigning ourselves to the notion that getting by is enough.

Just getting past something is the best we could have hoped to accomplish. And for some of us it is quite possible that just getting by is enough. But time is unrelenting and unforgiving in its passage, and eventually, just getting by should cease to a goal. Because I think that maybe if we're not careful, when we look back we'll get the sense that somehow we missed something. Some important detail. Or a huge opportunity. Maybe even a chance to save someone by being willing to step on their toes. And there will be an enduring subtle sadness, a feeling that you forced yourself to rush through moments when you should have been paying attention.

From Jesus to James Dean, we've seen that the first step towards living forever is dying. And those close to us will do the same through the memory of what they were able to teach us while they were here. But given the nature of this formula, it seems to me that if death is the first step towards living forever, then maybe the first step towards really living is knowing that you will die someday.

Terri Schiavo: a right to die?

Un-divine intervention: surrendering Schiavo

Thomas Naughton

As a person who is recovering from an eating disorder, the Terri Schiavo case strikes a chord deep within me. It is terribly ironic that the bulimia-induced heart attack and resulting brain damage could cause her ultimate death by starvation. There are truly no easy answers in this controversial case; I don't think anyone wants her to die.

Opponents of Michael Schiavo, Terri's husband (and the man who has fought for over a decade to allow his wife to die naturally according to her wishes), are attempting to slander, intimidate and question his character by focusing on his private life.

Michael Schiavo maintains that his wife, who is in a persistent vegetative state, would not have wanted to live in her present condition and 19 judges in some six different courts agree with him. Michael Schiavo may not be an honorable man; he has already moved on with his life, with his new girlfriend and their children. He has not dissolved his marriage with Terri and has devoted much time to having her feeding tube, the only medical means keeping her alive, removed.

None of this however makes him a criminal of any kind or a murderer. The fact still remains that he is the person who, by law, calls the shots concerning resuscitative efforts for Terri; that is part and parcel of marriage.

Conservative legislators, right-wing religious fanatics, talk-radio pundits and even the President think differently, however. Florida Governor Jeb Bush has been attempting to intervene since before the March 18 removal of Schiavo's feeding tube.

Conservative talk-radio vulture, Laura Ingraham, has called Michael Schiavo a "murderer." Religious fanatics are holding vigils outside of the hospice that cares for Terri. Additionally, four demonstrators were arrested for trespassing inside the hospice. President Bush, in the wake of the March 18 tube removal, has said that he will sign a bill to re-insert the tube as soon as possible.

Through appeals, it is probable that Michael Schiavo will be able to carry out his wife's wishes, regardless of what the Bushes, radio pundits or religious demonstrators think. Is her death a desirable outcome in anyone's eyes (even Michael's)? No. However, Michael Schiavo has a right to make decisions for his wife if she truly expressed her desire to deny resuscitation.

When we marry another individual, we give them this right. Perhaps we should all think long and hard about what we want should a similar situation befall us.

What I find particularly troubling in this case is the intervention of public officials into a private matter. The conservatives are always shouting about the dangers of "big government"; they are the first to go crazy about paying taxes or being accountable to the government in any way. Doesn't the government become "big" when it can reach deep into the private lives of its citizens? What right does Laura Ingraham, Jeb Bush or even George W. Bush have to defy the laws that they claim to espouse? Do we only uphold laws until we are faced with a tragic and unsavory situation? Doesn't such a consideration make our laws "living, breathing organs," something that the conservatives are against?

Even Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, a staunch conservative whom all the aforementioned parties admire and support, said only weeks ago that the law is "not an organ" and cannot be treated as something to be changed on a whim. Isn't "the sanctity of marriage" something that the conservatives are committed to protecting? Why would they ignore the rights a spouse has to make important medical decisions if they are "committed" to "protecting marriage"? This sounds like some major "flip-flopping" if you ask me.

What I would like to know is where the intervention, the outrage, the religious fervor and outcry is concerning the starving children in America that George W. Bush and his supporters swore they would never leave behind? So many children in our own country live below the poverty line and very few of them have garnered a fraction of the interest than that of the Schiavo case.

As long as we're defying laws to save starving victims of brain damage who have had enough life to get married and know what it is to love, we may as well spread that defiance around and save the youngsters who may never grow up, never find love, never see the world. Perhaps George W. Bush could spare some money from his 81.4 billion dollar war budget, but I'm fairly certain he would decline my request.

I wish that decisions like that of Michael Schiavo's never existed.

Regardless of what is "right" in the eyes of all the onlookers in this case, it is Michael Schiavo who holds the power to allow his wife to die or dissolve their marriage and allow a legal guardian to make the weighty decision.

If the legislation in this case that the Republicans are pressing forward passes, a dangerous new era will be fully ushered into American politics: one where the legislative majority acts as a dictatorship, intervening into the private lives of any citizen they see fit.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

More important things than the Schiavo debate

Andrew Freeman

As I follow the tempestuous case of Terri Schiavo, I'm drawn to a line from Casablanca: "I'm no good at being noble, but it doesn't take much to see that the problems of three people don't amount to a hill of beans in this crazy world." Today it is amazing how much insanity will occur over one person's body.

For those of you who were trapped under a rock, sloshed in Cancun or otherwise unable to see the news from America, the top story this weekend was the political and legal wrangling over Terri Schiavo.

Mrs. Schiavo collapsed at her Florida home in February of 1990, suffering severe brain damage from a heart attack, which left her in a persistent vegetative state. This condition is described by Florida Law as "a permanent and irreversible condition of unconsciousness" which entails "the absence of voluntary action or cognitive behavior of any kind" and "an inability to communicate or interact purposefully with the environment," according to flsenate.gov. She can only survive with a feeding tube, since she lacks the awareness to feed herself.

Michael Schiavo, Terri's husband and legal guardian, has been attempting to remove the feeding tube so that she may die for the last seven years, rather than continue in her present state. However, her family has opposed this, claiming she responds to stimuli and is capable of recovery. The situation is further complicated by malpractice lawsuits that would be awarded to Terri, whose husband would receive the money if she died. The amount of legal action over the past seven years is simply astounding.

When a Florida judge ruled she should be taken off the feeding tube, Congressional Republicans and the President took action. First the Republicans subpoenaed Ms. Schiavo and her husband to appear before court, and then they passed a bill over the weekend to move her case to federal court. Bush flew from his ranch in Texas to sign it, which was far more dramatic than flying the bill to him to sign.

This column is not about the hypocrisy of this case. It's not about the fact that in 1999 George W. Bush, as governor of Texas, signed a bill that recently allowed a Texas hospital, against the wishes of the parent, to stop treatment to a six-month-old child diagnosed as terminal. Nor is the fact that he and other Republicans who triumphantly proclaim the virtues of life wholeheartedly endorse the death penalty, to the point that Bush mocked an executed woman, Karla Faye Tucker, imitating her plea for life.

Instead, I'm writing about cynicism. ABC News obtained a Republican talking points memo on the Schiavo case, in which the authors suggested that party senators should get involved in the case because "the pro-life base will be excited" and that it is a "great political issue." Republican leaders immediately disavowed the memo, but its contents are shockingly honest.

There is no rational reason for members of one of the busiest arms of the government to get involved in one woman's life, except when it benefits them politically. With Lent ending and the involvement of many Christians in the case, from the Vatican to Mel Gibson, Terri Schiavo has become an instrument of outreach to religious people for the Republican Party.

There are many things that Congress ought to be doing instead, and that we as Americans should be more concerned about. We are still fighting in Iraq — a marine was killed Sunday, and over 1,500 American soldiers have died so far — yet our soldiers still lack proper armor for their vehicles.

North Korea's nuclear weaponry has not been dealt with, Osama bin Laden and Al-Qaeda pose a threat and if the two cooperate, millions of Americans could die, yet the Republicans work through the weekend on saving one brain-damaged woman. They are even neglecting domestic issues that a few weeks ago were paramount in their rhetoric, like Social Security privatization. It is sadly ironic that over 60 years ago during war the problems of three people weren't worth "a hill of beans," but today, when we face a dire threat, our leaders fret over one person.

The calm after the storm

Bob McGovern

Sometimes a hiatus from reality sheds an interesting light on events that you personally didn't witness.

For myself, spring break wasn't the typical weeklong frozen bender in Montreal, nor was it a horrendous marathon ride south to The Big Easy ... been there, done that. My spring break took me home to Vero Beach, Fla., a beach town on the east coast of the state, two hours away from the fake plasticity of Miami and Orlando, the Florida that most people know and see on T.V.

It was my first time back home since the middle of August, when I packed up my green Jeep and drove north to Amherst. Since then, my town was hit by two hurricanes and for the past five months, has been rebuilding and trying to get itself back to normal.

I sat in my room a lot that first month of school and watched as the red swirling monster known as Hurricane Jeanne slowly made its way across the Atlantic. Every weather Web site I could find had a large chunk of the east coast of Florida in the danger zone, with Vero Beach sitting right in the middle.

I would go online and talk to my friends who are strewn across the country, at different colleges and walks of life. We joked about how Zero Beach (the nickname the local youth have given the town) is too boring, too obsolete to even be recognized by this beast and would probably just get passed over.

Man, we couldn't have been more wrong.

On Sept. 26, Jeanne took her 120-mile per hour winds, and backhanded my town with a force that I had never heard of during my 12 years living there. Friends sent me pictures of the destruction, my parents called from my father's office (which they were using as a shelter), and I sat on my futon, over 1000 miles away and waited for good news from the other side.

My family came out safe, but my home and the homes of many others were rendered useless. Insurance companies scrambled to help, local roofing businesses gave a collective yet solemn ear-to-ear grin, and the community came together as communities do after a trying time.

As I drove into my town, there was a different feel to it; I could sense it before I really saw anything.

After awhile, things appeared to get back to normal from the other side of the receiver. My parents had to live in a condo, which their friends generously lent them, while the house I grew up in was pieced back together.

Then, about two weeks ago, my dad surprised me with tickets back home.

As I drove into my town, there was a different feel to it; I could sense it before I really saw anything. Then, as we drove through the downtown section, small businesses that I knew from childhood were boarded up, business's signs stood as skeletons, and each tall palm tree had a similar lean ... offshore, still shying away from the now-absent storm.

None of my friends were around for the first few days, so I went out on my own and explored the quandary that was now my town.

I borrowed my brother's car and drove along A1A, the main nerve of the ocean side of my town. Everything looked the same at first, until I realized that the beach was far closer than I had ever seen.

With my windows down and the cool breeze of a Florida spring rushing through the car I got closer to the heart of my town, and as I drew near the imminent reality of the present, the past started to kick in. Full condos had been condemned, four out of every five houses had no roof tiles and the small convenience store that used to let my friends and I buy beer in high school had not received insurance money to replace its windows and were boarded up with, "We're Open!" spray painted on the wood.

My good friend Josh, who I had surfed with all through high school, came up from Miami a few nights later when he heard I was in town. We bought some beer at the local 7-11 and looked for a place to drink, sit and talk.

We walked down the beach near his house and noticed that almost every backyard was now a sand dune. There was, however, one family that decided to put down sod, which formed a peculiar green square amidst the monotony of sand that now dominates what was a vegetated area only a few months ago.

After going through a few vacated houses, we got in his car and went to go see the huge mile-long boardwalk that cuts behind the hotel district of my town. As we strolled alongside the newly fixed boardwalk, I noticed palm trees freshly planted in the sand. They were obviously from somewhere else and looked like they were only there to sit and witness the calm after the storm.

Sounds familiar.

Progress in the Middle East

This is the first part of a two part series.

Todd Hanaburgh

"Mr. Hariri's death should give, in fact it must give, renewed impetus to achieving a free, independent and sovereign Lebanon. What that means is the immediate and complete implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1559. And what that also means is the complete and immediate withdrawal by Syria of all of its forces from Lebanon," said Assistant Secretary of State William Burns, on Feb. 16.

On the surface, U.S. policy toward recent developments in Lebanon seems to make sense. After all, Syria has occupied Lebanon and has manipulated their political system for over 30 years. Why shouldn't we demand a full and complete withdrawal? Syria is suspected of harboring insurgents who penetrate the loosely guarded Iraq border to attack U.S. troops.

The Bush Administration considers Syria's support of the Hezbollah Party to qualify as terror sponsorship and by translation, these and other factors make Syria a terrorist state.

On the surface, U.S. policy toward recent developments in Lebanon seems to make sense. After all, Syria has occupied Lebanon and has manipulated their political system for over 30 years.

However the Syrian occupation, admittedly undemocratic, is crucial to the stability of Lebanon. Lebanon's citizenry is made of several ethno-religious groups: Sunni Muslim, Shia Muslim, Druze and four disparate Christian sects. Combined with Lebanon's isolating terrain of mountainous regions and valleys, this ethno-religious demographic led to the very civil war that prompted the Syrian occupation to begin in 1976.

Since the occupation began, many Syrian citizens have migrated to Lebanon in a move that some observers call a 'colonization process,' and others say is due simply to the increased freedom and improved quality of life they enjoy while residing within Lebanese domestic policy and economy.

It is likely that the Bush Administration considers at least some of these to be part of the Syrian covert operations present in Lebanon. Bush has said that anything less than full withdrawal of troops and intelligence elements from Lebanon, as well as the disbanding of all local militias, i.e. Hezbollah, constitute unacceptable "half measures" by Syria.

Many leaders in Washington point to a 'Beirut Spring' or a 'Mid-East Thaw' as a signal that the people of the region are begging for democracy. While a large proportion of the Lebanese populace may desire to eject occupying forces and foreign troops from their nation, a significant amount of people (I daresay potentially even of equal numbers) seem to be willing to tolerate their neighbor's forces within the Lebanese borders in order to keep the peace.

But buried beneath the Bush Administration's propaganda campaign on these issues lay the actual roots of the U.S. interest in Lebanon: a 1996 document titled, "A Clean Break: A New Strategy for Securing the Realm." There is quite a bit of coverage on the document available online, where it has been discussed especially after the U.S. invasion of Iraq. A rather succinct summary follows:

"[A Clean Break] featured a series of recommendations designed to end the process of Israel trading 'land for peace' by transforming the 'balance of power' in the Middle East in favor of an axis consisting of Israel, Turkey and Jordan. To do so, it called for ousting Saddam Hussein and installing a Hashemite leader in Baghdad. From that point, the strategy would be largely focused on Syria and, at the least, to reducing its influence in Lebanon."

A statement put before the U.S. Senate late last year elaborates on the connection between A Clean Break and the current administration:

"There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:1. Peoples the world around have a history of culture and religion.

In the Mideast, the religion is predominantly Muslim and the culture tribal. The Muslim religion is strong, i.e., those that don't conform are considered infidels; those of a tribal culture look for tribal leadership, not democracy. We liberated Kuwait, but it immediately rejected democracy.

2. In 1996, a task force was formed in Jerusalem including Richard Perle, Douglas Feith and David Wurmser. They submitted a plan for Israel to incoming Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Clean Break ..."

"...The plan was rejected by Netanyahu, so Perle started working for a similar approach to the Mideast for the United States. Taking on the support of Dick Cheney, Paul Wolfowitz, Stephen Cambone, Scooter Libby, Donald Rumsfeld, et al., he enlisted the support of the Project for the New American Century.

"The plan hit paydirt with the election of George W. Bush. Perle took on the Defense Policy Board. Rumsfeld, Wolfowitz and Feith became one, two and three at the Defense Department, and Cheney as vice president took Scooter Libby and David Wurmser as his deputies."

In short, the strategies currently employed in the Middle East are not reactions to actual developments, 9/11 or a terrorist threat. The current presidential administration (et al.) have hijacked U.S. foreign policy and used real situations and developments as an excuse to implement their plans. That is something that should seriously concern us all.

In every other college dorm room there is a poster of Bob Marley. Marley is a legend that put Jamaica on the music map and inspired millions to play music and smoke weed. Though Marley may be the most familiar name from the Jamaica music scene, there were other reggae musicians making their name in the late 60s and 70s. One of those was James Chambers, also known as Jimmy Cliff. Cliff, born in 1948, moved to Kingston when he was fourteen to try his luck in the music capital of Jamaica.

Though he was young, he was not shy about showcasing his talent. Whether he was humming on the streets of Kingston, or singing a tune in a local restaurant, the young Cliff was eager for people to hear his extraordinary voice. After several months, his wandering and singing finally paid off. It was a hot day, and Cliff founded the coolest place to ease his body from the hot Jamaican sun. As he walked into the ice cream parlor singing away, the owner overheard the young boy's stunning voice. Being an aspiring musician/producer himself, the owner asked Cliff to record the a capella tune he was singing. A few years later, Cliff started working with another young artist, by the name of Bob Marley.

It was Cliff who helped Marley record his first record, "Judge Blot." In 1968, after signing with Island Records, Cliff released his debut album, Hard Road to Travel. It won the International Song Festival with a song called, "Waterfall." Cliff became an instant sensation in Brazil. Seizing upon his newfound success, Cliff moved to Brazil, and in merely a year, his music was on regular rotation in both England and the United States.

Jimmy Cliff and the reggae music scene hit America with success in 1973 with the release of the movie The Harder They Come. Cliff acted in the film, and a majority of the songs on the soundtrack are his own. Cliff's smooth, sensual voice spoke to music listeners from around the world. The songs, "The Harder They Come," "Many Rivers to Cross" and "You Can Get It If You Really Want It" are some of the greatest reggae songs of all time. The sound comes alive with Cliff's sweet voice that gives the rawness of the instruments a soothing touch. His voice is addictive and many artists since his arrival on the music scene have tried to emulate his beautiful style.

On April 1, Cliff will turn 57, but that has not stopped him from continuing what he does best. In 2004, he released an album that featured Wyclef Jean and Sting. He had a revival in the States twelve years ago when he covered "I Can See Clearly Now" for the "Cool Runnings" Soundtrack, and is now on tour across America. For those who love Marley and want to see an artist on his caliber, Jimmy Cliff will be playing at Pearl Street tonight.

Viewers strongly sensing good vibes for NBC's 'Medium'

Mid-season replacement puts a ghostly spin on crime dramas

By David Hiltbrand
Knight Ridder Newspapers

No one expected "Medium," a quirky NBC midseason replacement series, to be an out-of-the-box hit.

No one, that is, but Allison DuBois, the self-professed clairvoyant portrayed by Patricia Arquette in the show.

"I went on the record before the show ever aired," says DuBois, 33. "I said it would be bigger than people expected it to be. The word I used was 'phenomenon.'"

All right, Ms. Smarty-Pants. But remember: There's a thin line between being a psychic and being a showoff.

Since debuting in January, "Medium" has averaged more than 15 million viewers, doubling NBC's audience in the 10 p.m. EST Monday time slot from earlier in the season. That performance has earned the show an early renewal for next season.

Of course, "Medium" had a lot more going for it than a premonition. Among its appealing qualities are vivid relationships and sharp dialogue, courtesy of executive producer Glenn Gordon Caron, who created "Moonlighting." Add to those a deft cast, including Arquette as the harried and haunted mother of three, Jake Weber as her supportive husband, and talented child actresses Sofia Vassilieva and Maria Lark as their elder offspring who have inherited mom's abilities.

The clincher is the show's premise: a woman who, through her visions, can help solve baffling crimes.

DuBois says she has consulted on more than 40 criminal cases, although two of the law-enforcement agencies cited prominently in her NBC bio have denied using her services.

While she charges for personal readings, DuBois, as a matter of principle, donates her time to murder and missing-persons cases.

She describes her work on the phone from Phoenix as she sorts through appeals from law-enforcement agencies, search-and-rescue departments and private investigators across the country.

"Today is 'forensics Friday,'" she says. "I have 175 murder cases. I pull them up by e-mail and look at the victim's name and the circumstances. Then I'll mail back information. I may get the perpetrator's first name, or their relationship to the victim. It may be how they came in contact."

"Medium" originated, in a roundabout way, from Paramount Television's desire to continue its singularly profitable relationship with Kelsey Grammer after his long runs on "Cheers" and its spinoff "Frasier."

The program that interested Grammer was a reality show called "Oracles," in which five onstage seers would give readings to audience members.

The studio flew in 300 "paranormals," including DuBois, from across the country to audition for the pilot before abandoning "Oracles." But the president of Paramount Television, Gary Hart, was so impressed with the Arizona woman that he contacted Caron to pitch DuBois' life as the basis of a drama series.

The producer describes his reaction as "cynical," until he met with the mother of three and author of the memoir "Don't Kiss Them Good-Bye" (Fireside).

"I was amazed by her tale," Caron

Foosball is alive and kicking

By J.J. Jensen
The Seattle Times

Perhaps you're tops at your tavern. Maybe you're lord of the dorm or boss of the break room.

If that's the case, are you, apologies to Hank Williams Jr., ready for some foosball?

Some serious table-soccer action usually isn't too hard to find.

Contestants there are pretty passionate about their foos, judging by the play on a recent Friday night at Dante's Steak & Grog's in Seattle's University District.

With more than $100 in prize money on the line, players and patrons ringed the bar's three foosball tables like a crowd gathering 'round a schoolyard fight.

Action was fast and furious. Players, making lightning-quick passes and shots, gripped and slid the rods like line cooks with frying pans during a Saturday-morning rush. Comments of "ooh," "ahh" and "nice shot" came from onlookers.

"These guys are nuts," said Kyle Fletcher, 23, a newcomer to the Seattle foosball scene who once ran the table at his Willamette University fraternity. But he and his roommate have been getting a smackdown at Dante's.

"I thought we'd be OK because we play quite a bit, but these guys are seasoned."

While the casual player can be competitive in local leagues and small tournaments, players are assigned handicaps based on skill levels, they can expect to get their comeuppance at tournaments sanctioned by foosball's governing bodies, the North American Table Soccer Association and the Valley International Foosball Association.

"The recreational player will get destroyed (at larger tournaments)," said Rich Fosner, 42, of Bothell, Wash., a nationally ranked player who frequents Dante's. "Their egos shrink really quick."

If you want to hang with the big-time foos players you've got to practice and take your licks, said Steph Ohashi, 34, a regional champion from Woodinville, Wash., who along with Lynnwood Wash.'s Chad Kinner, 36, another regional champ, own about 40 tables at bars in Washington state and organize several leagues.

Ohashi said her foosball addiction delayed her graduation from Western Washington University by two years. On most nights, rather than hitting the books, she was playing foos.

"When I moved to Seattle, thinking I was all that, I started playing in weekly tournaments," she said. "It was a reality check."

While some may remember tables that featured ramped corners and one-man goalie rods, games today are usually played on Tornado tables, the industry standard for about 20 years, which feature a completely flat surface and three-man goalie rod.

Typically, local league nights feature three- or four-person teams that play a combination of games: doubles, singles, switching positions after goals, playing a match where the ball isn't allowed to stop moving. Sometimes there's a "beer round," where the losers of a three-on-three or four-on-four game have to buy the next pitcher of suds.

Games go to five. The best three of five games wins the match.

The numbers of players and tournaments today are a shadow of what the game used to draw during its heyday in the 1970s, say old-school players. Back then, the Pacific Northwest was a foosball hotbed.

According to Kathy Brainard, 52, a winner of numerous national tournaments and co-author of the 1980 book "The Complete Book of Foosball," one of the first big-money table soccer tournaments ($1,500) was organized by businessman Lee Peppard at his tavern in Missoula, Mont.

The next year, at a $5,000 tournament, Peppard introduced his own table, named "Tournament Soccer," which served as the industry standard through the decade.

Peppard moved his headquarters to Seattle and started the first pro foosball tour, the Tournament Soccer Quarter Million Dollar Tour. During the next few years, the tour was awarding upward of $1 million in prize money, and featured tournaments with Porsches and Corvettes as top prizes.

"Foosball was something new and interesting and everybody wanted to play," said Seattle's Rocky Willson, 49, a regional champ and longtime table vendor.

During the late '70s at Goldie's, on North 45th Street in Wallingford, Wash., he recalled, there were about 13 foosball tables, most occupied nightly. But by the early 1980s, Willson said, the tour had been overpromoted and bar patrons were more interested in a new fad: video games such as Space Invaders, Pacman, Centipede and Galaga. Foosball went on life support.

Interest finally peaked again, Brainard said, in the mid 1990s. Baby boomers wanted foos tables for their rec rooms, dot-commers liked having it in their break rooms and kids saw cast members on "Friends" playing it in their living room.

Some still find it kind of silly.

On a recent night at Goldie's, where there's now just one table, David Torvik, 25, played against his roommate. "God gave me a gift. I foos well," he gloated.

"I just like to go to bars and play for fun and meet people," he said. "I wouldn't want to play in a league where it's supercompetitive."

Meanwhile, some extremists would like to see table soccer, which was believed to be first patented in England in the 1890s and introduced to Americans during World War II, be in the Olympics. Table tennis, after all, made the cut.

Other foos fanatics are just happy it's still on society's radar.

"It's become a part of the fabric of the American lifestyle," Willson said.

"Almost everyone's played some foos in their life. It's not a fad and it's not a flash in the pan. People are playing it because they enjoy it."

Economic hitman visits South Hadley

Author shares experiences with CIA operations in new book

By Ethan Burke
Collegian Staff

Economic hit men are highly paid professionals who cheat countries around the globe out of trillions of dollars. They funnel money from the World Bank, the U.S. Agency for International Development and other foreign 'aid' organizations into the coffers of huge corporations and the pockets of a few wealthy families who control the planet's natural resources. Their tools include fraudulent financial reports, rigged elections, payoffs, extortion, sex and murder. They play a game as old as empire, but one that has taken on new and terrifying dimensions during this time of globalization.

I should know; I was an EHM. – John Perkins, in his book "Confessions of an Economic Hit Man."

After the events of Sept. 11 and the invasion of Iraq, John Perkins worried about the world his daughter and future generations would inherit. These events and the state of despair in the world persuaded him to ignore threats and bribes that stopped him four times and write about his experience as an EHM.

Through a series of coincidences, Perkins was recruited by the National Security Agency and began working as an economist for the Boston engineering firm, Chas. T. Main, Inc. In reality, he was an EHM, and MAIN was much more than an engineering firm.

"We're a small exclusive club. We're paid — well paid — to cheat countries around the globe out of billions of dollars. A large part of your job is to encourage world leaders to become part of a vast network that promotes U.S. commercial interests. In the end, those leaders become ensnared in a web of debt that ensures their loyalty," Perkins writes recalling his job description.

The history of EHM's began in Iran in 1953 when CIA agent Kermit Roosevelt orchestrated the ousting of democratically elected leader of Iran, Mohammed Mossadegh. Using bribes and threats, inciting riots and creating chaos, Roosevelt's efforts resulted in the replacement of Mossadegh with the Shah of Iran, all without using the military.

This remarkable achievement posed one problem for the empire builders. If caught, Kermit Roosevelt could be connected back to the CIA and the U.S. government. EHM's became the solution. Perkins writes, "EHM's would never be paid by the government; instead they would draw their salaries from the private sector. As a result, their dirty work, if exposed could be chalked up to corporate greed rather than government policy." Kermit Roosevelt's tactics became standard procedure for EHM's.

A group of bankers from the World Bank, the IMF, and private banks; leaders of corporations; and government officials — an elite group whom Perkins calls the "corporatocracy" — shaped the post-WWII economic system to their benefit with devastating consequences for developing countries. Perkins refers to people like Robert McNamara as key players within the system who move between government, the private sector and banking institutions.

As an EHM, Perkins travels in Asia, Latin America and the Middle East. He writes of working for the Shah of Iran, defrauding Indonesia and even pimping for a Saudi Prince with a weakness for blondes. He worked with President Omar Torrijos of Panama and President Jaime Roldos of Ecuador, two men he refers to as "kindred spirits." Perkins writes, "They were assassinated because they opposed that fraternity of corporate, government and banking heads whose goal is global empire." Perkins' assignments as an EHM and the encounters with local people makes "Confessions of an Economic Hit Man" read like a thriller.

Over winter break, at the Odyssey Bookshop in South Hadley, John Perkins expanded upon the themes of the book and gave a speech calling on Americans to defend the principles upon which this country was founded, and to create a more just world.

Afterward I interviewed Perkins. He explained that many economists in the rank and file at the World Bank and IMF believe in the benevolence of these institutions whereas he finds it difficult to believe that higher-ups like Robert McNamara didn't understand the system.

Mr. Perkins also commented on Latin American politics in the last few years saying, "In recent elections in six countries, the people voted for candidates who opposed the corporatocracy, who opposed globalization: Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, Venezuela and Ecuador."

Throughout "Confessions of an Economic Hit Man," Perkins recalls the words of Tom Paine and Thomas Jefferson who inspired Americans to fight imperial oppression with their appeal to freedom, liberty and natural rights. As Perkins wrestled with his conscience in his career as an EHM he would ask, "What would Tom Paine say?" Like a modern Tom Paine, Perkins invokes the same principles to inspire Americans to demand an end to "our self destructive march to global empire."

Reggaeton gets rich and rapper Daddy Yankee leads the way

By Jordan Levin
Knight Ridder Newspapers

MIAMI — He may have diamonds gleaming everywhere, four-inch, gem-encrusted initials hanging from his neck, chunky gold and diamond bracelets, tiny Puerto Rican flags in both ears, but reggaeton rapper Daddy Yankee (real name Raymond Ayala) still doesn't have a mainstream rap star's outsize swagger, the kind that seems to suck up all the air in the vicinity.

His name, Puerto Rican slang for Big Daddy, is also full of bluster. But on a recent visit to Miami that included a career-making appearance on Univision's popular music-awards show "Premio Lo Nuestro," Yankee, 28, seemed as hesitant as he was excited, like he couldn't quite believe everything that was happening to him. He was anxious over hitting the right pose for a photographer, eagerly looking for an article featuring him in hip-hop bible Vibe Magazine.

Both he and his music have come a long way from their funky street roots in the slums of Puerto Rico, when both the Latin music and the hip-hop world looked down on reggaeton.

"I started in the hood, and lots of people dissed me as a delinquent, but now I'm here getting back my honor, big-time," Yankee freestyles in Spanish at a South Beach restaurant, laughing at the sunshine bouncing off the water and the reporters from his hometown of San Juan hovering nearby and the anticipation of mastering the Latin masses the following night. "I'm gonna kill em on 'Premio,' in the name of all Latinos. Shout out to all the babes and the bosses in Miami."

If he can seem hesitant off-stage, put Daddy Yankee in front of an audience and he burns so hot you wonder why the diamonds don't melt. Fourteen years of rapping take over with a machine-gun rattle of beats and rhymes. At his "Premio" performance at American Airlines Arena last month, he stalked the stage like a hip-hop warrior, while his booming hit "Gasolina" sent an electrified crowd up onto its feet.

His appearance on "Premio" (along with fellow reggaeton artist Don Omar, who performed with Spanish pop singer Alejandro Sanz) marked a turning point for both Yankee and his compatriots in reggaeton, the dancehall-rap blend that rose out of Puerto Rico in the mid-90s and is beginning to push its way into both the Latin and the hip-hop mainstream. In the last few months the genre has been adopted by mainstream Spanish-language radio, an acknowledgement of several years of solid showings on the Latin sales charts. This Saturday, Yankee headlines Reggaetonzol, a concert produced by radio chain Spanish Broadcasting Systems and its Miami station El Zol 95.7-FM, and featuring names like Pitbull, Fat Joe, Ivy Queen and others.

It's sweet for both Yankee and his music. "People love reggaeton, it's the industry that sometimes puts barriers," he says. "(Reggaeton) is our hip-hop."

And Yankee may be its first real star. His latest solo album, "Barrio Fino," on his own El Cartel Records, has sold more than half a million copies and been in the top 10 of the Billboard Latin Album sales chart for 32 weeks, nine of them at No. 1. "Gasolina" has been thundering on both Latin and urban radio. Yankee has caught people's attention in a way that other top reggaeton acts like Tego Calderon and Don Omar haven't. The New York Times called "Barrio Fino" "one of the year's best hip-hop albums."

Last weekend he opened for an Usher Showtime concert special in Puerto Rico, and he'll perform on MTV's Spring Break later this month. He's modeling for P. Diddy's Sean John clothing line, and has been featured in Vibe, The Source, and XXL. He's already done the requisite remix with producer Lil Jon, and on his next album he'll work with star producers The Neptunes.

"He's opened the door for everybody," says Angela Romero, associate music editor at Vibe. "He's changing the perception of reggaeton."

COURTESY CARL JUSTE

Reggaeton rapper Daddy Yankee, 28, poses before a concert in Miami, Fla. Yankee's latest album, "Barrio Fino," was on the Billboard Latin Album sales chart for 32 weeks.

Romero says Yankee's qualities leave him poised to explode. "This is reggaeton's answer to (P. Diddy)," she said. "Musically he's very Latin and at the same time ... he's a true rapper. The girls love him — he has that baby face and good boy look, but he tells these stories from the street. He offers the best of both worlds."

It's a dizzying change for a kid who started rhyming on street corners in the poor San Juan housing development of Villa Kennedy. Yankee still has a gimpy leg from the time he was shot in his late teens, landing him in the hospital for almost a year, unable to walk.

"I saw death. I felt it in my face," Yankee says. "It was my pitch-black moment. I'm human, and yeah, I wanted to get revenge. But there's no coming back from that." Instead, he turned full-time to music. "It made me want to testify, tell real stories. I just put it in my rhyme book. I decided to always be real, always be a hard-core reggaeton, hardcore hip-hop artist. You're never gonna find Yankee doing something pop."

It's the classic hip-hop trajectory: the kid from the hood who fights his way to the top with stories of the street. But in the early 1990s there was no Latin hip-hop universe where someone like Yankee could climb to the stars. The Latin music industry shunned rap as lower-class and American. And the mainstream hip-hop world hadn't yet accepted rap in Spanish.

"We decided to make our own sound, which was to mix hip-hop with Spanish reggae," he says. "We created reggaeton."

Yankee identified with rappers like Dr. Dre ("he's still my idol"), NWA, Big Daddy Kane and Run DMC. "They were from the same environment as I was in Puerto Rico," Yankee says. "They were from the street, and we came from the street. I didn't know what they were saying, but the sound and the look ... was just like us in Puerto Rico."

At the same time, bass-heavy dancehall from Jamaica was booming in Puerto Rico, along with the Spanish reggae of El General. And the classic salsa of artists like Hector Lavoe and El Gran Combo still rang true for Yankee and other reggaeton pioneers.

"I don't listen to the new salsa, I respect the old salsa more," he says. "They were more barrio. They weren't afraid to speak the truth. It's like us, we're like the new salsa."

"Barrio Fino" features a track with classic salsa singer Andy Montanez, and Yankee has approached Gran Combo about recording with them.

Reggaeton features a distinctive, fast, almost syncopated bass line with the heavy thud of Jamaican reggae, and rap/sung vocals that echo with the nasal, intense sound of classic salsa singing. It's got a slang so complex it's almost its own language ("Le gusta la gasolina," the chorus from Gasolina, is literally "She likes gasoline" but means "she likes to cruise/she likes to go"). But the improvisation and rhythmic wordplay, the boasting street attitude, are right out of hip-hop.

The music started to bubble up in Puerto Rico with the release of "Playero 37," a mix tape that featured Yankee and other rappers who had previously performed only on street corners and home recordings. It started to explode in clubs and taped recordings. But its obscenity-laced tales of guns, sex, drugs and slum life made it as controversial as gangster rap; radio wouldn't play it; the media and the authorities criticized it.

"It was straight underground," Yankee says. "We put out a lot of music talking about the corruption in the government, about our environment in Puerto Rico. Some people felt like we were immoral. Gangs, drugs, sex — that's the environment we live in, that's real."

As reggaeton has started breaking into the Latin mainstream, it has moved away from violent street sagas and toward tales of women and partying. And as it has gained greater legitimacy in the hip-hop world (helped by the success of Latino rappers like Fat Joe and Miami's own Pitbull), artists are proclaiming their musical skills and verbal virtuosity as much as their street credibility.

And they are playing a major role in reclaiming Latinos' place in hip-hop, which gives Yankee's drive to success the added impetus of doing it for his culture and his island, as well as for himself. "We were part of (hip-hop)," Yankee says. "But they've never given us the credit."

"We're gonna take the credit on that if it happens and it's already happening. But the credit is for the Latin community. It comes from Puerto Rico, but we don't mind sharing it." And he grins.

Two days after his "Premio" performance, Yankee is standing under a glowering sky backstage at the Bayfront Amphitheater, waiting to go on at the Bob Marley Caribbean Festival and Food Drive. "I'm tired — how do I get my energy back?" he says. But he ignites onstage, pounding the air, raking in energy while he rips off inhumanly fast rhymes, exhorting the hysterical crowd of black, white and Latina women pressed against the stage. Even the rain can't dampen their enthusiasm.

He seems almost dazed afterwards, sweating and shaking his head. "I expect that from my Latin fan base, but to see white women, black, all screaming for you, that's beautiful."

'Medium' haunts airwaves

says. "She has this radio in her head that she has no control over. Wherever she looked, she saw dead people. It was a tremendous albatross in terms of having a family life. And I thought, 'I've never heard that story before, certainly not from the point of view of a soccer mom.'"

Casting Arquette, it would seem, was preordained.

Caron says: "I was halfway through writing the pilot, and my girlfriend was reading it and said, 'This is Patricia Arquette, isn't it?' And I said, 'Wow, isn't that a great idea.' We sent the script to Patricia, and she said yes. It was as simple as that."

Playing an otherworldly crime-solver isn't much of a stretch for an actress who has fashioned a fascinatingly checkered career out of eccentric roles in such films as "True Romance" and "Lost Highway."

In 2001's "Human Nature," for instance, she played a sort of female Yeti, roaming the forest with a thick, downy pelt of blond hair.

Miguel Sandoval, who plays DuBois' mentoring district attorney in "Medium," was in the cast of "Human Nature." What he remembers most is Arquette's dedication.

"I thought, 'Holy moly, anybody who would sit in a makeup chair for five or six hours every day to have hair laid over their body by hand and then do the acting deserves all the respect in the world,'" he says.

That Arquette, 36, seems drawn to unconventional roles is hardly surprising, given her background. She comes from an acting family. Her grandfather Cliff, professionally known as Charlie Weaver, was a longtime center panelist on "Hollywood Squares." Her father, Lewis, was a regular on "The Waltons." Her siblings, including Rosanna and David, are in the business.

Arquette was raised on a commune in Arlington, Va. "It wasn't like free drugs and free sex," she says on the phone during a shooting break. "My parents wanted their kids to grow up in an artistic, spiritual community.

"It was wonderful. I had no idea of material possessions and socioeconomic classes."

At one point in her rebellious teens, Arquette shaved her head. "I was, like, 15," she says. "It was all about the look and finding my own expression, and being a little more edgy."

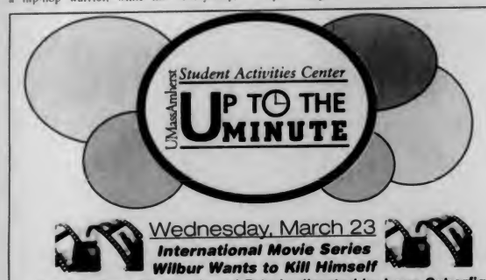
She still doesn't find the gesture all that radical.

"I think it's ridiculous when people react to their kids' hair choice or clothing. ... My son can have a Mohawk anytime."

Arquette has a 16-year-old son, Enzo, from a relationship with musician Paul Rossi. After a turbulent six-year marriage to actor Nicolas Cage, she is living with actor Thomas Jane, with whom she has a 2-year-old daughter, Harlow.

The actress, who has always projected a curious mix of punk and glamour, may have found the role of her career in Allison DuBois. It's a character she seems to inhabit.

"She doesn't perceive Allison to be truly confident in her powers," Sandoval says. "She's always expecting to be surprised. And that gives a real immediacy and honesty to every acting moment."



Says Caron: "In order to possess this gift, in order to have enough empathy, Allison has to be inordinately unvain. And whoever plays her, you'd have to sense this is not a person who spends a lot of time looking in the mirror. Patricia epitomizes that. There's something etherpal about her."

Arquette is so free of vanity that, in a profession that is all about cosmetics, she has stubbornly refused to get her tangled orthodontia squared away.

"I've always had a problem with authority," she explains. "If someone tells me I have to do something with my teeth, it ticks me off. The way I looked when I was younger, I could have gone for that baby-doll, Playboy-bunny look. But I didn't want to be that. I wanted to be my own person and express feelings and tell stories."

The only problem with playing a psychic, she finds, is that folks tend to confuse you with one.

"People say stuff like, 'I wanted to come by earlier. But you know that'," Arquette says. "That's happening all the time now."

Bogut comes from nowhere to become an All-American

Redick is one of the best shooters in the game from long range — 40.5 percent on 3-pointers, and the free throw line, 93.7 percent. The 6-foot-4 Redick averaged 22.1 points and played 37.3 minutes per game for the short-handed Blue Devils, who won the Atlantic Coast Conference tournament for the sixth time in seven years and are in the round of 16 for the eighth straight year.

"[1] has become a complete player," Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski said. "Everyone watches his shooting ability. He's found different ways to score; he's become our best off-the-ball perimeter defender; he's handled the ball; he's become a leader for us."

Redick is the first Duke All-America since Jason Williams was selected in 2001 and 2002.

The other three All-Americas all were eliminated from the NCAA tournament on the opening weekend.

The 6-0 Paul had one of the most impressive stat lines in college basketball. He averaged 15.3 points, 4.5 rebounds, 6.6 assists, 2.4 steals and shot 47.4 percent on 3s and 83.4 percent from the free throw line.

He was the leading vote-getter on the AP's preseason All-America team and he's Wake Forest's first postseason selection since Tim Duncan repeated in 1997.

"I just love the way he commands a game," Wake Forest coach Skip Prosser said. "He's not without flaws, but I wouldn't trade him for any point guard in the country."

The 6-9 Simien had an outstanding career despite what seemed like constant injuries. He missed 28 games over his first three years with various injuries and he missed four games this season after having surgery on his left thumb. Still, he averaged 20.3 points and 11.0 rebounds while shooting 55.2 percent from the field and 81.6 percent at the free throw line to become the Jayhawks' first All-America since Nick Collison in 2003.

"He had the best year of any player I have ever coached," Kansas' Bill Self said. "It's amazing the adversity he has been through but he remains so positive. His play is a direct reflection of his attitude."

The 6-8 Warrick, one of the key players in Syracuse's 2003 national championship run, averaged 21.4 points and 8.6 rebounds while shooting 54.8 percent from the field, a stat augmented by his spectacular dunking ability.

"It's a special honor especially since no Syracuse player has done it since Billy Owens in 1991 and there have so many great players here the last few years like Carmelo (Anthony)," Warrick said.

Orange coach Jim Boeheim said: "Hak was spectacular. The dunks he made just demoralized people. He took over games and we struggled to score except for him."

Several rule changes facing NFL committee

FIRST LOOK/THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Terrell Owens' broken leg stemmed from horse-collaring.

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

KAPALUA, Hawaii — A week in Maui was anything but a vacation for the NFL's competition committee.

The eight voting members of the committee, headed by Tennessee Titans coach Jeff Fisher and Atlanta Falcons general manager Rich McKay, are making 19 rules proposals to the owners at the annual meetings. Several are controversial enough to cause some vehement debate.

Among the proposals are: adopting the college rule for 15-yard defensive pass interference penalties rather than continuing with spot fouls — unless the foul was within 15 yards of the line of scrimmage; eliminating peel-back blocks below the waist outside the tackle box, and extending replay challenges to cover fumbles on plays already whistled by officials because the ball carrier was down by contact.

The committee also seeks to eliminate "horse-collar tackles," where the defender grabs the ball carrier inside the back of the shoulder pads and immediately drags him down while also falling on his legs. Such tackles would be deemed unsportsmanlike conduct, a 15-yard penalty.

"We want to eliminate dangerous plays that lead to injuries," Fisher said Monday. "We looked at all injury tapes and 90 percent of lower-extremity injuries, eight or nine could've been avoided. Four or five were associated with this type of technique.

"We're not singling out Roy Williams," Fisher added of the Dallas safety whose horse-collaring of Terrell Owens broke the leg and damaged the ankle of the Eagles' star receiver. "We're singling out a technique."

Fisher said he doesn't favor the college rule on pass interference, a proposal made by the Chiefs.

"I believe it will encourage lots of penalties," he said, emphasizing interference would happen too often on downfield plays.

Defensive pass interference beyond 15 yards that is considered flagrant will make the penalty a spot foul, McKay said. That, in theory, should prevent intentional tackles of receivers by a defender who is badly beaten on a long pass. But Fisher said he isn't so sure.

"It will have a dramatic effect on the passing game," he said.

Kansas City also suggests 5-yard illegal contact penalties not carry an automatic first down for the offense.

Perhaps the most contentious suggestion by the committee concerns the instant replay for down-by-contact plays. So the committee is proposing just a one-year experimentation.

There were less than 20 situations over the last two seasons where the down-by-contact call was incorrect. But because it can involve a change of possession, the committee felt it was worth being challengeable.

"If this passes," Fisher said, "the referee would be able to look at the play through recovery (of the ball). If he could not see clearly the recovery, the offense would retain the ball."

Another replay change would be the elimination of the buzzer system, which McKay and Fisher both comically mentioned abuses by certain coaches to slow down the run of play. No longer will coaches be able to claim the buzzer went off accidentally because they won't be hooked up; only by throwing the red flag onto the field will they be able to alert officials about a challenge.

"If you throw the flag and don't have any more challenges or timeouts," McKay added, "it will be a (15-yard) penalty."

Another proposal will protect a player who is out of a play from being blindsided, a tactic often used against kickers or punters, or against quarterbacks after an interception.

New England proposed positioning two TV cameras at each goal line to assist coaches on whether to challenge a play, and to aid the referee when examining an instant replay.

The competition committee also suggests penalizing a team for calling a second timeout in the same dead ball situation. It will be considered unsportsmanlike conduct, a 15-yard penalty.

Earlier Monday, commissioner Paul Tagliabue told the owners that talks to extend the collective bargaining agreement with the players are "at a dead end."

While Tagliabue would not concede that internal squabbles have stalled talks, it was evident from owners that the simmering contention between high-revenue and low-revenue teams has contributed as much to the impasse as a division between the union and the league.

"The union is asking for a lot of money," said Dan Rooney, the owner of the Pittsburgh Steelers, one of the have-not teams. "We can't get to that because of where we are among ourselves."

Red Sox decide to continue calling Fenway Park home

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox have decided to stay put at Fenway Park for the long term, ending years of speculation about whether the team would bolt from baseball's oldest and smallest stadium.

The Red Sox on Wednesday plan to announce they will remain at Fenway, an industry source with knowledge of the team's plans told The Associated Press on Tuesday. The source spoke on condition of anonymity.

Since buying the Red Sox in February 2002, the team's owners have refused to say whether they had made a final decision on staying long-term at Fenway, despite several recent stadium upgrades and seat additions.

The team's planned announcement to remain at Fenway was reported Tuesday in The Boston Globe, which cited Red Sox executives who declined to be identified.

Charles Steinberg, the team's executive vice president of public affairs, said Tuesday that the team planned to hold a news conference Wednesday. He declined further comment.

Sources cited by the Globe said the team plans to seek public financing to improve streets and sidewalks around the stadium and to build one or more garages and a new train station at Yawkey Way. But those plans aren't contingent on securing public financing, the Globe reported.

The industry source who spoke to The Associated Press said the team had no plans to seek public money for any improvements to the stadium or surrounding neighborhood.

Red Sox manager Terry Francona, speaking to reporters before Tuesday night's exhibition game against Cincinnati in Fort Myers, Fla., called the plans to remain at Fenway "wonderful."

"I commend our ownership for being smart enough to know that the place we play in may be the best in baseball," he said.

Francona cited the team's new weight room and batting cage and the strong water pressure in his shower.

"It's unbelievable," he said of Fenway, "and I still have the best shower in the league. I don't want them to take that away."

The Red Sox won the World Series last year for the first time since 1918, six years after Fenway Park opened. Last year, Boston sold out each of its 81 regular season home games.

The Red Sox ownership team, headed by John Henry, recently received approval to add more than 2,000 seats or standing locations on the roofs extending above the left and right field stands in time for the 2006 season. Those seats and other changes would expand the park's capacity from 36,298 to 38,815.

Red Sox ownership has indicated that their goal is to increase park capacity to nearly 40,000.

Five years ago, the team's old owners mounted an unsuccessful bid for a new stadium. The state agreed in 2000 to earmark $100 million for infrastructure construction, while the city agreed to spend $140 million for acquisition and cleanup costs at the site of a new stadium.

Vegas is the center of the universe during March Madness

By Jeff Passan
Knight Ridder

LAS VEGAS — Bill Clair slogs out of the bathroom in Room 346 of the Hard Rock Hotel & Casino. Villanova and New Mexico are playing in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on the Philips plasma screen, and he's not altogether interested. Clair, shirtless for the moment, lets out a long yawn. He doesn't look the part of a man who minutes ago cashed a $2,000 gambling ticket.

"Little too much champagne last night," Clair says. "Little too much everything."

That's the ethos here in the land of grandiose hotels, clubs, bars and, above all, dollars: There's no such thing as too much. The NCAA Tournament attracts to Las Vegas patrons from around the country who want to sidle up to a chair in a sports book and bet, bet, bet. They're chasing something. The money, the rush, the bragging rights — whatever their vice.

It's obsessive, and only getting bigger. Nevada took $91 million in wagers from the Super Bowl in January. Estimates for the NCAA Tournament hover around $80 million of the more than $2 billion wagered in everything from office pools to offshore books.

"This is by far the busiest four days of the year," says Bob Scucci, the Stardust's sports book director.

It's because of people like Clair. This is his third year coming to Las Vegas for the tournament. He meets with friends and cousins, and on the first two nights of the tournament, they take turns staking out seats in the sports book. Remember, lines form at 2 a.m.

He's gone to 15 World Series, eight Masters and eight Stanley Cups, and he says nothing matches the first four days of the NCAA Tournament in Las Vegas. All of the vices afflict Clair. He let a friend, John Dinneen, convince him to place a bet he deemed The Gator Hedge. Clair, a graduate of the University of Florida, wagered 10 times his normal $200 bet on the team playing Florida, Ohio University.

"Only three things can happen," Clair explains. "If the Gators win, great, they won. If the Gators get smoked, you win thousands of dollars. The other happens once in a blue moon: The Gators win and you still win your bet. Best of everything."

Clair wakes up at 8 a.m. to catch the Florida game. His brain still awash in champagne, he falls asleep as the Gators take a 17-point lead. Ohio claws back, and by the time the Bobcats tie the score at 60-60, Clair awakens, and is nervous. His heart beats. With another basket, it could break.

Florida spares him such fate with a 67-62 victory. Clair hits the double whammy. He cashes his ticket and eyes his booty. It's short-lived. He immediately hands the money to his cousin, Michael Blakey, whom he owes $2,000.

Walking toward the sports book, Clair doesn't feel a pang of guilt betting against his alma mater. He finds himself caught up in the same morass as the thousands of others who pack sports books this weekend, the line of too much that's seemingly nonexistent.

"Morally, it's horrible," Clair says. "But what the hell. You're in Vegas."

As banks and schools and offices ran as usual Thursday morning, grown men in Las Vegas started drinking beer and watching basketball at 9:40 a.m.

At the Stardust, the granddaddy of sports books where the betting lines are set, every seat is filled. If nature calls, the only way to save a seat is by writing TAKEN on a piece of paper. Sometimes, people don't care.

In that respect, sports books are testosterone Miracle-Gro. Alpha males strut. Emotion trampolines. Strangers become brothers when a kid whose name they don't know and never will bother to find out hits a shot that covers the spread.

"The betting is so constant," Scucci says. "There's interest in every game, every shot, every..."

Scucci cranes his neck and eyeballs the goofballs letting out huzzahs. Someone hit a shot for 16th-seeded Montana to tie its game against top-seeded Washington, one the Huskies would win 88-77 but not cover the 20-point spread.

"You're looking up to see who's making a meaningless basket," Scucci says. "Well, they're not meaningless."

There's anguish, agony. And not just on TV. Forlorn faces and shaking heads speckle the crowd at the Stardust. Sports books reek of smoke and desperation. Numbers are everywhere. On walls, on lips, on minds. These are mortgage payments, retirement funds, groceries, educations, heating bills. Bad bounces bounce checks. Everyone in a sports book needs. A shot, a rebound, a prayer. To want isn't enough.

"The luckiest person in here," one man says, "is the one who doesn't bet."

Betting, of course, built this place, bought the 79 TVs, funds Scucci. Betting, too, attracts the majority of people here. It feeds the beast.

Television does its share as well. CBS paid the NCAA $6 billion for 11 years of tournament rights. Four games beam down simultaneously on the big screens at the Stardust. Then, the cut-ins start. CBS flashes to a different game. A lower seed is about to pull an upset. Announcers raise their voices an octave. Bettors, more likely to pick the favorite, squirm.

Those games end. On to the next. The day always leaps forward. Until night falls, there's another game, another chance. At Caesars Palace, Craig Watkins needs both.

After winning his first bet of the day, the Lee's Summit resident lost his next nine. He is cursing Texas coach Rick Barnes and bemoaning his strategy and praying his 12-team parlay that pays $40,000 comes through.

"Dude, I'm telling you, this is the best place I've ever seen," says Watkins, 40. "Look at people sitting on the floor. I mean, this is the best, right?"

Watkins watches two teams from his parlay lose, meaning it will pay 5-to-1 if his remaining 10 teams win.

"Well," Watkins says, "kind of the best."

He stuffs his ticket back in his pocket. It's good for now, at least for a moment. Losers dispose of theirs, some with a single tear and others by ripping and shredding and sprinkling the remains like pixie dust that lost its magic.

OK then, enough of this. Over the first two days of the tournament, thousands of bettors have laid millions of dollars and bathed in the excitement. It's my turn. On Friday night, my school, fourth-seeded Syracuse, played 13th-seeded Vermont. My knowledge of the Orange has atrophied badly since I graduated in 2002, so this bet — $50 on Syracuse giving up nine points — is made strictly on school pride.

That fades quickly. Syracuse plays a miserable first half and somehow leads 23-19 at halftime. They can't keep playing this badly, right?

Syracuse commits its 17th turnover 6 minutes into the second half. Hakim Warrick is taking a three-pointer. Perhaps they can keep playing this badly.

The Orange starts pressing. Good move. Terrence Roberts steals the ball and dunks it. He hangs on the rim too long for the ref's liking and gets a technical foul.

Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim smiles. I don't.

Commercial break. Deep breaths. That David Spade commercial is on. For some reason, he's more annoying than usual.

Back to the game, and Vermont keeps pushing. No way Syracuse covers. Best-case scenario: Syracuse wins, I lose. Faith is dwindling. So is the clock.

"Boy," says Alan Cribb, a 26-year-old from Las Vegas, "doesn't gambling make sports a hell of a lot more fun?"

No.

With 3.7 seconds remaining, Vermont turns the ball over in a tied game. Should Syracuse win now and advance or go to overtime and possibly win and cover? Greed wins out when Gerry McNamara misses a three-pointer at the buzzer.

Likewise, karma wins in overtime. T.J. Sorrentine drills a 25-foot three-pointer in overtime that sent Catamounts coach Tom Brennan leaping into the air. So do expletives at the Orleans.

When Syracuse turns the ball over with .4 seconds remaining and seals the 60-57 victory for Vermont, my phone rings.

"Just to let you know," says the boss, "that's not company money."

Fine, as long as I get to keep the ticket. I don't want to crumble it up or tear it or burn it. It's a lesson that, perhaps, there is such a thing as too much.

Outside of the Orleans, it's raining. How appropriate. Just in time for the late games.

They've worn the shirts eight times. They're still white enough for an angel. On the back collars are the letters K and U, and on the left breast read the words Las Vegas March Madness.

Behind the gambling windows at Caesars stands Chuck Esposito, the director of the sports book. He has a smile on his face. His casino raked in plenty of money this weekend, sure, and that felt good.

"But this weekend," Esposito says. "It's fun. It's what we live for."

Late run lifts Minutemen

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

While closing out the first third of the season, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has wreaked havoc on opposing offenses, caused opposing defenses to look dizzy and confused and has appeared to figure out what it may be capable of come tourney time.

UMass	8
Sacred Heart	3

The relentless defense had another solid game and sparked the offense to a consistant attack, and the No. 11 Minutemen (5-1) scored the final four goals of the game to transform a close contest into an 8-3 convincing victory over Sacred Heart (4-2) in Fairfield, Conn.

UMass will retake the field this Saturday against Loyola in Baltimore, Md., at 1 p.m.

The Minutemen used a hat trick from Sean Morris, his fifth such performance in as many games this season, and 14 saves from goalie Bill Schell to brush aside the Pioneers.

Massachusetts' strong performance in the second half directly correlated with Morris scoring the game's last three goals in the final 21:16 of the contest, and Schell used nine of his 14 saves in the third and fourth quarters.

"Our defense was excellent, Bill Schell was solid in goal and Dane Collins won a lot of draws," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "This was a team effort, and I am proud of our guys. Sacred Heart hung around. They are a very good team and played scrappy, much like our team."

Not to be overlooked was the play of the defense, which only allowed a meager three goals after limiting Brown to just five on Saturday.

Led by ECAC Defensive Player of the Week Jack Reid, plus Matt Garcia and Aaron Paskalis, the defense limited shots and held Sacred Heart's top four scorers pointless.

Cannella noted that the Pioneers had won four in a row and were coming off their biggest win in school history last week, a 9-8 overtime win at Dartmouth, so they would be a tough team to conquer.

"This is a good group of guys," Cannella said about his squad. "They count on each other, and they have good leadership."

Coming off a 12-5 drubbing of archrival Brown, which was ranked No. 17 on Saturday, the Minutemen could have fallen into the same trap that caught them just one week prior at Albany, when they were upset by the Great Danes, 10-9 in Troy, N.Y.

"This was the same type of opponent as we played last Tuesday," Schell said. "We weren't ready for that game, so we concentrated on being ready for the first whistle of the game today.

"The D made a lot of easy shots for me. They forced a lot of shots from the outside, not crease shots, and it made it easy for me to get into a groove."

Jeff Zywicki kicked off the day's scoring with 8:30 to play in the first quarter, and Brian Iacovina followed suit just over four minutes later to give UMass a 2-0 lead.

Pioneer Ryan Morse cut the lead in half in the second quarter, but Andrew Recchione pushed the lead back to two goals with 10:02 remaining in the first half.

Sacred Heart made it a one-goal game once again when Billy Fuchs scored his seventh of the season with 5:41 to play in the second quarter, but Massachusetts used a Gene Tundo goal to head into the locker room with a 4-2 halftime lead.

Just over four minutes into the final half, the Pioneers held true to the back-and-forth scoring when Derek Platt added his fifth of the season to cut the lead to 4-3.

Zywicki's second goal of the game and 13th of the season started the four-goal run to close out Sacred Heart in their first home game of the year.

This is the fourth time in the last five years that the Minutemen have opened their season with at least a 5-1 record.

UMass goalie Bill Schell registered a season-high 14 saves for the Minutemen in Fairfield, Conn. yesterday. The Minutemen will play Loyola in Baltimore on Saturday.

UM ready for Hofstra

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2-3) will eagerly return back to action on their home turf of Garber Field against the 7th-ranked Hofstra Pride (5-1) today at 4 p.m.

The Minutewomen will be looking to rebound from a lopsided defeat at the hands of the 13th-ranked Syracuse Orange last Saturday, but it won't be a simple task against the rolling Pride. UMass' biggest flaw of experience happens to be exactly what has gotten Hofstra into the nation's top-10 as the they have 10 seniors to UMass' three. Coach Carrie Bolduc knows the discrepancy in game experience provides a big challenge for her team.

"What makes them good is experience; their transition is good, they connect well to the ball. Our issue right now is we're young, and the mental mistakes that we have just off of turnovers," Bolduc said. "They have nine seniors that I believe all start, and you can imagine by your fourth year you're making less mistakes so they have played together for a while and obviously have gelled and are doing more things right."

It will take a well carefully played game with minimal error and turnovers for the Minutewomen to hang with today's opponent because of the small amount of mistakes the senior-laden Pride make as a team. Along with taking care of the ball the young UMass team will have to execute in transition and in set plays in order to get more shots on goal than it has been. The Minutewomen average just around eight less shots on goal per game than their opponents even tough their percentage of goals scored out of shots on goal is a bit higher than their opponents' percentage.

"I think our transition attack has improved tremendously. For the most part, when we shoot, we finish, Bolduc explained." So if we can execute and attack, if we can execute in transition, get the ball in attack, execute our set plays and shoot and shoot more than 15 shots on goal during the entire game, then for the most part we're a scoring team, we know how to finish. That's going to be important that we have lots of shots on and we take care of the game."

Although last Saturday's game against a powerful Syracuse team ended in a rout, it did provide some confidence for the growing Minutewomen who were only down by two goals at the start of the second half. The focus today will be to compete at a high level of play for the whole 60 minutes rather than 30, which may take the stepping up and accelerated growth as leaders of the team's freshmen.

"We're looking for some players who haven't played as much to be leaders out there, to make game changing plays or to come up with an extra draw control or an extra ground ball," Bolduc said. "I think we are calling on some of our young people to do that because we have so many young people out there."

Relying on freshmen may not be the best way to go into a big game, but the few seniors and juniors, specifically Kerri Connerty and Jackie Nesbitt, are starting to step up as leaders along with the captains and are bringing the underclassmen around. Playing top-ranked teams like Syracuse and Hofstra should also speed up the learning process giving the freshmen and sophomores experience that can't be gained with practice or against mediocre competition.

Most young teams may fold to the challenge of a well traveled and top ranked team, but Bolduc remains confident that her team is up for the challenge that Hofstra presents.

"I think it definitely helps [to play in big games]. I think our team, what's good about them or what's special about them is they tend to rise to a challenge, maybe not under pressure yet, but they like challenges," Bolduc explained. "I would prefer to see them play against a big team rather than a team that's average or mediocre. It's fun to see my team and how they can handle it and it certainly helps us our for A-10's."

After taking on the Pride, the Minutewomen will head to New Hampshire to take on the Wildcats.

UMass drops 10th of season

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

With all respect to March Madness aside, this was a game of runs. Thing is, the Massachusetts baseball team didn't score any at all.

The Minutemen (3-10) already drop to double digits in the loss column after suffering a 9-0 loss at the hands of the powerful bats of the Connecticut Huskies, who banged out 13 hits on a total of five different UMass pitchers en route to the pummeling at Harbor Yard.

UConn	9

UConn now leads the all-time series at 72-69-3, while also extending their winning streak to two and having won nine of its last 11.

The Maroon and White have now dropped four straight, and have not scored a run in their last 21-1/3 innings of play. They now head to Cincinnati, Ohio this weekend, where they will take on the Xavier Musketeers in a three-game series.

Once again, the Minuteman bats went silent at the plate, registering just five hits against the Husky pitching squad. The lack of hitting allowed junior lefthander Brendan McGinn (1-2) to register his first win of the season on a two-hit, five-strikeout effort. UMass has now put up just 11 hits over the last three games.

The Huskies immediately went to work in the bottom of the first inning. After Jeremy Demers (1-3) walked Austin Wassermann to lead off, Tony Mallozzi (3-for-4, one RBI) followed up with a single. Bryan Maler then reached first via a fielder's choice, Jeff Hourigan (2-for-2, three RBI) then doubled to centerfield to clear the bases and reached home in the next at bat when freshman Matt Karl knocked a triple. UConn rounded out the scoring in the first with a sacrifice fly that sent Karl home.

Demers lasted only two innings and was replaced by John Toffey at the start the third. Toffey was unable to stop the bleeding, as the Huskies scored two more in the fourth on singles from Larry Day and Mallozzi that made it 6-0. UConn registered one run in the fifth, sixth and eighth innings to round out the scoring for the afternoon.

The Minutemen threatened to score only once throughout the whole game, but Bill Rankin struck out swinging to end the inning with Brent Tarasuik on third base.

Bogut named All-American

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

Andrew Bogut was just another international player when the college basketball season started, not even meriting an honorable mention in the preseason All-America balloting.

All that has changed now for the 7-foot sophomore from Australia. The Utah center was the leading vote-getter on The Associated Press' All-America team announced Tuesday.

Bogut, who averaged 20.4 points and was second in the country in rebounding at 12.4, was joined on the first team by senior forwards Wayne Simien of Kansas and Hakim Warrick of Syracuse, junior guard J.J. Redick of Duke and sophomore guard Chris Paul of Wake Forest.

The voting was done on a 5-3-1 basis by the same 72-member national media panel that selects the Top 25 each week. The balloting was conducted before the NCAA tournament began.

Bogut received 60 first-team votes and 330 points, 22 more than Redick, who had 53 first-team votes.

Simien and Paul each had 289 points with Simien getting 45 first-team votes, one more than Paul. Warrick also had 44 first-team votes and got 283 points.

Bogut was the only member of the first team not to have received any recognition after last season. In fact, he was the only one of the five not to have been at least an honorable mention selection in the preseason All-America ballot-ing. Now Bogut is considered a sure lottery pick, and the possible top pick, if he decides to declare for the NBA draft.

"The thing that impresses me the most about Andrew is his ability to get better as the year went along," first-year Utah coach Ray Giacoletti said. "I've never seen a guy his size with the versatility he has and the will to win he has."

Bogut showed off his passing skills with a season-high seven assists in the Utes' second-round win over Oklahoma last Saturday, a game in which he has a season-low 10 points on just seven shots. That led the Utes into the round of 16 for the first time since their 1998 run to the national championship game.

"We were just trying to have a successful year and do our best," said Bogut, Utah's first All-America since Andre Miller in 1999. "It just all came together these last couple of weeks."

Bonds blames media, may not return in '05

By Ken Peters
Associated Press

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — Coming off knee surgery and caught up in baseball's steroids scandal, Barry Bonds said he may not play at all this season — despite standing on the doorstep of the sport's most hallowed record.

The San Francisco Giants slugger also said he was physically and mentally "done," and blamed the media for at least part of his troubles.

"I'm tired of my kids crying. You wanted me to jump off a bridge, I finally did," Bonds told reporters Tuesday, shortly after returning to training camp. "You finally brought me and my family down. ... So now go pick a different person."

Bonds, whose 703 career homers are 11 short of Babe Ruth's total and 52 behind Hank Aaron's record, was back in camp following last week's arthroscopic surgery on his right knee.

Sitting at a picnic table outside the Giants' clubhouse with his 15-year-old son, Nikolai, at his side, Bonds said, "My son and I are just going to enjoy our lives. You guys wanted to hurt me bad enough, you finally got me."

Bonds said he was tired and disappointed following a winter in which he was accused of steroid use, his grand jury testimony was leaked and he had two knee operations.

Leaning his head on a crutch and repeatedly saying he was tired, Bonds spoke after a 1 1/2-hour session with Giants trainer Stan Conte.

"Right now I'm just going to try to rehab myself to get back to, I don't know, hopefully next season, hopefully the middle of the season," Bonds said. "I don't know. Right now I'm just going to take things slow.

"I'm 40 years old, not 20, 30."

Bonds, who set the single-season record with 73 home runs in 2001, underwent a similar operation on the same knee on Jan. 31, but had a setback after workouts in camp earlier this month.

He returned to the Bay Area on March 16 and had surgery last Thursday to repair cartilage. Conte said last Thursday the second operation put Bonds back at "square one."

Conte said Bonds went through a "normal rehab six days out of surgery" on Tuesday, and that his knee looked as expected.

"I expect he'll progress as knee patients go," the trainer said, offering no prediction of when the seven-time NL MVP might be able to play again.

After Bonds' first operation this winter, Conte had said Bonds was expected to be sidelined for six weeks. All the trainer would say after the second surgery was that Bonds was unlikely to be ready for the season opener.

Teammate Moises Alou, who has come back from five surgeries, said Bonds probably was just having a bad day.

"Maybe today he was not very optimistic. I think it was one of those rehab days where you just caught him on one of the bad days," Alou said. "It's not fun when you come to the ballpark, then have to go to the training room to get taped and get treatment.

"It's not as fun as when you are young and wild and doing things, especially when you are the man."

Giants pitcher Jason Christiansen, who had to come back from reconstructive elbow surgery, also understands how facing rehab can be a bit depressing.

"There have been five or six times I've come in and said, 'I don't need this heartache any more.' It's a series of peaks and valleys," Christiansen said. "A week from now, Barry could turn around and say he'll be ready by April 5."

Christiansen realizes there's considerably more focus on Bonds.

"I couldn't imagine what he goes through on a daily basis, reading some of the stuff and hearing what people say about him. It's pretty much a circus," Christiansen said.

Last September, the Giants dropped a provision that would have allowed them to void Bonds' $18 million salary in 2006 if he failed to reach 500 plate appearances this year or 1,500 combined from 2003 to 2005, including at least 400 this year.

T-SR CARLOS PAJARES/CONTRA COSTA TIMES

San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds has lapped the bases 703 times throughout his career, and now he is saying he is too tired to do it anymore. Bonds announced yesterday he may not return to the field this season.

Student Trustee candidates voice platform goals

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Michael Todd

Student Government Association Trustee candidate Michael Todd encouraged University of Massachusetts students to vote him in this week's elections, promising that the upcoming year will be better run by himself and presidential candidate James Washburn.

Todd, like Washburn, emphasized the importance in working with various student groups on campus like registered student organizations and clubs.

"RSO's are the key to the student body," he said. "SGA hasn't shown them what they can do, and we can."

Todd implied that there are so many student groups on campus that do not receive the proper funding that they deserve because the SGA ignores them.

As for working with the Administrations, Todd criticized the SGA for not working with Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano.

"Not working with Gargano is the wrong direction for UMass," he said. "We are supposed to work with [the Administration] not for them."

Valerie Lewis

Current SGA Senator and running mate to presidential candidate Pavel Payano, Valerie Lewis said that she plans to initiate a fifteen point platform she and Payano created for the upcoming year.

"I will be continuing the platform that Pavel Payano spoke about," she said, " and I believe that we are the only candidates to have a platform posted online."

Current President of the SGA Eduardo Bustamante and Trustee Matthew Murphy publicly endorsed Lewis and Payano and she felt that endorsement is key to her plans for the SGA.

"We plan on following the platform of Eddie and Matt," she said. She added that they would work on affordability.

Lewis stressed the importance of gaining tenure faculty members in spite of the recent influx of student teachers, graduate student teachers and teaching assistants on campus.

Lewis also said that she plans to "step up the representation of Greek Life" by being in close contact with Greek Life director Michael Wiseman.

Craig Goldschmidt

Three-year SGA member and Trustee candidate Craig Goldschmidt urged viewers to vote for him because of his extensive knowledge on how the SGA works and more importantly how it doesn't work.

Goldschmidt, who is running alongside presidential candidate Sean Bliss, told viewers the importance of a functioning SGA above all.

"I have seen the struggles with the senators and the Administration," he said. "We need to fix the SGA before fixing campus."

Goldschmidt added that his major plans include revamping student parking.

"We need to reform the cost of parking," he said. "This year, a sticker in the yellow lot was $106; five years ago it was $40."

He reiterated that services on campus are in need of improvement like crosswalks and paving.

"We need to improve every aspect of student life."

Goldschmidt is also aiming to unite the graduate and undergraduate programs at UMass, saying that the SGA must "represent the campus as a whole."

SGA stews over admin's RSO plans

By Dan O'Brien

The discussion at last night's 1:46:1st regular meeting of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association centered around Chancellor John Lombardi's new plans to create a center to oversee the University's registered student organizations.

During the meeting's officer reports, President Eduardo Bustamante announced that he and Graduate Employee Organization President Uri Strauss have created an alternative plan to Lombardi's, which they will present to the Faculty Senate at its meeting today.

One key element of Lombardi's new plan is already causing an outcry from several members of the SGA, including Bustamante and Speaker Mark Morrison. That element is a recommendation to create a new administratively-run center that would oversee more than 40 registered student organizations. Since the center would be part of the University's Department of Student Affairs and Campus Life, it would ultimately be led by Michael

Honor society gives to scholarship fund

By Kelly McGuire
Collegian Staff

The UMass chapter of Phi Kappa Phi, the fourth oldest chapter of the collegiate academic excellence honor society is donating money to a scholarship fund in memory of a deceased former faculty member.

"To commemorate the 100th anniversary, we are donating $1,000 to the Barbara B. Burn Scholarship," said John Nelson, professor of the directing and writing program at UMass.

Nelson has been the president of the society for the past 13 years, and founded the Professional Writing and Technical Communication Program at the University in 1990.

Barbara B. Burn was the associate provost for international programs at the University of Massachusetts and a world leader in international education. Burn died in 2002.

"She was an extraordinary figure on this campus for a long time. We would like to memorialize the great contribution she made on campus," said Nelson.

The $1000 scholarship in Burn's memory will be split between two students. One UMass student who wants to study abroad will be awarded $500, as well as a foreign student who wants to study at UMass. According to Nelson, most scholarships in Massachusetts are for young women and men in-state. This scholarship gives students from other places more opportunity.

Burn founded exchanges and study abroad programs at the university for faculty and students. Nelson said Burn was called "the leading personality in the higher-education exchange field" by Jack Egle, chairman of the board of the Council of International Educational Exchange, according to UMass Magazine.

Burn received a number of honors for her contributions to general education, international education, and cultural and international relations. In the late 1960s when Burn arrived on campus, fewer than 100 students took part in international exchanges. In 2002 more than 1,000 students studied abroad, while double that number of foreign students, scholars, and faculty came to study at UMass. With the help of Burn, the university established exchange agreements with more than 100 countries.

The scholarship is being organized by IPO, International Programs Office, located in Hills on campus. International Programs Office (IPO) is strongly committed to providing education abroad opportunities for a wide range of students. IPO contributes to the education abroad of the academic life off campus, not just on campus. Working closely with faculty and the administration, IPO coordinates and administers over fifty overseas education abroad programs. Many of them are full-year reciprocal exchanges.

The society of Phi Kappa Phi has won other awards in recent years. According to Nelson, the society has won fellowships for $7000 a year four times. These awards are also distributed to students who are good candidates to receive this recognition.

According to Nelson, the society wants to be remembered for their contribution to the students, as well as the achievement of celebrating 100 years of success on campus.

Kosher DC offers fresh spin on meal plan

By Sesugh Nombahan

AMHERST — There is a misconception that only Jewish students can eat in the Kosher dining hall in Southwest. However, this is not the case.

On a weeknight, the atmosphere is relaxed and casual. Two students wear baseball caps, one a black skully, and the lone girl has a blue bandana tied on her head. Only three wear kipas, the traditional circle shaped Jewish head garment.

The UMass Hillel employs two of the three, Meir Lev Dashevsky and Jonah Gribetz Rubin. Dashevsky is the president of the UMass Hillel and Rubin is a student leader and activist.

At the tables, students speak openly about Jewish and non-Jewish matters, but mostly Jewish matters. Dashevsky and Rubin debate the causation of the Lebanese war. Aviv Moggio, a sophomore who says he often dines at the Kosher dining hall, asks questions about what it is like in Israel. He says he is planning to visit for the first time after he graduates next year. They joke with him.

"Don't wear that shirt in Israel," Dashevsky said. "They'll know you're an American."

"No, you should wear it," said Dan Ron, a sophomore who claims he is "the least religious."

"Israeli girls like Americans," he said.

Although the atmosphere is warm and friendly, the hot and freshly prepared food is the best part of the dining hall. Cook Amanda Pipczynski works at the Kosher dining hall in Southwest 40 hours a week. She uses all-natural products and fresh produce, despite the extra money it costs. Pipczynski says the quality of food is better because it is not cooked in bulk quantities. She usually makes enough to feed only 20 for dinner and 15 for lunch. However, she says she doesn't mind cooking more, and encourages Jewish and non-Jewish students to come down and try it out.

BRIAN PROKOPOWICZ/COLLEGIAN

The Kosher Dining Hall in Southwest offers a relaxed atmosphere and freshly prepared, kosher foods for all students participating in Your Campus Meal Plan.

The Kosher dining hall works the same as all University dining halls.

Students grab a tray and plate and utensils and get in the buffet line. Any variety of hot kosher dishes are available.

The pipczynski, or "potato pancakes," are fried mashed potatoes shaped like thick hamburger patties. A hint of seasoning gives them just the right flavor. Pipczynski are slightly different than latke, a more traditional potato-made Jewish food.

"For latke, the potato is shredded and then fried," said Pipczynski.

Also served with the potato pancakes are applesauce. The cool sweetness of the applesauce and the warm, smooth bite of the potato pancake make a delightful combination.

Another dish is yellow and green peppers stuffed with seasoned rice. The large peppers are cut in half and filled with seasoned white rice and chopped mushrooms. Although the pepper is somewhat of an acquired taste, it is crunchy and flavorful. The rice is soft and the seasoning is good enough to lick off the lips.

However, the best part of the meal is the beef.

The bright red prime beef cuts are served with a stewed broth, making it tender and soft.

Students say it is evident that the meat is prepared in a different way than usual or, at the very least, different than the other dc's.

"The meat is better quality over here," said Ed Jaffe, a sophomore who used to help cook at the Kosher dining hall. "It's not like that stuff they preheat and serve at the dc's."

Traditional Jews are allowed to eat beef as long as they don't mix it with dairy and it is prepared properly. The animals used must be free range (not caged) and must not be injected by hormones. A sacrificial prayer must be performed before the animal is slaughtered.

The Kosher dining hall is open to all UMass students with a meal plan. It is open on weekdays from 5 to 7 p.m.

Red Lake Indian nation: isolated and impoverished

By Deborah Hastings
Associated Press

RED LAKE, Minn. — This place and its people have never warmed to outsiders. The Red Lake Band of Chippewa have been here for more than a century, fighting among themselves and others for sovereignty in the cold, hard landscape of northern Minnesota.

They have closed ranks even more tightly since one of their own, a 16-year-old boy, shot to death his grandfather — a beloved, veteran tribal police officer — and then killed eight others, including himself.

"They are a very private people," said Sister Marina Schlangen, who has lived among the 7,000 Chippewa for the past 15 years as development coordinator for St. Mary's Mission, a school, convent and ministry on the edge of the flat, 880-square-mile reservation. "They live in private and they grieve in private."

Life is not easy here. The unemployment rate was estimated in the 2000 Census at 40 percent, but others, including Schlangen, who writes federal grant applications for the reservation, say it may actually be as high as 65 percent.

Many live below the poverty line, dependent on state and federal aid. School test scores rank among the lowest in Minnesota. Drug and alcohol abuse is a crippling problem; there is a treatment center for juveniles here.

The schools here are closed until Tuesday out of respect for the Court rejects bid by parents to save Terri Schiavo's life

By Elliott C. McLaughlin
Associated Press

ATLANTA — For the second time in less than a day, a federal appeals court Wednesday rejected a bid by Terri Schiavo's parents to have her feeding tube re-inserted. Florida lawmakers, meanwhile, debated another last-ditch effort to prolong her life.

In a 10-2 decision, the Atlanta-based U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals refused Bob and Mary Schindler's request for an "expedited rehearing" by the full court. A three-judge panel from the same court ruled against the family earlier Wednesday.

The court did not immediately give an explanation for its decision. The parents have vowed to take their fight to the U.S. Supreme Court, which has refused to get involved previously.

Supporters of the parents grew increasingly dismayed by the developments, and 10 protesters were arrested outside Schiavo's hospice for trying to bring her water. The severely brain-damaged woman's mother pleaded, again, that her daughter be kept alive.

"When I close my eyes at night, all I can see is Terri's face in front of me, dying, starving to death," Mary Schindler said outside the hospice. "Please, someone out there, stop this cruelty. Stop the insanity. Please let my daughter live."

dead, who included five high school students. St. Mary's Mission elementary school, with an enrollment of about 70, is providing grief training this week for its teachers.

"People are so sad here," Schlangen said. "They're just hanging their heads. They stand together in solidarity, but people here just don't talk much. It's just not their culture."

Tribal police and reservation officials have distributed fliers warning against taking pictures or attempting to talk to residents about Jeff Weise, a lonely teenager who killed his grandfather, Daryl Lussier, 58, and the man's girlfriend, and then drove to Red Lake High in his grandfather's patrol car Monday and started shooting.

Along the reservation's main street Wednesday were signs warning, "Exiting this road constitutes trespassing." It is a road that cuts through vast stretches of leafless trees and snow-covered fields, winding along two frozen-over lakes dotted with the occasional ice house. There is a fishery here, and a casino, and a newly built law enforcement center.

Drive five minutes east, and the road opens to vast parcels of little more than winter forest. Single-wide trailers sit far back from the road at long intervals. Small clapboard houses painted in bright shades of green and red and blue rise against a frozen backdrop.

The nearest shopping center and grocery stores are 32 miles south in Bemidji, a hodgepodge of minimalls, car dealers, chain restaurants and a mammoth Wal-Mart.

The Red Lake reservation was founded in 1889, and unlike other tribes, the Chippewa have kept their land intact and not sold off portions of it.

They protect their land from outsiders. In the winter of 2002, tribal conservation officers confiscated the plane of a pilot who landed on the frozen lower lake hoping to sample the phenomenal crappie fishing. It took him more than six weeks of negotiations, $4,000 in fines and $2,000 in legal fees to get his plane back.

But its people have fought each other through the years, culminating in a deadly uprising in 1979 over tribal leadership. Rioters burned down their own government buildings and the home of the tribal chairman. Two teenagers were shot to death.

The tribal court system was beset by allegations of corruption in the 1980s. Chief Tribal Judge George Sumner was shot to death in 1986 by Red Lake band member Gregory Good, who accused the judge of violating residents' civil rights. Good, who claimed self-defense, was acquitted of murder charges by a federal jury.

Like other tribes, the Chippewa erected a casino in the 1990s, hoping it would bring money and jobs. But because of its remote location, some 200 miles north of Minneapolis, the casino has not lifted them out of poverty. Red Lake and two other reservations are trying to build a joint casino in the Twin Cities area, but the effort is mired in political wrangling.

Beltrami County Commissioner Ice Vene knows the reservation and its residents well. "We're very deferential to their pride and their privacy and their culture," he said. "We are very respectful of that."

He added: "We will do whatever we can to help them. "If they want and need it. They are very private people. They are good people. That is simply the way they are."

Schiavo fading with dehydration

Terri Schiavo has not received any nourishment since the tube was pulled Friday afternoon. By late Tuesday, Terri's eyes were sunken, her skin was parched and flaking and her lips and tongue were parched, said Barbara Weller, an attorney for the Schindlers.

Doctors have said she could survive one to two weeks without the feeding tube.

A lawyer for Michael Schiavo said he was "very pleased" by the initial appeals court ruling. But he worried that, as her parents ran out of options, either Gov. Jeb Bush or lawmakers might try again to take Terri Schiavo into their custody and circumvent years of court rulings that support the husband's position. Michael Schiavo argued that his wife has no hope of recovery and would want to die.

"They have no more power than you or I or a person walking down the street to say we have the right to take Terri Schiavo," attorney George Felos said in a state court hearing.

In Tallahassee, the state capital, Bush renewed his call for the Legislature to "spare Terri's life." A lawmaker said Wednesday was the Senate's last chance to pass a bill to keep Schiavo alive.

Sen. Daniel Webster was scrambling to secure votes to pass a bill that would prohibit patients like Schiavo from being denied food and water if they didn't express their wishes in writing. A similar measure brought last week by Webster was defeated 21-16.

Senate Democratic Leader Les Miller said the new bill faced a similar fate to one that was pushed through in 2003 to reconnect the tube six days after it was removed.

"By the time the ink is dry on the governor's signature, it will be declared unconstitutional, just like it was before," Miller said. "So I don't see anything or any language that can persuade my vote."

Meanwhile, President Bush suggested that he and Congress had done their best to help the parents prolong Schiavo's life, and the White House said it has no further legal options.

Terri Schiavo suffered brain damage in 1990 when her heart stopped briefly from a chemical imbalance believed to have been brought on by an eating disorder. Court-appointed doctors say she is in a persistent vegetative state with no hope of recovery.

Her parents and their doctors argue that she could get better and that she would never have wanted to be cut off from food and water.

In their appeal, the Schindlers asked that the full court order the hospice in Florida where Schiavo is staying to immediately transport her to a hospital "for any medical necessary to sustain her life and to re-establish her nutrition and hydration."

"The process of dying by dehydration and starvation is not the euphoric experience (Michael Schiavo) would lead us to believe," the appeal said.

The appeal responded to a 2-1 ruling of the 11th Circuit that said the parents "failed to demonstrate a substantial case on the merits of any of their claims" that the feeding tube should be reinserted immediately.

"There is no denying the absolute tragedy that has befallen Mrs. Schiavo," the ruling by Judges Ed Carnes and Frank M. Hull said. "We all have our own family, our own loved ones, and our own children. However, we are called upon to make a collective, objective decision."

Federal courts were given jurisdiction to review Schiavo's case after Republicans in Congress pushed through unprecedented emergency legislation over the weekend aimed at prolonging Schiavo's life.

Jackson trial judge bars computer sex evidence

SANTA MARIA, Calif. (AP) — Prosecutors presented the jury in Michael Jackson's child molestation trial Wednesday with an avalanche of sexually explicit magazines and videos seized from his home, but lost a bid to include adult material from Internet sites found on the pop star's computers.

Superior Court Judge Rodney Melville said he examined the computer material, and agreed with the defense it may have been automatically stored by the computers and "there wouldn't be any way of knowing if anyone looked at the material or not."

The judge also agreed the material did not appear related to the time period of the alleged crimes.

The ruling came as District Attorney Tom Sneddon put into evidence hundreds of adult magazines, DVDs and photos, but none involving children or bearing DNA from Jackson's accuser or the boy's family.

The day ended with an ambulance being summoned for one of Jackson's attorneys, Brian Oxman, who leaned forward and put his head down at the counsel table after testimony concluded. Jackson and others gathered around, some fanning him, according to a courtroom artist who was still inside at the time.

Oxman was taken to Marian Medical Center. Oxman's wife, Maureen Jaroscak, said he had a touch of pneumonia. The hospital said he was stable and resting comfortably.

In arguing for the computer evidence, the prosecution said technicians isolated material on three computers at Jackson's Neverland ranch that included teen-themed adult Web sites and information about adopting children.

Prosecutor Gordon Auchincloss said he felt the adoption sites related to Jackson's statements in a documentary that he was interested in adopting children.

"We intend to use this evidence to show ... Michael Jackson knows how to use a computer ... that he knows how to access adult materials on Internet sites," he said.

Defense attorney Robert Sanger called the material prejudicial and noted all of it was dated either two years before Jackson met his accuser or several months after his involvement with the child and his family had ended.

Jackson, 46, is accused of molesting a 13-year-old cancer patient at Neverland in February or March 2003. He also is accused of conspiring to hold the boy's family captive to get them to make a video rebutting the 2003 documentary in which he appeared with the boy and said he let children sleep in his bed, though it was innocent and non-sexual.

Sanger said there was no proof Jackson was the person who accessed the Web sites and suggested much of the material was "cached," or automatically saved by the computers, from material that popped up in e-mail when others used the computers.

The judge noted testimony from the young accuser and his brother was not that Jackson operated a computer to show them sexually oriented material. He recalled testimony linked a friend of Jackson, one of several people named as unindicted coconspirators, to showing the material to the boys. —Associated Press

Lombardi denies invite to address SGA

Gargano, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Gargano received a vote of "no confidence" by the SGA earlier in the school year. Bustamante announced he would not work with Gargano on any government issues from that point forward.

Referring to Chancellor's plan, Bustamante said, "I couldn't disagree more... We should have a government that allocates its funds."

Morrison announced that he invited Lombardi to address the SGA at last night's meeting, but Lombardi declined the invitation. However, the chancellor is expected to address his new proposal at tomorrow's Faculty Senate meeting.

"I find it odd that he's not going to talk to students... but he'll talk to tenured professors with degrees," Morrison said.

Morrison criticized Bustamante's plan to combat Lombardi's proposals and questioned whether it would be effective. He told the president that the real problem is that the administration is taking control of problems the SGA has not been working towards solving. He believes this is because the Senate has not affectively been working with the administration.

"[The administration] is not going to work with the SGA if we're acting disrespectful towards them, yet we expect them to still respect us," Morrison said.

He claimed that the administration is armed with lengthy reports detailing their future plans to alter how RSO's are run and this is why the administration can move forward with its plans. Meanwhile, he says the SGA is not prepared for an argument because it has not done enough organization to account for its own agencies.

MEGAN BRINSTER / COLLEGIAN

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante expresses his disagreement with the administration's new plans for the organization of Registered Student Organizations last night.

Bustamante responded to Morrison's claims by accusing him of not taking a clear stance on the issue.

"You sound like you're justifying [the administration's plans] ... then you say you're against it," he said.

Morrison reiterated that he did not agree with most of the administrations plans, but thinks they are extremely prepared to make its case.

"We're severely disadvantaged here and we did a lot of it to ourselves," he said. "We have two weeks to fight an administration with a lot more budgetary power [and resources] than we do."

On the issue of working with the administration, and specifically Gargano, Bustamante informed Morrison that there are "thousands of other administrators" to work with. He added that many of the issues that Morrison claims are holding the SGA back are issues that have presented themselves for a long time.

Other news out of last night's SGA meeting included Morrison's announcement that the University is going ahead with construction of new housing near the Sylvan Residential Area. He said the new housing would be suite style living with 870 beds. The new housing is expected to cost $100 million and should be paid off by a loan with approximately four percent interest over the next 25 years. This is expected to cost the university $4 million per year. He stressed the SGA's involvement with resident housing director Michael Gilbert in the construction process.

"If we're not involved in that conversation with the director of housing, then we're useless," he said

Girl arrested for taking Parthenon rock

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — Greek authorities arrested and charged a 16-year-old Canadian girl who allegedly took a piece of marble from the grounds of the 2,500-year-old Parthenon while posing for a photograph.

Madelaine Giere, of Vancouver Island, British Columbia, was arrested Sunday after a security guard saw her picking up a stone near the ancient monument on Acropolis Hill. Giere was charged with illegally possessing antiquities.

Investigating magistrate Melpomeni Chiotou ordered Giere released from custody Tuesday and said she could leave the country, pending trial, court officials said. No trial date was set.

The charges carry a maximum of 10 years in prison, though such severe sentences are rarely imposed.

"The fact that I was in prison was scary. I've never done anything like that before," Giere told The Associated Press after her release.

Giere said she picked up a stone measuring about 5 inches-by-5 inches to pose for a photograph on a school trip.

"I was thinking I would put the rock back where it was and it would all be dropped ... They said it was marble but it was a yellow color and dirty and dusty and just looked like a rock," Giere said.

She said she would return to Greece to stand trial if she could get time off from school.

"I love the atmosphere, I love the people, everyone's so nice," she said. —Associated Press

A Lesson in Responsibility

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

This is not an article about Chancellor Lombardi's horrendous abuse of the Diversity Commission's recommendations for campus integration. It is not an article about his avoidance of all substantive reforms or his fanning of the flames of discontent among minority and non-minority groups through his own backward initiatives. While this article involves all these important points, its principal investigation involves a story of betrayal and the overstepping of mandated boundaries. The theme of this story is one of responsibility. I write this article now because soon I may no longer be permitted such a candid investigation in the pages of The Collegian.

Our story begins in 1999 when Dr. Lombardi, then president of the University of Florida, resigned under pressure after referring to the incoming black Chancellor Adam Herbert as an "Oreo." Three years later, the out-going UMass President Bulger nominated Lombardi for the university chancellorship. A proven fundraiser of remarkable ability, Chancellor Lombardi has accomplished some important goals for the university, despite the painful budget cuts that have been passed down from Beacon Hill during his tenure.

He has also demonstrated, however, that such encouraging results often come at the expense of favoring a university which is easy on alumni eyes over one that is in service of the students. Some of his more infamous moments include the appointing of Mike Gargano as Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, his support of the discriminatory $65 SEVIS fee for international students, and now, possibly, the Diversity Commission debacle.

I encourage the student body to feel betrayed by the actions of our chancellor ... His first and foremost responsibility must be to the students.

Ostensibly, the Diversity Commission was one of the chancellor's responsible initiatives to the Umass community. It sought to investigate a very real and serious issue in campus life and then prescribe a permanent institutional remedy. Yet Lombardi's action plan, based on the commission's recommendations, has raised more than a few eyebrows and brought about questions on the presence of a pre-meditated agenda for which the Commission was little more than a pricey façade.

The Diversity Commission found that many students and faculty feel "racially or ethnically isolated," and identified a "climate of distrust" on campus. It suggested that dialogues be opened, resources dedicated to inclusion, and a senior level administrator in charge of inclusion and diversity activities at the university. Yet Lombardi's proposal has almost no connection whatsoever to the Commission recommendations.

Instead, his actions indicate that he either decided to disregard the report, didn't read it at all, or simply initiated the Diversity Commission in the first place with a set of university reforms in mind that he now intends to carry out. These reforms seek to undo decades of students' work in constructing our own political and economic base for power within the university and the wider community. They take funding and direction of RSOs, student businesses, WMUA, The Collegian, and the ALANA caucus out of the hands of the students and put them under administrative direction in the Office of Student Affairs and Campus Life.

The reforms do not, however, include any of the provisions mentioned in the Diversity Commission findings for improving the defunct racial culture on campus. Whereas the Commission recognized a lack of leadership in resolving the problem and not organizational shortcomings, Lombardi is intent on restructuring student organizations without making any changes in leadership. The chancellor even went so far as to blame ALANA students for not integrating well into the larger Umass community and suggested that minority students seek higher representation figures in such campus bodies as the obsolete honors program in Commonwealth College.

This is yet another example of this conservative university administration encroaching upon the political power and collective rights of the students. It is an increasingly troublesome threat, especially when it becomes as undisguised and shameless as it is in this case. The action plan was cunningly unveiled as we all went on break and is scheduled to take effect the day after current SGA President Eduardo Bustamante leaves office.

I encourage the student body to feel betrayed by the actions of our chancellor, since they indicate that the students are not his top priority. His first and foremost responsibility must be to the students, as we are the reason for the existence of this university. We should be the base for every decision made.

We must retain control over our own organizations as students, and not let a digressive administration take away what should be taken for granted.

I fully encourage Chancellor Lombardi to further his fundraising credentials while here at Umass — in fact, I demand it — but never at the expense of what is most important. As long as his proposal floats — and students and faculty have until April 1 to voice our concerns — diversity will remain a virtual non-issue and the administration's power over the students and our organizations will be sorrowfully reminiscent of more ancient times in higher education.

Quarter million for your anguish

Peter Foundas

Legal liability reform is a subject of scrutiny and dialogue on Capitol Hill currently. One specific issue creating much recent debate has been the issue of capping awards for pain and suffering — also referred to as non-economic damages — awarded to plaintiffs in medical malpractice cases. Specifically, the cap has been proposed to be set at the $250,000 level, prohibiting a jury from awarding any amount higher for pain and suffering deemed to have been caused by any doctors' mistakes and/or negligence.

The major force driving this push for legislative action is insurance. The theory is that large jury settlements lead to higher malpractice insurance premiums for doctors. These higher premiums lead to higher health care costs, which in turn lead to higher personal health insurance premiums. Furthermore, with the constant threat of lawsuits hanging over the heads of doctors, physicians practice what is called "defensive medicine." What is meant by this term is that doctors order unnecessary tests and exams as extra precautions so as to avoid being sued later on.

The shear lack of evidence to support these claims has not stopped proponents from making the argument to the American people. While logic and fact stand in the way of supporting such unsubstantiated premises, certain members of Congress and the President have attempted to sway public opinion in favor of these reforms.

In a study by the National Practitioner Data Bank that appeared in Business Week on March 3, 2003, "Malpractice payouts by physicians and their insurers were a mere $4.5 billion in 2001 — less than 1 percent of the country's overall health care costs of $1.4 trillion ... In 2001, only 895 out of 16,676 payouts, or about 5 percent, topped $1 million." Surely there are other places to begin cutting costs.

In a speech given in Little Rock, Ark. on Jan. 26, 2004 President Bush made it clear that he blames lawsuits for the rising costs of health care.

"I'm here to talk about one of the reasons why health care costs are going up. And that's the fact that we've got too many darn lawsuits, too many frivolous and junk lawsuits that are affecting people. I'm here to make sure that we talk in a way that says to the people of Arkansas and America that we need medical liability reform to make sure that medicine is affordable and available," Bush said.

The court system in America has evolved over time, developing a learned array of jurists and case law. Are we now to take our faith out of our court system? Are we to believe that our judges and juries cannot decide what is legitimate doctor malpractice? Are we to arbitrarily cap the awards to victims, with no regard to their individual circumstances? The language the president uses seems to say this exactly. The full facts of large settlements are rarely fully disclosed. Instead, a bigger deal is made over the money awarded to the victim, rather than the horrors and harm done to the people involved.

The cap of $250,000 on so-called non-economic damages of pain and suffering has no basis. This arbitrary limit can't possibly be meant to put a dollar value on the life of a lost loved one

Furthermore, according to a study done by the Department of Justice Bureau of Justice Statistics, "The overall win rate for medical malpractice plaintiffs (27 percent) was about half of that found among plaintiffs in all tort trials (52 percent)."

The cap of $250,000 on so-called non-economic damages of pain and suffering has no basis. This arbitrary limit can't possibly be meant to put a dollar value on the life of a lost loved one, or come close to par with the lifetime of suffering a person could be forced to endure as a result of a botched operation. Nor could the $250,000 amount possibly give any solace to grieving parents who have to provide a lifetime of care for a baby that was born with severe brain damage due to a doctor's negligence.

The argument that high insurance premiums drive doctors out of practicing medicine is serious. Why is the first remedy then to cap awards to victims? These are the people who have suffered at the hands of unqualified doctors. Why isn't the remedy to be found in passing legislation capping the rates insurance companies can charge to doctors and patients? This could directly cut health care costs. Why not take direct action that is assured to obtain a cost cutting result, instead of hoping that punishing victims with limited awards may bring down costs?

Insurance companies have large reserves of cash, as they take in premiums from customers. They pay out claims as they come, but all insurers use probability to make their money. Under normal circumstances they will take in far more from customers than they pay out in claims. The cash reserves they hold go into banks and investing instruments. With interest rates being very low in the past few years, returns for these insurance companies have dipped severely, cutting into profits. The way the insurance companies have dealt with this reduced return on investments is to raise premiums. A cap on those rates would clearly and directly lead to lower health care costs.

The fact that the president supports such proposed malpractice reform speaks volumes as to whom he truly represents. The only group directly benefiting from these proposed caps would be the insurance industry. How could the solution to the nation's health care crisis come in the form of limited liability for doctors and insurers? Money can never bring back a loved one or ameliorate the harm done to a victim, but the money does punish negligent doctors.

When no action can undo the horrors of a doctor's mistake, the one remedy a victim can seek is to have his or her day in court. Let a judge and jury decide what compensation is appropriate for victims, as they are the ones who will be examining all facts of a case, and all circumstances surrounding the victim. No standard cap could ever be justified, especially not when the promised results from a cap — lower health care costs — will never materialize.

A line in the sand

Bret Devereaux

A lot of discussion has been given lately to the various merits and demerits of the Bush Administration's foreign policy agenda, and it has become apparent that many people see no discernable goal for the nation in that foreign policy agenda. It is essential in a debate about the merits of a program to understand precisely what the program is trying to accomplish. Thus, the following:

The first thing to understand is that Bush is following in the footsteps of Ronald Reagan, much as his father did. Reagan brought to the foreground the beginnings of what has become the neo-conservative movement, the political school of thought which Bush Jr. claims to belong. The neo-conservatives are the driving ideological force in the Republican Party today, and you can't really understand U.S. foreign policy without understanding the neo-conservative world-view.

The neo-conservatives see the world as split roughly into two camps: those nations that are Western democracies in the American tradition and those that are not. Adherence to Western democratic ideals becomes the independent variable in their analysis of the world and of history.

The overall goal of American foreign policy has always been to keep the United States as safe as possible. In the neo-conservative viewpoint, nothing is safer than another democracy. In every major American conflict, the opponent has not been what one would call democratic, be it either the British aristocracy run via parliament in the 18th and early 19th centuries, the Southern aristocracy of the Confederacy, the German-Prussia and Austro-Hungarian autocracy in the early 20th century, or the communist dictatorships in the mid and late 20th century.

The neo-conservatives observe that as more people are enfranchised and informed, specifically those classes who are more likely to be drafted into wars, the likelihood of a government going to war decreases. Being informed is important, as a populace that is free to vote but not to learn might as well be slaves.

In turn democracies are far less likely, in the views of the neo-conservatives, to be breeding grounds of terrorism. Comparing the United States and Iran is a good example. In the United States, when the economy goes sour, we elect a different president, one that will attempt a different solution. In Iran, the Ayatollah declares the economy is the fault of the "Great Satan" (The United States) and the "Little Satan" (Israel). His opinion is the only one allowed to be aired. Contrary opinions are silenced. It is in this environment, the neo-conservatives say, that terrorism is born, breeds, and grows ripe.

Thus, the key to making America safe is not hunting down individual terrorist networks, but instead instituting Western democracies where such networks cannot thrive in the first place. The goal is not so much to exterminate all the terrorists one by one, like stomping ants coming out of an anthill; the goal is to simply remove the anthill to remove the ants, and keep the garden free of them. The approach is analogous to the progressive idea of reforming inner cities instead of making tougher laws in order to curb crime.

So it follows, that the Bush Administration, following it's own neo-conservative ideology, has decided to draw a proverbial line in the sand, between "us," the free lands of the world, and "them," the tyrannies.

What the Bush Administration wants is a world of democracies, because it believes that in such a world, America will be safe and will thrive. Current events in the Middle East, demonstrations in Lebanon, rumblings in Syria, unrest in Iran, elections in Iraq, Afghanistan and now, unprompted, in Egypt may end up bearing the Administration out. Democracy seems to be the inevitable trend simply because it is a more effective form of government than autocracy or aristocracy.

Quotent quotables: the resurrection

Matt Brochu

Freshmen year, I was the undisputed champion of the United States of AOL Instant Messenger. Can you remember a time in your life when you could balance 11 articulate AIM conversations (one with your roommate four feet away), while simultaneously writing a paper, eating a hot pocket, and playing a game of Kings with the girls across the hall, and without making a typo or pissing off the thumbmaster? I didn't think so. And to make things more impressive, I don't even type "the right way." I hunt and peck and I'm damn good at it. Think about it. It's like Pedro Martinez putting up the numbers he did in the late 90's with no thumbs. I think you get my point.

Five years later, I'm just a shadow of the former AIM stud that used to grace my trusty computer chair 10 hours a day. I can't handle more than three IM's at once without having a seizure, and it's getting to the point where I would kill for the ability to put people on hold like a crappy customer service hotline (you know, with a looped message and a soothing "Ace of Base" song). "Please hold. Your IM is very important to us at 738 Main Street. A member of the apartment should be available to 'holla' in a few moments ... all that she wants is another baby, she's gone tomorrow boy..."

The AIM profile problem has become contagious, spreading faster than Mono at a beer pong tournament where the losers have to take part in a huge orgy.

A little over a year ago, I devoted an entire column to profile quotes in hopes that I might help rid the world of the cheesy, over-used quotes we're all subjected to on a daily basis. Well, that didn't work. The AIM profile problem has become contagious, spreading faster than Mono at a beer pong tournament where the losers have to take part in a huge orgy. Unfortunately for some of the people on my buddy list, unlike Mono, this sickness doesn't help you drop 25 pounds in three weeks. So I guess I'll try this again.

Warning: The following quotes should never appear in an AIM profile, because, well, they make me throw up in my mouth.

"You're only as strong as the cocktails you make, the tables you dance on, and the friends you hold on to." — Unknown

I always feel left out with this one, just because it doesn't really apply to dudes. So allow me to write a masculine version (Jersey Shore Edition): "You're only as strong as the cheap cologne you bathe in, the pick-up lines you throw at chicks dancing on tables, and the gel that makes your hair look like a hedgehog."

"We're at a four-year party and it's almost last call." — Unknown Senior.

Everyone likes a good metaphor, so let's continue this one. If college is a party, then after you graduate, you must either 1) Go home with the random chick you met while waiting in line for the bathroom, vomit in the bushes outside your apartment, and pass out while fumbling around with her bra, 2) Go home, order Dominoes and stiff the delivery guy, or 3) Go home, pick a fight with your ex-girlfriend on AIM, and put up an away message like this: "So upseg. wikcde durnk goo nghit."

"A smile is a curve that can straighten anything out." — Unknown.

So if I smile at Willy from "Real World: Philadelphia," he'll suddenly be attracted to women?

"Ilu" or "imu" or both — Like it even matters It wasn't enough for you to publicly express your feelings for your boyfriend at the Monkey Bar, twice on the dance floor and once at the bar, so you decided to take it up a notch with some profile love. But you know your friends (or at least the cool ones) will make fun of you for this. The solution? Join America's new abbreviation craze.

After all, you can watch an episode of CSI on your HDTV with special guest J-Lo and a commercial for the Subaru STi (Beep beep! All aboard the Genitalwartsmobile!). But guess what? We don't need John Nash's beautiful mind to break your retarded little code. So wait, "ilu" means "I love you"? And all this time we thought someone tricked you into joining a fake sorority.

"Dance like no one's watching. Work like you don't need the money, etc..." — Unknown.

Screw that. Dance like Napoleon Dynamite. Dance like my roommate after he's heard that Bjork is coming out with a new CD. Dance like Eric Nies in cut-off jean shorts on MTV's "The Grind" in 1993. And while you're at it, burp like you didn't just eat that plateful of garlic knots. Hook up like your roommate isn't on the bottom bunk. Write a bunch of useless personal crap in your profile like no one will read it.

On second thought, don't.

A lowdown on the facts ...tions in 'Fahrenheit 9/11'

By Sumana Chatterjee and David Goldstein
Knight Ridder

WASHINGTON — Michael Moore's film "Fahrenheit 9/11" has been called many things: incendiary, thought-provoking, satirical, propaganda.

But is it true?

That's a question millions of viewers are asking. Over the weekend, the number of screens showing the film doubled, from 868 to 1,725.

Political commentators already have weighed in. Detractors of President Bush have praised the film for its scathing view of the way he's handled the war on terrorism. Supporters of the president say Moore has used the facts selectively to distort the record.

A close viewing of the film and a review of the record provide a more nuanced picture. Many of the details Moore uses to slam Bush are true. Others are partially true and open to interpretation. Some are clearly false.

In one of the film's most controversial sequences, Moore shows the president at an elementary school in Florida on Sept. 11. Two planes have crashed into the World Trade Center towers, and Bush is sitting in front of second-grade students reading "My Pet Goat." His chief of staff, Andrew Card, comes in about 9:05 a.m. and whispers in his ear. Card was telling Bush, we later learned, "America is under attack."

The president appears frozen. The movie slows the frames, which exaggerates each movement. Bush remains in the classroom for seven minutes before leaving to talk to his staff about the attacks. Moore suggests the president's possible thoughts during those minutes: Should I have vacationed less and worked more? Should I have listened to anti-terrorism experts warning of an al-Qaida attack?

The commission investigating the Sept. 11 attacks and the government's response interviewed Bush. The commission staff said in an interim report that the president "felt he should project strength and calm until he could better understand what was happening."

The report says nothing about what Bush's staff did while he was in the classroom, but notes that "as far as we know no one was in contact with the Pentagon." The president's motorcade left the school at 9:35 a.m., and Bush talked with Vice President Dick Cheney for the first time at 9:45 a.m.

According to the interim report, the government's response to what had happened at the World Trade Center and to two other hijackings was in disarray during the period that Bush was at the school. Two F-15 fighter planes had taken off at 8:53 a.m., but their pilots didn't have clear orders on what to do or where to go and were in a holding pattern off Long Island, N.Y.

Sometime between 9:21 and 9:25 a.m., the Federal Aviation Administration realized that a third plane, American Airlines Flight 77, had been hijacked. That plane would strike the Pentagon at 9:37 a.m., the commission reported.

A few minutes later, air traffic controllers heard screaming aboard United Airlines 93 and determined that it also had been hijacked. It was

Savor food, but do it in moderation

By Kristen Kauffman
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS— Is your love of food making you fat? Maybe your problem is that you don't love food enough, says best-selling author Mireille Guiliano, whose book "French Women Don't Get Fat" (Knopf, $22) tells women how to enjoy eating like the French and lose weight at the same time.

Even with all those rich cream sauces, cheeses and sinful desserts? Oui, says Guiliano, who's touring to promote her book. Deprivation doesn't work. The key is savoring the tastes and smells of a good meal, eaten with family and friends, rather than wolfing down fast food in the car, in front of the TV or over a laptop.

"I watch people in airports sitting and multitasking and eating, and there is no pleasure," she says. "Food is something we respect, and we have to take the time."

In our fast-paced culture, it can seem impossible to find time to cook a full sit-down meal and eat it slowly. However, some transplanted Texans from France say they are able to maintain their weight by holding on to their French food rituals.

North Oak Cliff resident and French native Pierrette Lacour, 55, came to the United States 30 years ago and raised her children here. She says she stays thin because she cooks her own meals and enjoys them with friends. Each week, she shops for seasonal vegetables, sets her table with her best china, silver and crystal and hosts a festive meal for eight.

"Eating shouldn't be just to feed yourself, but a time to share food, conversation, feelings, and that way you can control what you intake," says Lacour. "I hate eating alone."

She says the dinner doesn't take her very long to cook in her small kitchen, she whips up a grilled fish or meat with a simple sauce, perhaps a gratin, a potage of pureed vegetables, some fresh fruit and a dessert, and she gets it all done in less than an hour using simple cooking techniques. She says she's not a fabulous cook, but her friends are always amazed.

"Cooking is very important. it's all about enjoyment," says Lacour. Many Americans "satisfy their hunger and that's it, but there's more to life than to satisfy your basic needs."

Guiliano urges women to look at when and why they overeat, part of what she calls "recasting."

She says the decision to lose weight shouldn't be about fear or self-loathing, but should come out of a desire to enjoy life, and food, more. For example, pampering yourself with a well-prepared meal instead of polishing off a bag of chips is more pleasurable, and better for you.

Many of the tips in the book aren't rocket science; you've probably heard most of them before: drink more water, take smaller portions, exercise a little more, eat fresh fruits and vegetables, and indulge yourself every now and then so you don't feel deprived.

"I had lunch with a socialite doing the Atkins diet, and I felt very sad, what a life, all she talks about is the diet," said Guiliano, who is the CEO of winemaker Clicquot Inc. "My book is common sense and nothing drastic. It doesn't tell you, 'Don't eat this' and 'Don't eat that.' "

Guiliano says that if a Frenchwoman wants to have a dessert, she'll have it. She says Frenchwomen know they can indulge themselves occasionally as long as they make up for it with an overall balance of calories.

"A Frenchwoman might have the whole dessert, but in her head she'll say, 'OK, yogurt for breakfast, salad for lunch,' " she says of the mind-set. "It becomes automatic."

Guiliano says daily walking is another key ingredient in the French lifestyle — and again, the goal is enjoyment rather than strictly weight loss.

"If you love the gym, then that's what you love, but move your butt," she says laughing. "The easiest, least expensive exercise is walking. The benefit of being outside, an inner conversation, looking at beauty – adding 15 minutes a day in walking can make a difference."

Some of the pointers in the book may not sit well with everyone. Guiliano, also a director of Champagne Veuve Clicquot, recommends drinking wine with meals and introducing children to wine at a young age. (She herself tasted her first Champagne at age 6.)

She also writes a lot about eating yogurt and leeks for weight control, but what do you do if you don't like them? That's OK, she says. She doesn't expect readers to do everything in the book, but rather to choose the things that make sense to them.

"You're not going to lose 50 pounds in a week. You're going to learn a new lifestyle," she says. "I'm saying, 'Here are a hundred little tips. Pick two or three things that work in your lifestyle and see what happens.' "

Pierrette Lacour hosts one of her dinner parties, which she holds on a weekly basis. Lacour says fear of gaining weight is unhealthy.

Her first mistake was jumping into his bed on their first date; her second mistake was falling in love with him a year later.

Her third mistake was waiting so long to involve me.

This painful saga began when I decided to introduce the both of them to each other without hesitance. However, when sparks actually did fly, I left her with one single warning: "Careful, he's not the marrying type." I winked at my girlfriend and she smiled as if she understood.

But did she really understand? No, of course not. In the days that followed her first mistake, she was surprised to find herself back at his house enjoying the simple pleasures that he had to offer. Their conversations were brief, but their chemistry remained lengthy.

"I thought this was supposed to be a one night kind-of thing," she said. "I mean, what could he possibly want from me now? Why does he keep calling me back? It's so strange; he defies every guy I've ever known!"

I suddenly realized the severity of her thoughts and replied, "I know this guy very well. Please believe that he is enjoying the convenience of great sex. He is incapable of having a relationship, and nothing good will come out of you expecting more from him."

It was sad but true. Unfortunately, these few words caused more damage than I had anticipated. She was determined to change this notorious player into a man.

In the months to follow, she played her game perfectly. She never called him, she had no expectations, and she never asked questions. She made decisions based on her libido, rather than her heart. But she was secretly falling for him. Although they were dating other people, they found themselves in each others arms more often than not. I was almost convinced that he was feeling for her also. Yet still, there lacked a certain depth to their unbelievable connection. It took them half a year to hold a full conversation, eight months to enjoy a simple breakfast together, and ten months for her to admit she might have feelings for him.

I happened to be there just in time.

"It's time I tell him, he needs to know how I feel. I don't think he knows I care about him as much as I do." She was begging me to agree with her decision.

"I don't think that's a very wise idea. You could potentially scare him off and be left with nothing. Timing is everything, and I just don't think he's ready."

I felt terrible because I was right. And she knew I was right. And she knew she had less than an hour to pull herself together before he showed up.

We had a party to go to, and he offered to drive. I gave her a big hug and said, "Just be patient, girl! Continue to play your game and it will happen when he's ready to initiate this conversation. And only go through all of this trouble if he's really worth it." She took a deep breath to push away her tears and nodded as if she had heard me.

But she didn't. Later that night I found them both outside on the porch. She was crying softly, and he was petting her head to calm her down. She stood up quickly and walked me back inside.

"I told him...I didn't mean to but I couldn't help it. He didn't want to hear it, though. He got cold with me the moment I brought it up, and now it's over. I ruined everything!"

She burst out into tears and headed toward her car. "You okay to drive?" I asked. "Yeah, I'll be fine. I just need to go to bed." She wiped her nose and hugged me goodbye.

Moments later, when her car was far enough away from the house, I went to find him. He was nowhere in sight. I started to worry if he too could be upset, so I ran around the house to find him. The house was packed with dozens of people, leaving little room for quick movement and rescue efforts.

Suddenly, there he was, on the couch, chatting up a woman I had never seen before. He was playing with her hair, laughing at her jokes, and completely emotionless to the events of the night. I rolled my eyes in his direction and left the party myself. I guess I am relieved she found her answer sooner than later. It really is impossible to turn a player into a man.

More fact questions for Michael Moore headed to Washington and gaining speed.

What happened next is still contested. The Sept. 11 panel reviewed tapes and flight and radar data, and conducted hundreds of interviews. It found that while Bush read the children's book, air traffic controllers wondered if the military had been asked to intercept the plane and who had the authority to shoot down planes. By the time the plane crashed into a Pennsylvania field at 10:03 a.m., no one at the FAA had asked the military's help to stop the aircraft, according to the panel.

Though the president emphasized to the commission that he authorized the military to shoot down the hijacked planes, there's no record of that conversation. Cheney said the president authorized the shoot orders in a brief conversation shortly after 10 a.m., not in time to intercept the planes headed to Washington.

The commission's interim report reaches no conclusion about the president's actions.

Moore says the administration allowed 142 Saudi Arabian nationals, including about two dozen relatives of Osama bin Laden, to leave the United States after Sept. 11 without proper questioning by law enforcement agencies. In the film, Craig Unger, author of the book "House of Bush, House of Saud," tells Moore that none of the Saudis underwent serious scrutiny.

"So a little interview, check the passport, what else?" Moore asks.

"Nothing," Unger replies.

Moore made headlines with his anti-Bush documentary 'Fahrenheit 9/11'. While largely factual, some question the films statements.

The Sept. 11 commission's interim report said law enforcement interviewed 30 of the 142 Saudis, including 22 of the 26 people on the flight that took most of the bin Laden relatives out of the country. The report said none was of interest to the investigation.

It says Saudi Arabia asked for help to get its nationals out of the United States. Because 15 of the 19 hijackers were Saudi citizens, the Saudi government was worried about reprisals.

The commission says it doesn't know whom in the administration the Saudi government contacted, but that the request eventually reached Richard Clarke, who was the White House counterterrorism chief at the time. Clarke told the commission he refused to approve the request, suggesting that it be sent to the FBI so the agency could vet the Saudis for any terrorism connections. He said the FBI approved the flights.

However, an FBI spokeswoman denied to The Hill, a newspaper that covers Congress, that it had "anything to do with arranging and clearing the flights." She said the bureau interviewed some passengers, but none was "of investigative interest."

Despite some media reports, the movie doesn't allege that the Saudis were allowed to leave while U.S. airspace was still closed.

Connections among the Bushes, the Saudis and the bin Ladens

The movie paints a sinister connection between Bush and the bin Laden family. It implies that James Bath, a friend from the president's days in the Texas Air National Guard, might have funneled bin Laden money to an unsuccessful Bush oil-drilling firm called Arbusto Energy.

The accusation is a stretch, said Bill Allison, the managing editor for the Center for Public Integrity, an independent watchdog group based in Washington.

"We looked into bin Laden money going into Arbusto, and we never found anything to back that up," Allison said.

The center's investigations into Bush's years in Texas found that Bath managed the assets in Houston of Salem bin Laden, Osama's oldest brother. Bath also invested $50,000 in Arbusto in 1977 and 1978. There's no evidence that the money came from the Saudis, Allison said.

Moore further hints that a relationship between the Bush and bin Laden families was forged through their common involvement in the Carlyle Group, a Washington-based private equity firm heavily invested in the defense industry.

President Bush's father, the first President Bush, served as a senior adviser and board member to the Carlyle Group. James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, has been a partner. The current President Bush was a board member of a Carlyle subsidiary in the 1990s, but withdrew in 1994 when he became governor of Texas.

The bin Laden family, whose wealth comes primarily from its Middle East construction company, invested in the Carlyle Group in 1994, then withdrew in late October 2001, after the terrorist attacks.

The bin Laden family's investment in Carlyle has been reported as $2 million, a small fraction of the billions that the group manages.

Most bin Laden family members reportedly severed ties to Osama years ago.

Moore says the administration used the threat of terrorism to make Americans willing to give up some civil liberties, but that Attorney General John Ashcroft "turned a blind eye and deaf ear" to fighting terrorism before Sept. 11.

While the administration disagrees with that assessment, former FBI director Louis Freeh told the Sept. 11 commission that fighting terrorism "was not a national priority." From 2000 to 2002, "we asked for 1,895 people, more agents, linguists and analysts. We got a total of 76" during that time, Freeh said.

The commission is expected to issue harsh criticisms of Ashcroft's anti-terrorism efforts before the attacks.

Moore criticizes Congress for quickly passing a sweeping anti-terrorism bill known as the USA Patriot Act, without reading it. The law gave broad powers to federal law enforcement to eavesdrop on individuals, detain and deport immigrants, and coordinate with intelligence agencies.

While it's impossible to know whether lawmakers read the bill, it's true that Congress short-circuited the usual legislative process and passed it in less than a week.

Moore charges that the Bush administration has cut veterans benefits. In 2003, the administration proposed to increase health-care spending for the Veterans Affairs Department over the previous year. Veterans' groups argued that it wasn't enough, particularly at a time when soldiers were in combat and would need health care when they were discharged. Congress wanted to add more money to the budget, but the administration opposed a higher increase.

The administration did cut services to higher-income veterans whose disabilities weren't connected to military service. It also proposed charging veterans higher co-pays for prescription drugs.

Citing The Washington Post, Moore says Bush spent 42 percent of his first eight months as president on vacation. The Post calculated the numbers in early August 2001 as Bush embarked on a month-long "working vacation" at his Texas ranch, according to administration officials at the time.

The president's supporters say Moore failed to note that Bush met with advisers and other officials and was briefed on issues.

Mark Knoller, a veteran CBS Radio White House correspondent and unofficial chronicler of presidential trips, said in an interview that his own numbers from the first eight months of 2001 show that Bush spent all or part of 50 days at his Texas ranch; all or part of 40 days at Camp David, the presidential retreat in rural Maryland; and all or part of four days at his family's vacation home in Kennebunkport, Maine.

That works out to nearly 59 percent of his first eight months in the White House.

Moore suggests that one of the first official acts of Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who took office after the United States toppled the hard-line Islamic Taliban regime following the Sept. 11 attacks because it was sheltering bin Laden, was to help seal a deal for the California-based oil conglomerate Unocal to build an oil pipeline from the Caspian Sea through Afghanistan to the Indian Ocean. It alleges that Karzai had been a Unocal consultant.

A Unocal spokesman denies it. "Karzai was never, in any capacity, an employee, consultant or a consultant of a consultant," Barry Lane said. He said Unocal also never had a plan to build a Caspian Sea pipeline.

What's true in the movie is that Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan, was a Unocal consultant in the mid-1990s, Lane said.

Pearl is coaching a gem

By Lori Shontz
Knight Ridder

MILWAUKEE, Wis. — The first time Wisconsin-Milwaukee coach Bruce Pearl went to the NCAA Tournament, he almost wasn't invited back.

More accurate, he was nearly kicked out.

Back in 1981, when Pearl was an administrative assistant for Boston College, he was pressed into service for the Eagles' first-round NCAA game against Ball State when the "real" mascot got sick. With all the enthusiasm of a young guy trying to claw his way to the top, he spotted a stepladder in the gym, dragged it behind a basket, climbed it and entertained the fans by flapping his wings over the top of the backboard.

Then he was hustled out by security, and the NCAA convened a meeting to discuss whether Eddie the Eagle should be allowed to attend the second-round game against Wake Forest. Fast talking by Boston College officials saved him.

"They explained, 'This is a brand new mascot. He doesn't know how to be a mascot. He didn't even go to mascot training school,'" Pearl said Monday as he held court for the biggest media gathering to grace Wisconsin-Milwaukee practice facility. "The NCAA said, 'Well, look, you tell that eagle no more ladders. And if he even thinks for one second it might be inappropriate, it's inappropriate.'"

In the ensuing decades, Pearl, 45, has figured out how to behave in the postseason. In nine seasons at Southern Indiana, his teams advanced to the NCAA Division II tournament nine times, finishing second in 1994 and first in 1995. In four seasons at UWM, he has won 84 games and advanced to the NCAA Tournament twice.

And now his 12th-seeded Panthers are the lowest seeded team to advance to the Sweet 16, where they will face top-ranked Illinois in Rosemont, Ill., on Thursday night.

He never promised to reach such heights when he arrived at UWM in 2001. But forward Adrian Tigert — who was considering transferring, because the coach who recruited him, Bo Ryan, left before he played a single game — knew from the get-go that Pearl had high expectations.

"He told me, 'They're tickled pink because they won 15 games last year,'" Tigert remembered. "He said, 'I can't imagine what they're going to be like when we start winning 20.' That's a direct quote."

Pearl prides himself on becoming a part of the community; he calls his decision to leave Southern Indiana after nine seasons, not his decision to accuse Illinois of offering recruit Deon Thomas cash and a Chevrolet Blazer, the hardest decision of his career. In that vein, earlier this season, he had the players station themselves in the lobby of the U.S. Cellular Center, where they play, and thank the fans for attending.

Illinois coach Bruce Weber, a UWM alum, called Pearl's ability to attract fans amazing. "Twenty years ago, you could just go for free, just walk in and sit where you wanted," Weber said.

Yes, Weber was one of those fans.

Pearl is eager, too, to put his players in the spotlight, although he knows that he can't prevent the Thomas stories from surfacing again. Not with such a high-profile game against Illinois, which has plenty of fans who have never forgiven Pearl for bringing about an investigation that resulted in some NCAA penalties.

"I'd kind of like it to go away — it's so old, it happened 16 years ago," Pearl said. "I'll tell you, the story line today is UW-Milwaukee going to the Sweet 16. The fact that no 12-seed has ever beaten a 1-seed ... we're trying to do something that's never been done, we're trying to make history."

The ever-helpful Pearl provided a handful of alternate story lines, all of which have merit:

Senior guard Ed McCants, the Horizon League player of the year, who Monday finally received an invitation to attend the NBA's predraft camp at Portsmouth. And his fellow first-team all-conference teammate, Josh Tucker, who was MVP of the conference tournament.

McCants, particularly, is attracting attention. "There's friends I don't think I've ever met before making phone calls. I have no clue how they get my number," he said. "But it's all out of love."

Chicago natives Chris Hill, Boo Davis and Mark Pancratz. "These kids were not your first-team all-staters, they were second-team and third-team, although Mark did win a state championship," Pearl said. "They're going up against, I don't want to say their idols, but guys they definitely looked up to as great players."

Tigert is shooting 100 percent in the NCAA Tournament. He's 11-for-11, and he also made the biggest shot of the Panthers' season, hitting a free throw with 4.2 seconds remaining to give UWM a 59-58 victory over Detroit in the Horizon Conference championship game.

But none of the players has Pearl's force of personality. Pearl lifts weights with his players, he relished his appearance Monday morning on ESPN radio's Mike and Mike show ("those guys are awesome") and although he understands how the spotlight of the NCAA Tournament changes perceptions, he can still laugh at it.

"Am I a better coach now because my team's in the Sweet 16 than I was three weeks ago?" he asked. "Maybe I'm perceived to be a better coach, but I'm not. What would make me better in three weeks? Any more learned? Any more wise? Are my players better than they were three weeks ago?"

He has continued to motivate his team with tales of David and Goliath, explaining: "I just know that when David took the field, he wasn't afraid to fall. And at the mid-major level, you've got so much pressure on you in the regular season, because one slip up, you're done, it's over."

Pearl said that's why the Panthers have won 18 of their past 19 games. Many of those were conference games they needed to win to put themselves into the best possible position for the conference tournament. Others, of course, were in the tournament, which they needed to win to advance to the NCAA Tournament.

"The kids play with a lot of pressure," he said. "The pressure's not there anymore. Now it's 40 minutes of basketball, and anything can happen."

Josh Tucker of the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, this year's Cinderella, soared for a layup against Alabama in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

Duquette effected by steroids

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Dan Duquette brought Jose Canseco to the Boston Red Sox before steroids were banned from baseball and knows how dangerous they could be.

Late last year, his nephew lost a childhood friend, a college student who was allegedly shot to death by a steroid user. So he's pleased that major league players are taking steps to curtail their use. And he criticized Canseco, who advocated steroid use in his book, "Juiced," then backed off that before a congressional committee.

"I don't know if you can have it both ways," Boston's former general manager said.

He said management had proposed controlling the use of illegal performance-enhancing substances in every negotiation since 1994 but that the players' union rejected it.

"The reform needed to come from within the ranks of the players association," Duquette said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. "It looks like Major League Baseball is making some progress."

A new policy agreed to by owners and players calls for random testing in which a first offense would be punished by a 10-day suspension without pay.

There was no testing when Canseco played for Boston in 1995 and 1996 after Duquette obtained him in a trade with Texas. Canseco discussed his steroid use in his book.

"I didn't have any knowledge that he was using them. He denied it when he was with Oakland," Duquette said Wednesday. "I think people in the industry suspected."

While he was general manager, the Red Sox implemented a drug testing program for minor leaguers and club employees.

"The Red Sox did a great job of educating their players about steroids. There was not widespread use in the Red Sox organization," he said.

Duquette is continuing that process at his summer sports camp in western Massachusetts. Besides instruction in baseball, softball and basketball, campers are warned about steroid use and taught about nutrition and life skills.

"Educating the kids so they can make intelligent choices is important," Duquette said.

He in his third year of running the camp since being dismissed after eight years as general manager in February 2002 by the team's new ownership group, led by John Henry.

Several players who had major roles in Boston's World Series championship last year were obtained by Duquette — Pedro Martinez, Derek Lowe, Tim Wakefield, Jason Varitek, Manny Ramirez and Johnny Damon.

"I was real proud of the contributions those players made," he said.

Last December, Westfield State College student Bryan Johnston was charged with murder in the shooting death of University of Massachusetts senior David Sullivan. Duquette said that his nephew, Dave Duquette Jr., was roommates with Sullivan and that all three were friends who attended the same elementary school.

Prosecutors said Johnston was suffering from steroid withdrawal at the time of his arrest but did not say steroids played a role in the slaying. Johnston's lawyers said the drugs did not affect his mental state, but medical experts say steroid use and withdrawal can lead to erratic and violent behavior.

"There's a human toll," Duquette said. "I can see why it's a tragic story for the families" of children affected by steroids.

At the congressional hearing last Thursday, Canseco, Mark McGwire, Sammy Sosa, Rafael Palmeiro and Curt Schilling all testified.

Sosa, in Fort Myers for Baltimore's game with Boston on Wednesday, declined to talk about steroids. He, Palmeiro and Schilling told the committee they didn't use steroids.

McGwire repeatedly refused to say whether he used illegal steroids when he hit a then-record 70 home runs in 1998, or at any other time.

Bruschi may sit out next year

BOSTON — New England Patriots linebacker Tedy Bruschi is considering sitting out the 2005 season for health reasons, his newly hired agent told The Boston Globe.

Bruschi, who was treated for a mild stroke last month, recently hired Boston-based agent Brad Blank to represent him. Bruschi, who has three years remaining on his contract, hasn't been represented by an agent since his rookie season.

Blank insists Bruschi hasn't decided on his plans for next season.

"I can relate to you only that Tedy is considering not playing next year," Blank told The Globe on Tuesday. "Beyond that, I cannot comment on anything."

Bruschi was admitted to Massachusetts General Hospital on Feb. 16 and released a couple of days later. However, an Arizona television station has reported that Bruschi was readmitted to the hospital so doctors could repair a hole in his heart.

Blank and Patriots coach Bill Belichick declined to comment on Bruschi's medical condition.

"Tedy has made all the comments. I leave it at that," said Belichick, who is in Hawaii for the NFL owners meetings.

Bruschi is scheduled to earn $850,000 in 2005, $1.35 million in 2006 and $1.70 million in the final year of his contract. His deal would be voided if he retires, but he could earn his full salary if the team elects to place him on its physically unable to perform list.

Minutewomen play nation's top teams including freshman Kathleen Typadis, who is currently on pace to set the all-time UMass rookie scoring record, the women's lacrosse team has displayed signs of life. The team, however, is still very young with 13 of 24 players being freshmen.

With inexperienced players being faced with early season challenges, the results could be rewarding or disastrous. So far, it has been the former.

"They look forward to playing ranked teams," Bolduc said of her young squad. "They like to be challenged. They like to be pushed. They're not one to sit back and watch things happen."

Six games into the season there have been no upsets, but there has been steady progress. Both Syracuse and Hofstra have had their hands full, and it has taken an extra boost from both top-20 teams to get by the Minutewomen.

This coming Saturday UMass will start a two-game road trip beginning in New Hampshire and ending Saturday, April 2 at Boston College. On April 5, the team will return home to Garber Field to face Dartmouth, which is currently ranked 7th. Then the Minutewomen will have another chance to play the full 60 minutes.

Downpour dampers Wells

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — For five innings, David Wells seemed ready for opening day. Unfortunately for him, he had to pitch the sixth before a downpour ended the game.

The Baltimore Orioles beat the Boston Red Sox 6-1 in six innings Wednesday when Miguel Tejada hit a two-run homer and Luis Matos had a three-run double. Erik Bedard pitched six solid innings for the Orioles.

Wells allowed two runs on seven hits and no walks in the first five innings before giving up four runs in the sixth. Manager Terry Francona has tapped him to start the first game of the season April 3 at the New York Yankees.

"I felt all right, just a couple of bad pitches," said Wells, who threw 79 pitches and hopes to throw more in his one remaining spring training start. "I don't care if it's a good outing or a bad outing. It really doesn't matter to me down here as long as I just get the pitch count up so I'm ready for the season."

With Curt Schilling not expected to pitch until mid-April, Wells is eager to face his former team on opening day.

"I'm up for any challenge," he said. "Any opportunity you get out there to pitch is a great opportunity, big game or not, and some guys can't handle the big game. And that's where I don't have a problem with it."

The Red Sox got a scare in the sixth when center fielder Johnny Damon pulled up on Matos' double and left the game. Francona said he suffered cramps in his calves and probably would be the designated hitter Thursday when Boston plays Baltimore at Fort Lauderdale.

Tejada's first spring homer gave Baltimore a 2-0 lead in the second after Chris Gomez singled. David Ortiz doubled in a run for Boston in the fourth before Wells took the mound in the sixth.

"He about reached his (pitch) limit for today," Francona said, "but I thought he located (the ball) pretty well. When he missed, he missed a little bit."

Matt Mantei replaced Wells in the seventh and retired the first two batters before the game was called.

Bedard (3-0) allowed one run on four hits in six innings with three strikeouts and no walks. He lowered his ERA to 2.13 in 21 1-3 innings. Wells's ERA is 7.50 in 12 innings.

Notes: Tejada, Sammy Sosa and Rafael Palmeiro each went 2-for-3 for Baltimore. Sosa hit the first pitch he saw from Wells into the right-center field gap for a double. ... Boston reliever Byung-Hyun Kim lost another chance to pitch when the game ended early. He had been sidelined for nearly a week with flu symptoms and was scheduled to pitch Wednesday. He'll probably pitch Thursday.

Curry emerging into a leader

By Reid Hanley
Knight Ridder

OKLAHOMA CITY — JamesOn Curry was asked to do something Sunday he probably never had been asked before: shoot the basketball.

The Oklahoma State freshman, who is the all-time leading scorer in North Carolina high school history with 3,307 points, isn't shy but he hadn't taken a shot in the first half of the Cowboys' NCAA second round game with Southern Illinois. The Cowboys trailed 46-39 with only two free throws from the 6-foot-3-inch guard.

"You're doing a great job but maybe you should score a little," Oklahoma State senior Terrance Crawford told Curry at the half.

Curry took those words to heart, hit a pair of three-pointers to help start a 12-0 run and the No. 6-ranked Cowboys were on their way to Allstate Arena, where they will meet Arizona in Thursday's late game of the NCAA Chicago regional.

Curry has been a spark for coach Eddie Sutton's team that returned four starters from last year's Final Four squad. Since he moved into the starting lineup, the Cowboys are 12-3, have won the Big 12 tournament and took their first two NCAA tournament games.

It's unlikely Oklahoma State would be coming to Rosemont if Curry hadn't come to Stillwater. It's unlikely Curry would be playing in the NCAA tournament if Sutton hadn't taken a chance on a promising player whose life took a bad turn on Feb. 6, 2004.

"He has done everything we've asked of him," Sutton said. "He has done well in his classes. He has been embraced by his teammates, coaches and all of our fans. I'm not sure he's not the most popular player we have."

Curry was one of 60 high school students from six high schools in the Alamance-Burlington district arrested near his home of Mebane, N.C., as part of a lengthy undercover drug operation. Curry admitted to selling small amounts of marijuana twice to an undercover drug officer who had been posing as a high school student.

He pleaded guilty to six felony counts two months later and was sentenced to 3 years' probation and 200 hours of community service. He couldn't return to his high school and graduated from an alternative school.

"I went from a boy to a man overnight," he said. "You have to suck it up immediately or be left behind."

As a sophomore in high school he had committed to then-North Carolina coach Matt Doherty. After his arrest, new Tar Heels coach Roy Williams pulled the offer and Curry's future was a question mark.

Memphis, Miami and Cincinnati still wanted Curry. However, his uncle James Curry called Sutton, a future Hall of Fame coach who was given a second chance by his alma mater after a rough four years at Kentucky.

JamesOn, so named for his uncle James and his father Leon, only took one recruiting visit and it was to Stillwater. That's all it took to make him a Cowboy.

"They came to my house and talked to me," Curry said. "I came here, saw the campus, came to the arena and saw the atmosphere. It was like, 'Wow, people really love basketball here.' My favorite place is Gallagher-Iba (Arena). I love to go there and shoot. It would be 11:30 and coach Dickey (OSU assistant coach James Dickey) would say they were going to have to lock me out."

Sutton, who has taken three teams to the Final Four, is a firm believer in second-chance players. That doesn't mean the Cowboys signed Curry without doing their homework. Dickey and Sean Sutton, the head coach's son and future successor, went to North Carolina seeking information and came back with a favorable report.

When Curry came to Stillwater, his schedule included meetings with school President David Schmidly and athletic director Harry Birdwell. Most recruits do not receive such treatment but Curry was impressed. They made it known there would no margin for error but did so without scolding Curry.

"That showed me a lot about Oklahoma State University," he said. "It showed how big basketball fans they were and how they were willing to give me a chance. They weren't like, 'If you mess up, you're out of here!' It wasn't like that that. It was like, 'We know you made a mistake and we're pretty sure it won't happen again.' They were great."

Curry spent most of his recruiting weekend with Oklahoma State players. When Sutton took a poll of their opinion of Curry the vote was unanimous: "Sign him." They haven't been disappointed.

"He fit in right away," Cowboys standout Joey Graham said. "He was like a sponge, asking all kinds of questions of coach. He'd ask questions of the seniors. You have to like a guy like that."

For the first 17 games of the season, Curry came off the bench to play significant minutes and average about six points per game. The Cowboys missed All-American Tony Allen, who had gone on to the Boston Celtics, and Sutton eventually went to Curry at Colorado. Since then, the Cowboys are on a nice run.

"He's a special player," guard John Lucas said. "Even when he wasn't starting, he accepted his role. For somebody to come out of high school scoring 40 points per game and not starting right away, he accepted his role. He didn't pout. He was trying to fit in.

"He brings a lot of energy to the court and a different offensive weapon. He took a lot of pressure off myself and Joey. He creates shots and also hits the open man. When he stepped on the court as a starter, it was like he was home."

Curry, who is averaging 13 points per game as a starter, doesn't wonder what his life would be like had he been able to play at North Carolina.

Going to Oklahoma State was "God's plan" and probably the best thing that could have happened to him. North Carolina was probably too close to his past.

"There would be a lot of guys just hanging around," he said. "At Carolina, it would have been too-close contact. At first, they might not have been around but as things got better, people would have started coming around with baggage I didn't ask for and that's not good at all."

The basketball tradition at Oklahoma State is a proud one. Sutton is a veteran of 35 years as a Division I head coach. He is part of the Henry Iba coaching tree and his branch includes retired Purdue coach Gene Keady, Kansas coach Bill Self, Arizona State coach Rob Evans and Florida State coach Leonard Hamilton.

It also has its tragedy. On Jan. 27, 2001, a plane with 10 members of the Oklahoma State traveling party crashed, killing all, including players Nathan Zane Fleming and Daniel Paul Lawson, director of basketball operations Pat Noyes, student assistant Jared Weiberg and media relations coordinator Will Hancock.

The tragedy of 2001 taught even a veteran like Sutton, who has a 781-298 record, a lesson.

"Life is precious," he said. "How many of us have made mistakes when they're young? I think you ought to give people a second chance. I talked to (coach Roy Williams) at North Carolina and it would have been very tough on JamesOn on Tobacco Road. I think they made the right decision. We're just very fortunate to be the beneficiary."

MICHAEL MCLEVEY/ALL AMERICAN MORNING NEWS

JamesOn Curry has been a nice fit for the Oklahoma State Cowboys in his freshman campaign. He stepped in for Tony Allen, who graduated and was drafted by the Boston Celtics, and OSU is back in the Sweet 16.

UMass close to signing Ford

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts athletic director John McCutcheon appears likely to tab Travis Ford as the new head coach of the Minutemen men's basketball program, although the two sides had not reached an agreement as of last night and the door remains open on an 11th hour candidate entering the picture.

Ford was in Amherst with his wife on Wednesday, but UMass officials maintain that nothing is imminent and no announcement is planned.

If Ford falls from the top of UMass' list for any reason, the name of Manhattan coach Bobby Gonzalez would likely surface as a viable candidate. Memphis assistant and former UMass player Tony Barbee may also get additional consideration after receiving only a preliminary interview, along with Kent State coach Jimmy Christian.

Travis Ford could be named UMass men's basketball coach.

Helping Gonzalez's cause is the fact that would-be UMass recruit Craig Austrie, a point guard from Trinity Catholic High School in Stamford, Conn., who committed to the program under Lappas but withdrew his verbal commitment when the coach was let go, has indicated that if Gonzalez were hired, he would don the maroon and white. If another coach is hired, it appears as if Austrie would go elsewhere, including recent suitors Providence and Fordham.

Ford was the coach at Eastern Kentucky University for the past five seasons, guiding the Colonels to a 22-9 record and an Ohio Valley Conference Championship this past season – one in which EKU made its first NCAA Tournament appearance in 26 years.

Initially not believed to be a candidate, Ford's name picked up steam after UMass could not land former North Carolina coach Matt Doherty. He was said to have been vouched for by Pitino during the search, and was brought to campus late Tuesday as talks intensified between the two sides.

Ford was originally hesitant about taking the job, as he was waiting to gauge his chances of landing the recently vacated head job at Tennessee that would have allowed him to stay closer to home.

After Texas Tech Hall of Fame coach Bobby Knight and North Carolina-Charlotte's Bobby Lutz moved to the forefront of the Volunteers' search, Ford acted quickly and decided to pursue his chances in Amherst before the opportunity passed him by in favor of another candidate. With negotiations still ongoing with UMass, Ford may still find himself in the mix at Tennessee, and the search has the potential to intensify if Knight's Red Raiders are eliminated prior to the weekend.

Ford's potential hiring poses major questions about whether a coach from the Bluegrass State can recruit competitively on the east coast, and if a man who's known to be relatively quiet and even-keeled can sell the UMass program and re-energize a downtrodden and apathetic fan base that hasn't had much to cheer about in over half a decade.

The Minutemen will return four starters next season, but are without a point guard on scholarship following the graduation of both Anthony Anderson and Chris Chadwick.

One reason for Doherty's change of heart may have been money. At North Carolina, Doherty earned an annual salary of roughly $855,000 — nearly twice what UMass could offer for its head coaching position.

Memphis assistant coach and former UMass player Tony Barbee — the local favorite to land the job - has yet to become a serious candidate for the position. Barbee interviewed on campus on March 15, but did not receive a follow-up interview and has not been contacted following his initial appearance in front of the search committee.

Former UMass coach Steve Lappas has done some interviewing of his own as well, as he is reportedly in the very early stages of preliminary discussions with Siena University about its vacant head coaching position.

-Mike Marzelli

Doherty drops off, Lappas eying Siena

While Travis Ford may be introduced as the new Massachusetts men's basketball coach in the next few days, sources close to the search have indicated that former North Carolina coach Matt Doherty was the first choice of athletic director John McCutcheon, and was prepared to accept the position before changing his mind.

Doherty reportedly came to a tentative agreement with McCutcheon at some point last weekend, and began a search for assistant coaches to fill his potential staff at UMass. However the 2001 National Coach of the Year then changed his mind for unspecified reasons, and removed his name from candidacy.

Reports that UMass hired Doherty as a consultant were false, according to the sources, and were circulated to remove Doherty's name from speculation and allow the coaching search to continue unfettered.

Hofstra takes off in second half

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

It was the tale of two halves yesterday at Garber Field in Amherst, as the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2-4) went into halftime with a 3-2 advantage but ended up with a 14-8 loss to No. 10 Hofstra (6-1).

The Minutewomen played a controlled, slow-down style in the first 30 minutes, which limited the strong transition game of the Pride and held them to only two goals. Freshman Melynda Zwick provided all of UMass' first-half scoring with her sixth, seventh and eighth goals of the season by the halftime horn.

UMass coach Carrie Bolduc had stressed execution in the practices leading up to the challenge and, for at least a half, the team carried out its coach's wishes.

"We wanted to kind of slow the ball down a little bit [because] they are a transition, fast break team," Bolduc said. "The other thing, too, is that we have a lot of youth on our team, and we had to slow the ball down initially and to not force the ball to the cage. It's kind of been a thing where every single time we get it down, we just drive to the cage out of desperation, and we initially have to move the ball, but then once we work the ball, things usually happen."

The Pride, however, responded to UMass' strong performance and came storming out of halftime with a 5-0 run that seemed to knock the wind out of the young and slightly overmatched Minutewomen. From there, Hofstra and UMass played fairly evenly, and any time a run seemed possible for the Maroon and White, it was quickly squashed by a Pride swift transition goal.

"It [Hofstra's 5-0 run] surprised them at first. You know they won some key draw controls and just jammed it down our throat in the first three minutes of the half, and against good teams, you can't get them back," Bolduc said. "So we've got to figure out how to push ourselves to that next level, and elevate our play, and always be in control and for the most part you know we were in the first half, then they took complete control in the second half."

Lapses like the one in yesterday's game are beginning to look like a trend, as the Minutewomen went from being down only two goals at halftime to No. 13 Syracuse, to being on the losing side of the final score 17-8 in a game last week.

Before the game, Bolduc had stressed the importance of shots on goal and how her team was great at finishing shots, but not getting enough to earn the win. The statement held very true as UMass scored on 50 percent of their shots on goal but still only took 16 shots to Hofstra's 39.

"More practice, limiting mistakes, and challenging them, and having them challenge each other and elevating their play," Bolduc stressed after the game. "We need to push them through adversity so they can rise to the occasion and recognize situations, so that they know how to control the game the entire 60 minutes."

"A good thing [that came out of the loss] is knowing that we can compete against top-10 teams, but there are still mental mistakes. Against good teams, though, you can't lapse for 15 minutes, you can't lapse for five minutes, you can't even lapse for one."

The team will try to bounce back Saturday when they head to Durham, N.H. to take on the UNH Wildcats at 1 p.m.

Bolduc's team has difficult schedule

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

If a different team had to face the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's schedule in 2005, there would be cause for worry. However, for coach Carrie Bolduc and company, it is quite the opposite.

The women's team has faced three ranked opponents in its first six games with another one coming around the corner. They are 2-4 so far with last night's 14-8 loss to No. 10 Hofstra at home. It was a hard fought battle that was closer than the score would show, but their record doesn't display this team's level of play so far this season.

In last night's contest, the Minutewomen played a hard-nosed game for 30 minutes of action and were up 3-2 on mighty Hofstra going into the break. The team was passing well, moving the ball and not turning it over, something that had been a nagging problem in the early games this season (both UMass and Hofstra had only nine turnovers at the half).

However, in the early going of the second, the Pride came out firing with five straight goals within four minutes of the half. This was UMass' only lapse as the Minutewomen more or less traded goals for the rest of the game.

"We have to play 60 minutes to win big games. We can't have mental lapses," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said of playing the better teams.

If someone took a look at the Minutewomen's strength of schedule, they would have a pretty good RPI. Their first game was with in-state rival Holy Cross, followed by a game against a stacked BU squad that was ranked 15th but has now moved inside the top-10. Next was a loss against Harvard, which had not played a game before the UMass meeting, then three consecutive home games — Albany, Syracuse, Hofstra.

The Minutewomen have suffered similar fates in both of their games with Syracuse and Hofstra. Like the first half against the Pride, UMass also played Syracuse tough, only down 7-5 going into halftime but losing control in the second half, being outscored 10-3.

This team has potential. With a nucleus of experienced upperclassmen (juniors Kerri Connerty and Lindsay Cassell and senior Kristin St. Hilaire) and a solid group of underclassmen,

See WOMEN'S LAX on page 8

Junior Kerri Connerty scored a goal and tallied an assist against Hofstra.

Freshman Kathleen Typadis leads the Minutewomen with 15 goals, five assists and 20 points this season, despite being kept off the score sheet yesterday.

Minutewomen head to Philly to open up conference season

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team (8-6) travels to Philadelphia today to take on Atlantic 10 foe Temple (3-5, 1-0).

The Minutewomen are coming off of a decisive 6-1 victory over Big East opponent, Rutgers, in Delray Beach, Fla. on March 16. Sophomore Michele Spiess starred for the Minutewomen, winning her singles' match and her doubles', paired with freshman Masha Pozar.

The Owls come into Thursday's match having been shutout by the 57th-ranked team in the country, the Penn Quakers, on March 19. Temple was beaten in straight sets in three-of-six singles matches they played.

For the Minutewomen, Thursday's match is the opener to their Atlantic 10 schedule. The Owls are undefeated in league play, beating the George Washington Colonials 4-3 on March 17. All together, the two schools have faced each other nine times. The Maroon and White lead the series with five wins.

The last time the two met in the regular season, UMass downed Temple 4-3 on Feb. 20, 2004, in Amherst. On April 18 of last year, the Owls defeated the Minutewomen in the Atlantic 10 third-place match by the same score of 4-3.

The Minutewomen have a few players worth watching on Thursday, the first of which is junior Dorothy Iwanowicz. Iwanowicz has been stellar for the Maroon and White so far this season, going 9-3 in No. 4 singles. She has also been great in doubles pairings with an overall record of 12-4, playing with fellow junior Susan Johnson and senior Sasha Edelstein.

Freshman Masha Pozar has also been a good contributor for Judy Dixon's team this season. In singles play Pozar is 10-7 including 9-6 in No. 2 play. Pozar's 10 singles wins is second on the team.

Temple is not a team to be overlooked. The Owls are a young team that has just one senior on its roster, Lauren Verrall out of Mount Gambier, Australia.

Also leading the Owls is junior Laura Seiverling out of Hershey, Penn. Rounding out the upperclassmen is junior Ana Maslesa, who hails from Split, Croatia. The rest of the Owl team is made up of three sophomores and two freshmen.

Earlier this week it was announced that Minutewoman senior captain Sasha Edelstein was named the A-10 Performer of the Week for the first time this season. Overall, last week Edelstein went 5-1, which included a perfect 3-0 in doubles match play. So far this season Edelstein is 17-4 in singles play and 12-6 in doubles play, which includes a perfect 4-0 when paired with Iwanowicz.

Last week Edelstein competed in the No. 3 singles and doubles. In singles play, she downed Army 6-3, 6-4 and the next day defeated Rutgers 6-3, 6-1.

The duo of Edelstein and junior Jana Bartolini defeated all the opponents they faced which included Tennessee-Chattanooga, Rutgers and Army. Edelstein leads a young Minutewoman team that is made up of mainly juniors and freshmen.

Sox to 'paint' Fenway

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Red Sox are pitching for some public improvements to transit and parking around cramped Fenway Park, now that they've decided to stay in the smallest stadium in the majors.

Owners of the World Series champs said Wednesday their decision to stay in the 93-year-old ballpark, which they are upgrading and expanding, has nothing to do with improvements outside the park, and that they've not asked for public dollars.

But the Red Sox say they're just like any other city resident — they'll paint the house, but eventually somebody's got to fill the potholes and pick up the trash.

"Transit improvements would be good for the neighborhood," team president Larry Lucchino said. "Parking improvements would be good for the neighborhood. People have been talking about those for a long time."

Lucchino acknowledged that subway, parking and street improvements are desirable but not essential to the team's financial success and long-term commitment to stay put.

"This is a no-strings-attached commitment," he said at a news conference in the .406 Club, high above home plate.

Lucchino, principal owner John Henry and team chairman Tom Werner announced their latest plans to improve the oldest ballpark in Major League Baseball. Since buying the Red Sox in February 2002, the owners have made several stadium upgrades and seat additions.

The team recently received approval to add more than 2,000 seats or standing locations on the roofs extending above the left- and right-field stands in time for the 2006 season. Those seats and other changes would expand the park's capacity from 36,298 to 38,815.

Lucchino gave no dollar estimate on the improvements. He said the team has spent "tens of millions" to make the changes in place up to this point.

Henry said Wednesday that around 39,000 seats would be the maximum capacity.

"To go beyond that would have undesirable consequences for the community," he said.

In separate sessions, the team's owners met Tuesday with Mayor Thomas M. Menino and Gov. Mitt Romney to inform them of their plans. Menino later said: "We are not in the position financially to be helpful that we were in five years ago."

Romney on Wednesday indicated he's more open to helping improve the neighborhood.

"They would love to see the communities around Fenway Park beautified and that's part of our job," Romney said. "They would presume that we'll support the development of the Fenway neighborhood like we support the development of all neighborhoods in the commonwealth. They didn't ask for special treatment. They didn't ask for any state or federal money that I know of."

Any such proposal would require city or legislative approval, or both.

Students disagree with new plan

By Dan Koffman
Collegian Staff

Students, faculty, and staff at the University of Massachusetts voiced their displeasure with Chancellor John V. Lombardi's "Draft Action Plan" at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting. The "Draft Action Plan" is Lombardi's response to the report made by Commission on Campus Diversity. In it, he proposes what changes should be made to improve campus diversity.

Lombardi started the meeting off by stressing that the "Draft Action Plan" is "not a plan." He said, "It is a proposal to be responded to."

UMass Chancellor John Lombardi

The proposal was bashed just two days ago at a Student Government Association meeting. Most of the negative comments made about the proposal were in response to a University restructuring that would create a new administratively-run center that would oversee more than 40 registered student organizations. The restructuring was not one of the recommendations made by the commission.

A period of questions and discussion followed, but some in the crowd got restless when Lombardi declined to respond their questions individually.

Graduate Student Senate President Uri Strauss was a member of the commission and believes Lombardi had previously stated that he would implement all of the Commission's recommendations.

"I know you're not going to respond, but at least you could apologize for your dishonesty," said Strauss.

Strauss also said that the Graduate Student Senate rejected the "Draft Action Plan" at a recent meeting. "We thought it diverged from the commission's recommendations, and so we felt comfortable in rejecting it. So we did," he said.

Eduardo Bustamante, President of the Student Government Association, expressed similar feelings.

"These people are here because they care," said Bustamante, directing his comments towards Lombardi. "I would suggest that we stop this question-and-answer session until we get a good reason why you are not responding."

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante spoke to yesterday's Faculty Senate.

After Bustamante's comments, Lombardi finally responded to the concerns of those who had been

MassPIRG among groups concerned with hunger

By David Fonseca
Collegian Staff

On the heels of the White House's release of its 2006 budget proposal, which includes cuts in emergency food services and homeless shelters, the Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness has released a study that reports the need for low-income assistance programs across the nation is steadily rising.

The report, entitled "Communities in Crisis," is based on surveys of 900 emergency food and shelter providers in 426 small towns, rural cities and rural areas in 32 states.

The study indicates an increased need in emergency food and shelter services across the nation. The issue has members of the University of Massachusetts community speaking out.

"The fact that the need [for programs] is rising dramatically, but the funding for the programs to assist [those in need] is quickly being chipped away at is disturbing," said Tim Austin of MassPIRG's Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness.

Nationwide, 74 percent of food shelters have reported increased requests for emergency food services. The average agency reported a 28 percent increase increase in requests.

The numbers were similar for housing shelters across the country. Of agencies surveyed, 65 percent reported an increase in emergency shelter requests, with a 27 percent average increase in requests.

The study also shows that demand for such services is already overwhelming the capacity of the providers. Food service providers and emergency shelters turned away 24 and 77 percent of requests due to a lack of resources, respectively.

Massachusetts reported a higher than average increase in demand for food services, with 85 percent of shelters experiencing increased requests.

"An increasing number of people seeking food and shelter from Open Pantry has us greatly concerned about the level of support from government sources," said Kevin Noonan, Executive Director of Open Pantry Community Services in Amherst.

With need for emergency services across the nation increasing, emergency food and shelter providers are afraid the President's proposed budget for 2006 could be harmful to the already struggling hungry and homeless.

The administration's budget proposes to cut funding for the food Stamp Program by $1.1 Billion, affordable housing programs by $120 million, and the Community Development Block grant by $1.8 billion.

Lack of resources has already lead the Franklin County Emergency Center in Turner Falls to reduce staff due to a 15 percent cut in income from the State's Department of Transitional Assistance.

"Since the 1960's we've established a social safety net in this country, and the Bush Administration has been eroding that like mad," Austin said.

Critics have suggested that the proposed budget for 2006 indicates that the Bush Administration is out of touch with poverty issues in America.

"I don't think [the administration] has the slightest notion or interest or concern," said Democratic State Representative Ben Swan from Springfield. "There are people in this country who never really embraced social programs ... and whenever they get a chance to cut them, they do, unabashedly."

The Communities in Crisis report comes at a critical time for hunger and homelessness programs. According to Swan, due to the amount of health and human service concerns to be dealt with in the budget, hunger and homelessness tend to become marginalized.

"Some of the areas might receive less advocacy than others. Some program areas become isolated, and become more

Kmart, Sears form mega merger

By Dave Carpenter
Associated Press

HOFFMAN ESTATES, Ill. — Kmart bought Sears, Roebuck and Co. for $12.3 billion on Thursday, combining two faded retail icons whose sales have been declining for years into the nation's third biggest retailer with a projected $55 billion in annual sales.

Shareholders signed off on the deal in separate meetings at Sears' suburban Chicago headquarters, which now becomes the base for a company that adopts the name Sears Holdings Corp. It trails only Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Home Depot Inc. among U.S. retailers.

The votes capped off the stunning proposal unveiled four months earlier by Kmart Holding Corp. Chairman Edward Lampert, the billionaire hedge-fund manager who was the largest individual shareholder in each company.

Lampert, who helped Troy, Mich.-based Kmart turn a $1.1 billion profit last year with the aid of real-estate transactions, denied he has a big sell-off in mind for Sears assets and said the new company "goes beyond being an investment."

"It's an opportunity to transform two companies that once were great — to transform them into a great company relative to the 21st century," he told reporters at a news conference after the meetings.

"I think there's a presumption that you're going to see a lot of store closings. That's a wrong presumption," he said. "Our program is to keep as many stores open as we can."

Contending he has been unfairly labeled as a sell-off specialist, he also denied the company has put the Lands' End casual clothing chain on the market, as an industry publication reported earlier this month.

"Lands' End isn't for sale," the 42-year-old Lampert said. "It's a great American brand, and I think it's a brand that we could run very, very well."

The merger also brings together some other powerful brands that have succeeded while their companies' retail results have sagged, among them Craftsman tools, Kenmore appliances and, from Kmart, Martha Stewart, Jaclyn Smith and Joe Boxer.

Celia Rodriguez leaves a Kmart store in Hobbs, N.M. Kmart and Sears merged for a reported $12.3 billion Thursday, forming the nation's third largest retailer.

Employees have been concerned about widespread job cuts when the new company moves to close stores and convert hundreds of Kmart stores this year to the new Sears Essential convenience-oriented format. But officials said that while some layoffs will be announced by the end of April from among the 5,000 people working at the two firms' headquarters, the vast majority of the work force of 400,000 will keep their jobs as Sears Holdings focuses on improving retail.

"We are determined to be successful," Lampert said. "We will protect the assets of this company."

The deal closed shortly after the back-to-back shareholder meetings — one tame, the other rancorous.

Sixty-nine percent of Kmart shareholders voted to approve the deal in results announced at a sparsely attended session lasting five minutes. About two hours later, CEO Alan Lacy disclosed that Sears shareholders also had voted 69 percent in favor of the deal — but he had to endure shouting and insults by retired and former Sears employees upset about the 119-year-old retailer's acquisition by Kmart.

"This is a sad and dark day for Sears Roebuck," Doug Liggett, formerly a Sears auto center manager, said at the meeting. "It is unbelievable that Kmart, two years out of bankruptcy, would be strong enough to purchase Sears, a company in business for over a century."

Some also voiced criticism that Lacy will pocket about $27 million as a result of the merger.

"Sears Holdings intends to be a great company and a great retailer," said Lacy, responding to their angry complaints and fears the department-store company's assets would be sold off to raise cash.

The deal furthers Sears' strategy of moving away from shopping malls to the more profitable off-mall sites that Kmart stores typically occupy.

But since each firm has struggled on its own, it remains to be seen whether the combined company can manage to keep up with thriving competitors.

Lampert and Lacy, who will be CEO and vice chairman under Lampert at Sears Holdings, say the merger should save $500 million over the next three years.

Chandra telescope looks into the future

By Ashish K. Sahu
Collegian Correspondent

Chandra, one of the most powerful x-ray telescopes ever built, is presently hovering above the Earth and is sending data to down below from a colossal cloud known as Abell 2125, millions of light year away.

It sounds like an introduction to a science fiction movie, but it's real. Dr. Daniel Wang, an Associate professor in the department of Astronomy, is currently examining data obtained from Abell 2125 to help explain how the earth formed nearly three billion years ago.

"One can speculate how the universe got to this stage and how metals and elements are produced," Wang said.

Chandra is an x-ray telescope with high spatial resolution and was launched by NASA seven years ago. It is controlled by the Chandra center of Astro physics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge.

The Abell 2125 cloud was discovered earlier and comprises of several galaxies. All these galaxies emit certain x-rays that are in form of photons. These emitted photons are then trapped by the Chandra telescope and the data is send to the control center.

The telescope traps x-rays in space. The photons are like fingerprints and one can obtain the composition of the cloud. To get the data from Abell 2125 cloud, the projection of telescope takes about 22 hours to reach a certain point in space where the cloud is present. But the cloud is not stationary as the universe is expand-

Mass. teen successfully 'divorces' his father

By Katherine Webster
Associated Press

CANTON — A 15-year-old who made national news by "divorcing" his murderer father had a big smile Thursday as he walked out of court with new adoptive parents.

"I don't think I'll ever be over it, but it's a step forward," Patrick Holland said of his mother's 1998 murder by his father. "It's about the biggest step you can take at one time."

15-year-old Patrick Holland successfully divorced his father Thursday.

Patrick was adopted by Ron and Rita Laziskys, close friends of his mother and his longtime guardians.

The Laziskys, of Sandown, N.H., have cared for Patrick since shortly after Daniel Holland killed Liz Holland at the family's Quincy home, leaving her body for 8-year-old Patrick to find the next morning. Daniel Holland is serving life in prison without parole.

Patrick was one of the first children to initiate a parental-rights termination proceeding against one parent for killing the other. He said Daniel Holland forfeited any right to be his father the night he shot Liz Holland eight times.

The Massachusetts Department of Social Services put Patrick in a "bridge" home, where he lingered as grandparents on both sides competed with the Laziskys for custody.

Patrick wanted to live with the Laziskys, and was placed there after they qualified as foster parents.

Both adoptive parents also beamed as they left Thursday's brief closed hearing in

Iraqis protest latest terror attacks

By Tract Carl
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Hundreds of power workers shouting "No, no, to terror!" marched through Baghdad on Thursday to protest attacks that have killed dozens of their colleagues, while demonstrators in the south demanded that the new petroleum minister be from their oil-rich region.

The demonstrations came as negotiators for the two biggest factions in the new National Assembly worked out details of an Iraqi government that U.S. officials hope will pave the way for the eventual withdrawal of coalition forces.

Jawad al-Maliki, a negotiator from the Shiite-led United Iraqi Alliance, said talks had progressed enough for Shiite Arab and ethnic Kurd officials to agree to hold parliament's second session early next week, although no date had been set. The 275-seat National Assembly met March 16 to swear in its members.

"The negotiations were positive and very good," al-Maliki said. "In the coming days, the meetings will be continuous and decisive."

Lined up behind a black banner with the names of slain power workers, protesters demanded an end to attacks on electricity stations and oil pipelines — targets in an insurgent effort to weaken the economy and undermine the U.S.-led coalition and interim government.

At the same time, in southern Basra, more than 200 workers gathered outside a local government building to insist that the new government's oil and transportation ministers be from that region.

"Everyone must know that the oppressed and persecuted people of the south refuse to have their interests be ignored," protesters said in a statement given to the provincial governor, Mohammed al-Waeli.

Al-Waeli agreed, saying: "We are eager that the people of Basra and the south have clout in the new government."

Some oil workers threatened to disrupt production in the south.

"We will stop pumping the oil and go on strike for those working in the oil field and the ports if our demands aren't

UN peacekeeper sex abuse ranges back 50 years

By Nick Wadhams
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — A U.N. report on peacekeeper sex abuse released Thursday describes the U.N. military army as deeply flawed and recommends withholding salaries of the guilty and requiring nations to pursue legal action against perpetrators.

Those recommendations and several others come after repeated allegations that peacekeepers exploited the very people they were sent to protect. The report described a troubled system where peacekeepers have often "failed to grasp the dangers confronting them, seduced by day-to-day conditions that can be viewed as benign."

It said abuses had been reported in missions ranging from Bosnia and Kosovo to Cambodia, East Timor, West Africa and Congo. While allegations of abuse have dogged peacekeeping missions since their inception 50 years ago, the issue was thrust into the spotlight after the United Nations found earlier this year that peacekeepers in Congo had sex with Congolese women and girls, usually in exchange for food or small sums of money.

"You cannot overstate the value of peacekeeping and what it can bring to a society, so for that reason I think we must restore it," Prince Zeid al Hussein, Jordan's U.N. ambassador and the author of the report, told The Associated Press before its release.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan appointed Zeid, who once served as a peacekeeper in Bosnia, to study the Congo abuses and propose changes to keep them from happening again.

State considering new ways to restrain psychiatric patients

BOSTON (AP) — The state is considering new rules that would reduce how and when psychiatric patients can be restrained.

The new rules would require mental health facilities to train staff to intervene before a patients' behavior becomes dangerous. Physical restraints, involving a patient being held or pinned by staff, as well mechanical restraints, including cuffs and sedatives, would become more regulated.

The proposals would, if adopted, allow patients to be restrained or secluded only in emergencies "such as the occurrence of, or serious threat of, extreme violence, personal injury, or attempted suicide."

"The regulations in the past focused on a safe way to do a restraint. It implies restraints are the norm," Dr. Elizabeth Childs, commissioner of the Department of Mental Health, told the Boston Herald. "These new regulations really speak to the fact that restraints aren't the norm of treatment, they're the exception."

The proposed rule changes have the endorsement of advocates for psychiatric patients, and family members of people who have spent time in psychiatric wards.

"This is definitely the direction the mental health system needs to go in," said Lisa Lambert of the Parent/Professional Advocacy League. "Everybody has a right to be in a safe environment."

Jean Boursiquot's 26-year-old son, James, a paranoid schizophrenic, died last August in restraints at Brockton Hospital's psychiatric ward.

Lombardi extends questioning period

speaking.

"I recognize that we probably need to go back and revise the plan," said Lombardi. "We've been struggling with [diversity] in this community for a remarkably long time."

The report made by the Commission on Campus Diversity, entitled "A Blueprint for Change," was released March 1. Lombardi released his "Draft Action Plan" eleven days later.

Lombardi had previously set April 1 as the date by which people could submit feedback to his proposal. Many at the meeting stated that the date should be pushed back because the proposal came out during spring break and with SGA elections taking place this week. Lombardi answered these concerns by stating that he would extend the comment period to April 22.

Bustamante told the senate about his alternative proposal during his allotted time. "We've drafted a UMass Community Action Plan. We are supporting all of the commission's recommendations," Bustamante said.

Bustamante told the senate he was pleased with the parts concerning Academic Affairs in the Chancellor's proposal. All 12 of the commission's recommendations in that area were mentioned in the "Draft Action Plan." However, Bustamante stated that all eleven of the commission's recommendations concerning Student Affairs were rejected in Lombardi's proposal.

All three documents that were discussed can be found online. To view the report made by the Commission on Campus Diversity and Lombardi's "Draft Plan," visit www.umass.edu. To view the UMass Community Action Plan endorsed by Bustamante, visit www.takebackumass.com.

Big changes in store for John Rowland

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

John Rowland

BOSTON — As governor of Connecticut, John G. Rowland lived in a stately Georgian-style mansion, was shuttled around in a Lincoln Town Car driven by a state trooper, and hobnobbed with political and corporate leaders.

Oh, how the mighty have fallen.

Rowland, 47, who pleaded guilty to a corruption charge after allegations dogged him for more than a year and ultimately drove him to resign from office, is expected to serve his prison sentence of one year and one day at the Federal Medical Center Devens, a former Army base about 35 miles west of Boston.

He is set to report to prison April 1.

He will find his new home relatively relaxed, with no cells, scores of mundane tasks to perform each day — from landscaping to kitchen duty. The jobs pay between 12 cents and 40 cents an hour.

"It's a very relaxed facility," said Connecticut defense attorney Edward I. Gavin. "You can bide your time without having to worry about gangs, or violence, or shakedowns. I don't think John Rowland is going to have a problem. It's a lot of sitting around."

At Devens, Rowland would be one of about 120 prisoners at a camp that is a satellite facility of the larger 1,000-plus bed federal prison medical center that houses inmates with long-term medical or mental health problems.

Among inmates who have been through its doors are New England Mafia underboss Gennaro "Jerry" Angiulo and several former Providence city officials ensnared in that Rhode Island city's Operation Plunder Dome corruption probe that sent former Mayor Vincent "Buddy" Cianci to prison in New Jersey.

The medical center has been home to many aging and ill mobsters. Last September, Anthony "Tony Buck" Piccolo of Philadelphia died there of heart failure at age 81. He was convicted in 1995 of racketeering as consigliere, or adviser, to the John Stanfa crime family.

In April, Gaetano Badalamenti died at the center. He was 80. Badalamenti was a ringleader of the so-called Pizza Connection, a heroin and cocaine smuggling operation that used pizzerias as distribution fronts from 1975 to 1984 in New York City.

"The primary objective of those inmates is to support the medical center," said U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Carla Wilson.

The jobs are 9 a.m. to 5 p.m, Monday through Friday, and the rest is free time. The Devens camp includes a walking track, softball field and basketball hoop, Wilson said. There are several television rooms, a library, and sleeping areas with bunk beds.

Inmates can have visitors on Fridays, weekends and federal holidays. A quick embrace is OK, but prolonged hugging is prohibited.

He and his visitors can hang out in a room that sports plastic furniture or, in the warmer months, an outside picnic area.

There's no fence along the perimeter and camp inmates are generally free to roam the grounds when they're not working, Wilson said. They must return inside, however, for scheduled and random "counts" throughout the day.

"They're not locked down by any means," Wilson said, although she added it's also not a "Club Fed."

"It is a prison," she said.

But should Rowland go wandering, he may want to watch his step. Before the military base was redeveloped, demolition crews scoured the campus to remove any old — and unexploded — shells. But last June a 200-pound device was found in the Nashua River in nearby Lancaster. It appeared to be old military weapon. State police detonated it.

Mass. teen, murderer father get 'divorced'

Norfolk County Probate and Family Court.

"I'm just so happy. I never thought I'd see the day," Rita Laziskys said.

Her husband said: "I had to hold back tears. It's been a very uphill battle for us for four years."

After Patrick moved in with the Laziskys, Massachusetts social workers brokered a settlement with the boy's paternal grandparents that made the Laziskys the boy's legal guardians. But the agreement stipulated they could not seek to adopt him until 2005. Because there was no adoption, Daniel Holland's parental rights were not terminated.

That was fine with Patrick, until his father began seeking his school and counseling records.

After nearly three years of legal wrangling over whether a minor could sue for the termination of parental rights and whether the case belonged in Massachusetts or New Hampshire, Patrick finally got a hearing date.

On the eve of trial, Daniel Holland agreed to settle, signing away his parental rights in an agreement specifying that Patrick was the sole heir to his mother's estate.

That cleared the way both for the adoption and for settlement of the estate, which had been in limbo for years and would have remained that way until Daniel Holland exhausted all his appeals on the murder conviction.

The family said their next goal is to push for the passage of "Patrick's Law" by the Legislature. The bill would automatically suspend the parental rights of any parent convicted of murdering the other, but give the couple's children a say on whether the rights would be terminated permanently.

The Laziskys will be on Patrick's new birth certificate, but Patrick will keep the Holland last name that he shared with his mother.

Massachusetts routinely issues a new birth certificate in adoptions, with the names of the adoptive parents and, if desired, a new name for the child. The original birth certificate is kept under seal at the Department of Vital Statistics and Records and can be opened only by court order.

Patrick read an excerpt from his certificate of adoption as he left the courthouse.

Aid cutbacks worry community groups of a target, and are more likely to get cut," said Swan.

Policy Advocate for the Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness Kelly Benkert says she hopes the media attention garnered by the Communities in Crisis report will bring poverty issues to the forefront for both politicians and students.

"This report is not something we did in a vacuum. The report release and the coverage in the media generated from that is all part of a larger campaign to bring the issues of hunger and homelessness to the forefront of decision makers' minds," Benkert said. "In addition to that, on the organizing side, it's a fantastic way to make sure as many students as possible know there are ways they can get involved."

"At the very least, we need programs that exist currently; section eight housing, public housing, food stamps and the community block grant need to not be cut. Cutting programs is clearly not a good idea," said Benkert.

Telescope sends much needed data

ing, says Wang.

"One can imagine it like a rubber band. You can fix two points on the band and stretch it and it signifies the universe expanding and the cloud moving."

Much information can be revealed with these x-rays. The control center gets images and different spectra that are further investigated by Wang. The spectra reveal the different types of metals that are present and how they were formed. All the metals are formed by these clouds colliding, and the ash that is produced is what the planets are made up of.

Other important information is how the other galaxies interact with the cloud and how old is our universe. One of the big questions is if any of these processes studied can be imitated in the laboratory.

"One knows the process better but it is very difficult to conduct it in the laboratory," he said.

Wang says it requires lot of energy that is achieved when the stars collide in space. There is tremendous amount of heat and gases present, he says, and these make the process of forming new metals or compounds feasible.

Another curious thought is about extra terrestrial life, which he says, is a specialized study and one studies distant stars for these and it is difficult to find such matter in clouds. When asked about any other elements other than those found on earth that could be present in those clouds and not yet identified on earth which in principle he agrees it is possible but one cannot know.

There exists another x-ray satellite launched by European Union called XMM Newton but Wang says it is not that powerful compared to the Chandra. The questions on the Big Bang theory, the age of the universe and formation of other galaxies are still the curious questions many astronomers dwell on but the search continues with better technology like Chandra and enthusiastic astronomer like Wang.

Insurgency attacks start Iraqi protests met," said Mohammed Abdul Hafez, a union official who was one of the demonstration's organizers.

The insurgency's persistent violence, and the threat of disruptions to Iraq's oil exports, have contributed to rising world crude prices over the past year.

Kurdish and Shiite negotiators debated Cabinet posts Thursday, and Abdul-Karim al-Anzi, a Shiite official, said lawmakers should be able to elect the president, two vice presidents and parliament's speaker in their session next week.

The prime minister is expected to be Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a politician from Iraq's Shiite Arab majority. Kurdish leader Jalal Talabani is likely to be named president.

One of the vice presidents will likely be a Sunni Arab, al-Maliki and al-Anzi said.

The move is an effort to reach out to the Sunni community, which is believed to be the backbone of the insurgency. Dominant under former dictator Saddam Hussein, Sunni Arabs mostly stayed away from Iraq's Jan. 30 election, some in a boycott of the vote and others in fear of attacks.

Shiite Arabs are estimated to make up 60 percent of Iraq's 26 million people, while Kurds and Sunni Arabs are each thought to be 15 percent to 20 percent.

The top U.N. envoy in Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, reached out to Sunni Arabs on Thursday by meeting with influential Sunni religious leaders at a Baghdad mosque.

Qazi "stressed the importance of ensuring that all components of Iraqi society are adequately represented in the constitutional making process," a U.N. statement said.

A visiting seven-member U.S. congressional delegation expressed optimism at the progress being made in forming a new government.

"We take hope home that our troops will be able to rejoin their families sooner rather than later," said Rep. Anna Eshoo, D-Calif.

After nightfall, a large explosion was heard near a joint U.S.-Iraqi military camp 25 miles north of Baghdad, followed by gunfire. U.S. military officials confirmed there was an attack, but no major damage was reported. No other details were available.

Earlier, in Rabia, police mistook some Iraqi soldiers wearing civilian clothes and carrying guns to be insurgents, and opened fire, killing three soldiers, police chief Ahmed Mohammed Khalaf said. The soldiers shot back, killing two police officers. Eight officers also were wounded in the gunbattle, which lasted about 10 minutes.

Voices From Inside

Erin McNamee

Amy. Debbie. Emily. Lisette. MaryBeth. Melissa. Michelle. Nori. These women are mothers, daughters, sisters and lovers. They are also recovered drug addicts, alcoholics, drunk drivers and victims of abuse and mental illness. Some are currently incarcerated; others have been incarcerated at one time or another in the recent past. What they all have in common is a need to move on and a desire to improve their lives; this is where Voices From Inside comes in.

Founded in 1999, Voices From Inside is a non-profit organization based out of the Hamden County Correctional Facility in Ludlow. The mission of the group is two-fold: "to facilitate writing workshops for women prisoners and ex-prisoners to tell their own stories in their own voices; and to bring their stories to the community to increase awareness of the human and financial costs of prisons to our society ... and to change public perception about the lives of those who are incarcerated through interaction between the writers and the larger community."

Women from Voices From Inside came to Butterfield on Tuesday, March 22, as part of an event sponsored by Writing Butterfield. Voices From Inside aims to give voice to those women who have been silenced and ignored by society; it is an opportunity for them to speak out for their own empowerment and healing and to hopefully aid in their rehabilitation upon their release from prison. Most participants would agree that getting their thoughts down on paper helps them confront and reconcile with their pasts.

Each of these women is inspiring in her own right. Melissa was just released on Thursday, March 24, after serving a six-month sentence for drunk driving. Emily, a 23-year-old college graduate, was recently released from prison. MaryBeth, who attended Skidmore College, is serving a 12-month sentence on DUI charges. Debbie, a college graduate and mother of two college students, served a six-month sentence on drug charges. Michelle is serving her first prison sentence after three DUI offenses. Lisette served two years on a drug charge and has been clean for two years. She currently lives in her own apartment, has regained custody of her two daughters, works with Voices From Inside, and intends to pursue a college degree in social work next fall. Nori is serving her first prison sentence after her fourth DUI charge. Amy, a 31-year-old mother of two, has been out of prison for over a year and a half and has held down the same job since leaving prison, a feat she had never achieved before being incarcerated. She is currently living in her own apartment with her children.

In addition to getting their voices heard, these women strive to break the various stereotypes surrounding incarcerated women. These women did not look like Hollywood prisoners; there were no orange jumpsuits or chains to be found. Rather, they looked just like the girl sitting next to you in class, one of your professors, or perhaps your own mother or sister. They, like those on "the outside," are simply victims of life's circumstances; the only difference is that they happened to be dealt a tougher hand.

On Tuesday these women read from pieces they wrote for the 10-week Voices From Inside program, from which many of them graduated just last week. Their writing is diverse and moving, covering topics ranging from their own personal struggles to their families to their own desires for a better life.

These women view Voices From Inside as an opportunity to claim something as their own in a prison system built for men. As Lisette pointed out, women are simply "guests" in co-ed prisons; women are the minority. Therefore, writing enables them to empower themselves in respect to a system that marginalizes them and often fails to meet their needs. It is a way to channel their thoughts, harness their energy, and provide a positive outlet many never knew existed before.

According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, the number of women in prison since 1980 has increased at nearly double the rate for men. More than half of women in state prisons have been abused, 47 percent physically and 39 percent sexually. Many women are survivors of both types of abuse. Nearly a quarter of women prisoners have a history of mental illness.

Yet there is a severe lack of rehabilitative programs in state prisons, despite the fact that studies show that a combination of community supervision and some form of rehabilitation program (whether vocational, education, or substance abuse) helps reduce the chances that a released prisoner will re-enter prison.

In terms of the great impact it has on both its graduates and its viewing audiences, the success of Voices From Inside should be a wake-up call to the way the country's prison system is organized. Such rehabilitative programs should be instituted at more prisons across the country, for both men and women. Lisette firmly believes that Voices From Inside changed her life, giving her confidence in public speaking and encouraging her to go to college. Why not give this opportunity to more prisoners? After all, life is about second chances.

The merits of gen-ed requirements

Mike Anmuth

An old Sam Cooke song says, "Don't know much about history / Don't know much biology / Don't know much about a science book / Don't know much about the French I took." I think this song demonstrates my college career up to this point. I may not have occasion to use a lot of the facts that I have memorized in these classes. As it stands, I've taken almost three years worth of classes and I can talk generally about a good number of them but my depth of knowledge comes mostly from my major.

Most college students take a number of general education required classes but end up forgetting this material in favor of the material learned solely in the subject area of one's major. Should we do away with majors? I don't think so. I believe that college prepares you for a deep knowledge base in one specific area. It is important that your major covers that area well enough so that you can get a job or at least be able to talk about whatever your degree is in while sitting at a bar with a bunch of other people who learned one general scheme of things during their undergraduate years.

Many people argue that college is the means to an end, a machine created only to prepare students for the job market without providing them with a general breadth of knowledge. I'm not quite sure I agree. I do agree that the goal of college for many people is to get a job and probably start paying back their student loans that allowed them to attend college in the first place, but the scholarly pursuit of knowledge is also a lofty goal.

If college is indeed this machine, then why are general education classes presented at all? Why not just have students focus four years on their major, like a technical or vocational school? If the idea is to present students with liberal arts classes that they will use and remember, why not let students design their own program and take classes in areas of which they find particular interest? I know that taking a number of sociology classes made me want to become a sociology major, and I have pursued different minor options due to enjoyment of other subjects. Here at the University of Massachusetts, we have a major that is designed with this idea in mind, the Bachelor's Degree in Individual Concentration.

The elimination of the stringent Gen-Ed requirements would lead to a trade school sort of environment where four years worth of classes were all in one subject, defeating the purpose of a liberal arts education.

There is no good answer to the question at hand, whether or not a broad range of liberal arts classes is worthwhile and, if not, what is a constructive way to change that curriculum. If students took classes in all one subject, they would be essentially majoring in that subject, the same as they are now.

The elimination of the stringent Gen-Ed requirements would lead to a trade school sort of environment where four years worth of classes were all in one subject, defeating the purpose of a liberal arts education. If students are given the breadth of topics required now, they may not remember things learned in their general education classes but still have them under their belt, in hopes that one day they may find themselves needing information from their introductory English or Environmental Science course. It is not a win-win situation in the sense that each 'solution' gives up one piece to gain another, a tight-rope balancing act between too little knowledge spread out and too much knowledge concentrated.

As the system stands, it is effective both for churning out people to fill jobs in society as well as teaching these same people about subjects that they might not ordinarily explore. As each new class enters college, we change requirements, change courses and evaluate the necessity of knowledge in the changing environment of both the workplace and the world.

Perhaps neither I nor Sam Cooke remembers our "science book" or, "the French" taught to us, but the majority of students find something of interest to them in their liberal arts classes. This phenomenon makes these classes valid enough to keep around even if the knowledge from each individual course isn't remembered down the line.

The importance of voting

Morris Singer

What does it mean to be a responsible citizen? Among other things, it means to vote. And we thought all that "get-out-the-vote" hunter was over when the Bush team won the November election. Well, wrong.

There's actually an important election right around the corner, and it's happening in our own backyard — the town of Amherst. On March 29, Amherst voters will voice their opinions at the polls again, for the first time in 2005, and it will decide a great deal of the future of our town. As a candidate for Amherst Town Meeting from the Southwest Residential Area, and as a University of Massachusetts student, I urge all of us to take part in this event.

This election, despite what one may think, is important to us students. On the face of things, we have an election for Town Meeting representatives, the Select Board, the School Committee, the Jones Library Trustees and something as obscurely named as the Elector to the Oliver Smith Will. On top of that, the Town Meeting alone has 270 candidates running on the ballot in this election. It all sounds pretty crazy, right?

The bottom line is, the town of Amherst is listening, and they want to know what it's like for us to be students in this town. That's a big piece of what this election is all about.

Well, what if I said that this election will have very real implications for each and every one of us as UMass students and as part-time Amherst residents. And what if I said that a quick trip on the PVTA, and five minutes in line could change the way we live and feel as students in this town. That's a total of just a fraction of our day on the March 29.

One thing that is always very strange to me is the idea that people would not vote. In a democracy, we're all given the right to decide how our country, our state, and our town are run. Every so often, we're given a new chance to make an adjustment to the course of our governance. Even for those who aren't "into politics," I would think it would be a good time to get out there and voice our opinions. The bottom line is, the town of Amherst is listening, and they want to know what it's like for us to be students in this town. That's a big piece of what this election is all about.

The election on March 29 is also an historic one, in that there is a question about changing the form of government we have in this town. Maybe we've seen all those yellow signs all over Amherst in the center, down University Drive, or elsewhere. The people who put those signs up are asking us to take the government we have now — an efficient, cost-effective, representative and Democratic government — and replace it with one that is costly and exclusionary. It would mean a new "charter" government with a mayor and a town council of nine people that, to put it lightly, could have a very real bearing on how it feels to be a student in this town. Five minutes of our time to vote "no," and light this elitist charter is a small price to pay to ensure an improvement of our condition as students.

The rundown on our voting situation is as follows: Many of us are already registered to vote in Amherst because of steps we took in the previous presidential election. For those of us who are, here is where we vote: If you live in Southwest, you are either in Precinct 10, or Precinct 4 — both of which vote at the Bangs Community Center (behind Rao's Coffee). If you live in Orchard Hill or in Central, you are in Precinct 2 and you vote at the North Fire Station at 601 East Pleasant Street (near Yellow Lot 15). If you live in Northeast or in Sylvan, you live in Precinct 3, and you vote at the Immanuel Lutheran Church at 867 North Pleasant Street (between the Lederle Graduate Research Center and the Puffton Village Apartments). All locations are easily accessible via PVTA bus.

It's simple and easy to vote. If you believe in democracy, your freedom and your security as a student and a human being, go vote. It is extremely important. Let's get out there on March 29 and show the town of Amherst that we are not simply a transient student population to be ignored. Let's show them what we think and let's make a difference.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A BITTERSWEET GOODBYE

I am delighted that the remaining two trumpeter swans have been moved to a waterfowl sanctuary. From my office window in Morrill, I kept an eye on the swans. There aren't many trumpeter swans on Earth (fewer than the number of humans on this campus), and there were only sixty-some in the 1930s, so in addition to their sweet personalities and natural beauty, they were quite rare.

Although most people treated the UMass swans with kindness, some did not. I frequently heard the distress calls of the swans from my office, and I would invariably have to jog out to the pond to ask a thoughtless person to keep his or her dog away from the swans, or, more ridiculously, to stop jumping up and down and threatening them.

These folks always seemed to think that the swans were aggressive and that they — being humans! — needed to assert themselves. Rather, with clipped wings, the swans realized from experience that they couldn't escape a serious threat, and that their only defense was to flap their wings and try to appear threatening when approached by loud, fast-moving humans and dogs. Turning and running would have invited pursuit. So, they lived stressful and difficult lives here.

All of us who treasured time spent in their gentle company now miss them, but feel peace of mind knowing that they are now living a far better life than we could provide for them. I applaud the Physical Plant people for making this difficult, but humane, decision.

A CALL TO THE STUDENT BODY

In my four years at this university, I have hoped, prayed and pleaded that we have a strong, unified, and efficient Student Government Association. To no one's surprise, my hopes are unfulfilled, my prayers unanswered and my pleas have fallen on deaf ears. I was involved in Student Government for three years, mainly as Southwest Area Government's Treasurer but with one year as and Executive Cabinet member, and have seen three presidents and three trustees.

SGA elections end today, and I would like to give the student body a prospective from a graduating senior who has a lot of experience with Student Government. When going to the polls today, make your decision based on at least three variables: experience, initiatives and their hopes for the future. I am positive that if you examine these three points that you will all vote for Sean Bliss for Student Body President and Craig Goldschmidt for Student Trustee.

Experience

Craig Goldschmidt has been involved in Student Government for three years with positions being held in two branches of the SGA. He is extremely competent and knowledgeable of how the SGA runs and has some great ideas on making the SGA function to help students. His running mate, Sean Bliss, is a current senator who has sponsored over 12 motions and has many acclaims that I will mention shortly. Their opponents have experience limited to half a year to a year of experience per candidate, and that speaks for itself.

Initiatives

As I mentioned before, Sean Bliss has sponsored an enormous amount of motions that are changing the way students live on this campus at this very moment. His initiatives include equipping every bathroom in the residential areas with paper towels and providing recycling machines in the Dinning halls, both that will be implemented by the end of the semester. Craig has protected student's rights this year by serving as Attorney General. As a senator he had numerous initiatives that I will not go through here for space limitation.

Hopes for the Future

The ticket I am in great support of promotes a platform that includes, RSO empowerment, working for students, sustaining agencies and support programs, keeping agencies in student hands, cheaper textbooks, bathroom improvements, recycling machines at every Ding common with UCard access, road safety, building a Southwest Student Center and smaller classes. Their opponents promote not working with the administration and continuing the inefficiency of the SGA.

I have laid out the facts. I urge all students to examine the candidates experience, initiatives, and hopes and make the decision that will make them proud as students and alumni of this university. I am confident that the student body will choose Sean Bliss for Student Body President and Craig Goldschmidt for Student Trustee.

Video game school gives path to game design

BY ANNIE MUSKE-DUKES
DAILY TROJAN

LOS ANGELES — The path to becoming a video-game designer is a difficult one. Fortunately, the University of Southern California is not the only school to offer training in video game production.

The DigiPen Institute of Technology was the first school to offer formal game-related training in 1988 and was the first school in the world to offer a bachelor's degree program in game programming in 1996.

DigiPen was created because the founders noticed how many new employees of game companies did not have the proper background and had to learn new skills on the job, said Raymond Yan, senior vice president of operations at DigiPen.

Computer-science schools existed at the time, but simulation is a very specialized part of computer science that was not well covered, he said.

"If you think about a computer, it's a stupid machine, it only understands 'on' and 'off,'" Yan said. "It's like saying 'here's a whole bunch of light switches, go and make "Halo."'

High-player expectations have also made games more complicated, Yan said. Most the games are made in around two years and cost $6 million to $9 million to produce.

"It's way beyond an 'Asteroids' game," Yan said. "They want, they want, they want. It's like a complex puzzle."

To help create better programmers to put the puzzle together, DigiPen added a master's degree program last fall.

This program lets students with other computer science degrees come to DigiPen and gain production experience, Yan said. The school is also hoping to offer a Ph.D. program in the near future.

"With 3-D graphics, AI and networking, there's so much to know," Yan said. "Even with our 150 credits, there's not enough."

But DigiPen's students learn more than enough to succeed in the workplace. More than 80 percent of the graduates already have jobs lined up when they graduate, with a starting salary of $45,000 to $50,000 a year, said Yan.

The school gives students many opportunities to find work, Yan said, including access to special internships at Nintendo and other companies and career fairs just for DigiPen's seniors.

DigiPen initially focused on teaching 3-D graphics, but partnered with Nintendo in 1991 and began to offer programming courses. Founded in Vancouver, British Columbia, DigiPen is now located in an old Nintendo warehouse in Redmond, Wash. Nintendo, Microsoft and other major gaming companies now serve on the board of directors of the school.

Approximately 30 students attended the school when it was first founded. Now, enrollment is about 630. Many come straight out of high school or have taken some community college courses to increase their math skills. The average entering age is about 19, Yan said.

The school follows a four-year curriculum, and in addition to the expected courses in math, physics and programming, students might also take courses in voice-acting animation (which teaches expressiveness, proper voice synching, etc.), mythology for game designers (a course that focuses on the idea of a hero's journey) and introductory law courses to satisfy requirements.

Despite the intensity of the program, where students can be in the school 10 hours a day, six days a week, Yan said, the school has received a 93 percent student-satisfaction rating, according to the team summary report of the Accrediting Commission of Career Schools and Colleges of Technology.

DigiPen also offers summer courses in video game programming, 3-D animation and robotics that are open to beginners.

"There is a need for a solid, real, understanding of how games are produced," Yan said.

"We're not a typical university; we're very specialized," Yan said. "[Our students] are not dependent on someone's clip art."

The last great icon of Jamaican music wows at Pearl Street

BY NATHAN ROTHSTEIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It may have been a cold, blustery night in March on the outside, but there was a fire burning bright in the ballroom of the Pearl Street Nightclub.

There was a blazing legend in the building, and the energy he brought sent massive heat waves through the crowd. Ten days before his 57th birthday, Jimmy Cliff was still gyrating and rocking to a mixed crowd of college students and grandparents. Backed by a talented band, Cliff went through his ultimate collection as though he just made the songs. He was boastful and happy, yet innocent and unassuming. While his band mates wore red, Cliff sported a flashy yellow outfit that made him standout physically, yet spiritually he was just another man who loved music — a man who played reggae music exceptionally well.

After smiling and singing his way through a couple hits, including Cat Stevens, "Wild World," Cliff stopped the music and turned the concert into a heart-felt political demonstration. As he mentioned the inequality of a violent world, he pleaded with Tony Blair and George Bush to remember one thing: not to turn Iraq into another "Vietnam." As soon as he said "V-," the band measured up, played their notes, and while the crowd screamed their approval, Cliff roared into his song. "Vietnam" tells the story of a friend who goes there, and reassures Cliff he will return shortly. It is a physically and emotionally charged song that brought the crowd into the arms of Jimmy Cliff. Now that he had their attention, he could showcase his legendary talent, and so he did.

Cliff also knew what the crowd wanted to see, and did not shy away from his role in the film, "The Harder They Come." To segue into his hits from the soundtrack, Cliff did a small rendition of his most famous scene from the film. His powerful monologue once again ended with the first words of the song. As he finished saying, "The Harder They Come, The Harder They Fall," the band quickly two-timed into an electric version of one of his greatest songs.

Throughout the concert, Cliff took momentary breaks to showcase the talents of his extraordinary band, and his exquisite dance moves.

Even at 56, Cliff proved he could still shake, rattle and roll as he did forty years ago. When James Brown comes to Northampton next month, he can only hope he acts and looks as young as Cliff did on this night.

A little after eleven, Cliff and his band left the stage, but the crowd did not move. Not waiting for any energy loss, Cliff returned to the stage and performed another heart-felt tune. Once again, he left, but the crowd roared for more. Again, Cliff came on and performed to an ecstatic crowd. It was a beautiful end to a superb performance by one of Jamaica's music legends.

Festival is keeping Texas wired

BY CARY DARLING
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

Chris Gore was hoping to premiere his new project, "My Big Fat Independent Movie," at Sundance. The send-up of art-house cliches, which skewers such indie faves as "Amelie" and "Run Lola Run," seemed to be a natural for the prestigious showcase for nonmainstream films. But Sundance turned him down, and Gore couldn't be happier.

Instead, he's having his debut at South by Southwest, the Austin, Texas, annual film and music bash that doesn't seem to be losing any of its cool quotient or commercial heat as it closes in on its 20th birthday.

"I love South by Southwest," the producer/writer/actor enthuses. "This movie is a broad comedy making fun of indie films and, while we hoped to screen it at Sundance, they didn't choose the movie because it does mock that elitism that Sundance is notorious for. In New York or LA, it's big business. You think, 'Why are people such jerks?' At South by Southwest, it's a breath of fresh air."

The annual South by Southwest, which began Friday and runs through March 20, started in 1987 as a regional music conference/festival attended by 700 people. Since then, it has exploded into a national media event, adding film and Internet components in 1994 and luring more than 15,000 people last year. That's just counting those who signed up for the conferences, not the hangers-on, night owls and locals who help pack clubs and screenings.

And the Internet/Interactive portion of this multimedia trifecta will be especially potent this year, with "Blink" and "The Tipping Point" author Malcolm Gladwell and blog heroine Wonkette (Ana Marie Cox) among the speakers.

Yet, despite ballooning into what the Austin Convention and Visitors Bureau says is a $29.3 million boost to the local economy, it's still viewed by many as "alternative," but in a good way, and an affably Texan antidote to smug bi-coastal attitudes.

"It's known as a place where potentially interesting things come out. A lot of documentaries come out of there," says Dana Harris, an LA-based film reporter for Variety, of the film festival. "I want it to succeed and grow, but there's something really nice where, at this point, it's like this cool secret."

"It's a nice combination of good films and a good vibe," says Eamonn Bowles, president of Magnolia Pictures, which is showing the anticipated documentary "Enron: The Smartest Guys in the Room" at SXSW.

David Fenkel, marketing executive director at THINKfilm, which is showcasing five movies at SXSW, including the acclaimed "Murderball," likes the eclectic audiences the Austin festival attracts.

"You have crowds of people coming to Austin for film and music, so it spans more than just a regional film festival," he says. "At Sundance, a lot of films are received positively, and it's difficult to see how that translates into the world outside of Park City (Utah). With South by Southwest, you get a much better understanding of how the film is perceived by the industry and filmgoers."

That's exactly what film festival producer Matt Dentler is aiming for. "We certainly don't want to be another Sundance," he says. "What we are hoping to do is create our own niche, catering to both industry and audience. That's something that's rare at a film festival; it's usually one or the other."

Interest in South by Southwest has spilled far across U.S. borders. Australian filmmaker Pip Mushin is making the long trip with his movie about a struggling playwright, "Josh Jarman."

"It's a great opportunity to see how the press reacts to the film as well as the general public," he says via e-mail. "And a good screening at South by Southwest can do wonders for a film, in terms of buyers."

But if the film world is still rapturously in love with South by Southwest, it might be presumed that for those on the music end, who've endured the crowds and the hype for many more years, the bloom would be long off this Texas rose. After all, there are nearly 1,300 acts set to perform this year. That's a lot of spilled Shiner Bock and smoke-choked club air.

"It's still very much an important and incredible festival," says Amy Doyle, music programming vice president for MTV, MTV2 and MTVU.

MTV is airing a special on SXSW in April. "It's still the place to be for musical tastemakers," Doyle says.

"I definitely don't think it's over. It's risen in esteem," says Caryn Ganz, associate editor of Spin, who's attending the festival and plans to devote two to three pages to it in an upcoming issue. "Last year, there was Franz Ferdinand, before they broke on the charts. ... Still, it's a place for small bands."

One of those "small bands" is Fort Worth's Black Tie Dynasty, which will be making its SXSW debut March 19.

"I don't really know what to expect," says singer/guitarist Cory Watson, who notes that iTunes has approached the group about doing a cross-promotion during the festival. "I just know that big things happen at South by Southwest, and I'm hoping it happens to us."

Sean McCullough, guitarist for Albuquerque's the Oktober People, which also is making its first appearance, is a touch more skeptical. "I have kind of mixed feelings," he says. "There's just so much going on, and there's a ton of people ... I don't expect much to come of it. Other bands have had huge hopes, and nothing happens. There are so many bands, it's hard to get seen by anyone who would care."

Jack Fields of New Orleans' Blackfire Revelation takes it all with several boxes of salt.

"We're not the kind of guys who get dressed up for the one day of school for the class picture," he says. "I kind of feel sorry for the people who are thinking they're going to find the big record deal off playing one show. If they really believe that, I'm not the only one laughing at them."

One grumble that's heard every year is that SXSW is pursuing the global next big-label thing at the expense of the local. South by Southwest creative director Brent Grulke has heard it all before.

"Perception is somewhat difficult to manage," he says. "The real truth is that because of the sheer number of acts, we have more Austin acts than ever before and more regional acts than ever before."

As for the festival getting too big and unwieldy, few seem to feel it's overwhelming _ yet.

"Eventually, it could happen," says Variety's Harris. "But it's like that slogan 'Keep Austin Weird.' The core elements in Austin don't change, and I don't think it's going to change, either."

There is a way you can experience South by Southwest without the hassle of huge crowds, wrong wristbands, high gas prices and busted eardrums: Use your iPod.

Go to www.citizenpod.com and download the SXSW4Pod music festival schedule, where you can search by act, date, club name or musical style to find out who's playing where. But, wait, there's more. The entire Showcasing Artist mp3 library, more than 750 full-length files, is also available for download. So you still can do some major eardrum damage after all.

Pull the top down and cruise

The Mix Tape
Matt O'Rourke

Although it may not feel like it, spring has finally arrived, and who doesn't look forward to driving with windows open and the top down? Well if speeding down the freeway isn't quite your cup of tea, perhaps classic rock is. This week's tape aims to create a collection of some of the best songs to drive to, and perhaps give a jumpstart into spring.

"Crazy Train" – Ozzy Osbourne (4:56)

"All aboard..." screams the dark lord of metal (and MTV star) Ozzy Osbourne. There's almost no better way to begin a spring drive, and "Crazy Train" provides the edge needed for a road trip. Guitar is heavy, but not too over the top (well, at least not for some listeners), maintaining a steady tempo with double-bass drum lilling in the spaces. It's not hard to understand what makes this song so attractive- the guitar fills are simply brilliant. Lyrically speaking, the song is well crafted. Amazingly, Osbourne even offers some words of wisdom for all. "Maybe its not too late/ to learn how to love, and forget to hate." Maybe he's not as incoherent as we think he is — at least he wasn't at one point in time.
(Jet, 1980)

"Start Me Up" – The Rolling Stones (3:34)

"Spread out the oil, the gasoline/ I walk smooth, ride in a mean, mean machine/Start it up." If Osbourne was too heavy to begin your drive with, don't fret. The Rolling Stones have the solution. The guitar is catchy, but what makes the tune memorable is the persistent shouting of "Start me up!". Keith Richards seems to sing along with Mick Jagger, as a backup vocalist in the form of a guitar. Sex references aside, the Stones never fail to provide stellar songwriting — a type of clockwork where every instrument matters, creating a full, unique sound.
(Virgin, 1981)

"Layla" – Eric Clapton (7:06)

The first rock epic of this week's tape, "Layla" can be played at high speed or on a Sunday morning drive — depending on the version you choose. For the purposes of this tape, I've chosen the original version. Considered to be one of the best guitar players of all time, "Layla" easily showcases Clapton's talent. However, that talent also transfers to piano — as the second movement of the song begins. One can still hear Clapton's soaring guitar, accompanied now also by an acoustic guitar. Easily one of the best songs ever written, this track can and should be played on long trips.
(Atco, 1972)

"Brand New Cadillac" – The Clash (2:08)

The second track off of The Clash's timeless album "London Calling," "Brand New Cadillac" is short and sweet. Rocking in an old-fashioned tribute to 1960s pop-rock, the song is laden with guitar and a simple-yet-pleasing cymbal bell rhythm. Joe Strummer sings "drriiive!" and the song proves to be a good interlude between heavier tracks.
(Epic 1979)

"Rock and Roll"- Led Zeppelin (3:40)

As the theme for Cadillac commercials for the past year or so, it's only appropriate for "Rock and Roll" to follow up "Brand New Cadillac." However, the song should be played while racing to your favorite weekend hot spot — no Cadillac needed. Unlike the previous tracks where the guitar was the focus, John Bonham's drums make this track worth playing. The pumping rhythm is certain to make you pump the gas and drum all over the steering wheel and in fact may even warrant a repeat on your CD player. The perfect weekend anthem, if the drums don't make you let loose, then Robert Plant's near-screeching falsettos will. Just try to avoid getting a speeding ticket.
(Atlantic, 1971)

"Won't Get Fooled Again" – The Who (8:32)

The second of our two rock epics for this week, The Who's masterpiece "Won't Get Fooled Again" is the closer for the mix-tape. A perfect combination of drums and guitar, "Won't Get Fooled Again" has been featured on everything from commercials to a "CSI: Miami" series on CBS. Pete Townshend and Keith Moon's talents merge with the well-known synthesizer-keyboard loop to create one of the most classic tracks in rock history. Its almost as if Moon and Townshend are competing for attention during the eight minutes, racing against one another for speed and quality-perfect for an old fashioned car race. Yet in the end, the two are locked together with Roger Daltrey's final shout, and declaration of "meet the new boss." The Who's "Won't Get Fooled Again" is perfect for the end of a long trip, or simply declaring yourself "king/queen of the road."

UM should play one

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Due to unplayable field conditions, the Massachusetts softball team's (8-9) home opener against Syracuse was cancelled yesterday. This marks the eighth game of the season that was wiped off the schedule for UMass, which faces off in a doubleheader against Dayton tomorrow. Despite the fact that the players are disappointed about all of the cancelled games so far this season, they continue to look forward.

"We are disappointed that we don't get to play," senior shortstop Hillary Puglia said, "but it just means that we get more practice time in for the next game."

Tomorrow's game against Dayton will mark the first game against a fellow Atlantic 10 team and the first non-invitational game of the season. Last time the Minutewomen took the field against an Atlantic 10 opponent was in last season's A-10 Championship, when UMass was upset 4-3 against Temple at the UMass Softball Complex. While the Maroon and White won the 2004 regular season crown, the players are using that postseason loss as a source of motivation.

"That loss hurt all of us more than any loss," senior pitcher Barb LaFogg said. "We take pride in saying that we're the A-10 champs, and we couldn't do that after last season. So we have to take care of it, and we will take care of it."

The Minutewomen and coach Elaine Sortino begin their quest for another A-10 championship tomorrow, but will have to get by Dayton first. One player that UMass looks to shut down is outfielder Cassie Gross, who holds a batting average of .421 and has hit four homeruns in the Flyers' 11 games this season.

UMass senior KJ Kelley matches those four homeruns this season, and is one away from tying the Minutewomen all-time record. Although the Maroon and White are seen as being the favored team in all of its Atlantic 10 games, the team understands that no victory is certain.

"We just have to attack them first so that they fold quickly," Puglia said. "As long as we come out of the gates ready to go, we'll be fine."

Despite hitters like Kelley, Puglia and newcomer Lauren Proctor putting up massive numbers offensively, the team has leaned on LaFogg to lead the way. Teammates admit that LaFogg has surpassed expectations so far this season with her solid numbers (6-6, 2.88 ERA, 69 SO), and LaFogg is making sure that her last full season (and first) is one that will not result in any regrets.

"That's been exactly my mentality this year," LaFogg said. "For every game, every practice, I play with complete emotion because I don't want any regrets. When I play like that, the team wins, and us winning is the most important part."

LaFogg is a former transfer from Seton Hall who had to sit out her first season at UMass, making 2005 the first starting season of her collegiate softball career. Other players that have been impressing both teammates and Sortino, include Proctor, fellow freshman Sarah Hurd and senior Denise Denis who is second on the team in RBI.

If tomorrow's doubleheader is played (rain is forecasted in Dayton), UMass is scheduled to play the home opener Tuesday against Central Connecticut, but field conditions may not be suitable in time. The first game against Dayton begins tomorrow at 1p.m.

Spiess leads UM past Temple

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team (9-6 1-0 Atlantic 10) kicked off its conference schedule on the right foot yesterday by beating the Temple Owls (3-7 2-1 A-10) 4-3 in Philadelphia.

Overall, the Minutewomen looked strong against their conference rivals.

"This match today was really intense. You don't see it just looking at the results, but UMass and Temple are a big rivalry," UMass assistant coach Celeste Frey said.

Starring for the Maroon and White was sophomore Michele Spiess.

"She really stepped it up at the end when we needed her to," Frey said.

Spiess began her singles match in the No. 2 slot by taking the first set 6-3. However, she then dropped her second set 6-0 and needed a strong showing in the third to win the match. She was able to turn her performance around and ultimately win the match with a score of 6-0 in the final set.

"Michele lost the second set, but she stepped up in the third to gain us the point," Frey said.

Also winning singles matches for the Minutewomen were junior Dorothy Iwanowicz and senior Sasha Edelstein. Iwanowicz was able to win her match at No. 3 in straight sets, 6-3, 6-3. Edelstein was also able to gain a point by winning her match at No. 4 easily, 6-1, 6-1.

In the end, the Minutewomen split their singles matches with the Owls. Dropping their matches were junior Susan Johnson at No. 5, junior Jana Bartolini at No. 6 and freshman Masha Pozar at No. 1.

Frey commented that although Pozar wasn't able to come out of her match with a victory, she still put up a good fight.

"Masha played well, but it was against a senior so the difference in experience really showed on the court," Frey said.

The assistant coach also noted that all of the underclassmen on this young team, not just Pozar, are able to contribute.

"All of their play has really helped us out this season. They are all able to play at the top of our lineup," Frey said.

Today the Maroon and White are back in action, taking on defending Atlantic 10 champion Richmond Spiders (6-6). The Spiders come in winning four of their last five matches.

Loyola on tap for Minutemen

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Sometimes a team's record doesn't tell the whole story.

Such is the case for Loyola College, which is 2-3 and is prepped to face the Massachusetts men's lacrosse (5-1 0-0 ECAC) team tomorrow at Geppi-Aikens Field in Baltimore, Md. for a 1 p.m. face-off.

Loyola (2-3 1-0 ECAC) will be the first ECAC opponent the Minutemen face this season. The Greyhounds played their first conference game on Saturday, a 6-3 home victory over St. John's.

The Greyhounds started the 2005 campaign with three straight losses to Towson, Penn State and Duke, respectively. Both Towson and Duke are currently ranked in the top-15 in the country, with the 6-0 Blue Devils ranked No. 6 and the Tigers slated at No. 12. The Nittany Lions were ranked No. 19 when they defeated Loyola, but have since lost two in a row.

Although it has a losing record, Loyola has outscored its opponents 43-39 this season, using a particularly spread out offense. The Greyhounds have 15 players that have scored a goal this year, three more than players who have notched an assist.

"They have a lot of guys contributing, no doubt about it. In a scouting sense, it's hard to prepare," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "It's a lot easier to prepare for one guy or two guys than 10 or 11 guys, but that's part of the challenge. That's part of the challenge this weekend."

Over the past two games, both of which were at home, Loyola has been on fire. The Greyhounds have scored a combined 19 goals, most of which coming from a 13-7 drubbing of Wagner on March 15.

The Minutemen, however, have been one of the best teams in the country since losing its only game of the season to Albany 10-9, also on the 15th.

UMass has gone 2-0 since, with dominating victories over then-No. 17 Brown 12-5 on March 19 and an 8-3 defensive showcase against Stony Brook on Tuesday. During this run, the Minutemen have shutout their opponents in four quarters, two in each game.

The Minutemen, however, have never had a successful outing against the Greyhounds, going 0-8 all time. Loyola has a definitive home-field advantage, with both of their victories coming on familiar turf this season.

The last time the two teams met was during the 2000 season. Loyola won the game 21-10.

"You look at this game and we've never beaten those guys, we're 0-8 all time. I'm sure that's on their mind as I'm sure it's on some of our guys minds," Cannella said.

Adding to this is the fact that Loyola opens up what Cannella hopes will be a successful ECAC season. The Greyhounds join St. Johns and Hobart as new members to the ECAC and present the challenge of unfamiliarity.

There is also an added sense of urgency as the Maroon and White return home to play longtime rival Penn State next Saturday.

"Anytime you get into conference play, there is a sense of urgency and there should be," Cannella said. "I think there is a sense of urgency in every game, but then you get into your conference, and you're in it to win it."

Cannella is pleased with the way his team has played thus far but is quick to mention that his squad is taking this season one game at a time. Even with its last two dominating performances, UMass is humbled by its coach who learned on March 15, that anyone can win on a given day.

"I tell the guys that for every game. There is a team that is good enough to beat us and if you don't think that way, you will get beat," Cannella said. "Of course we have confidence in our ability, but we have to play to the best of our ability to win the game."

Part of the defensive efficiency has come from the outstanding effort of senior goalkeeper Bill Schell. Schell recorded the second-highest save total in his career with 14 in UMass' victory over Stony Brook and seven against Brown, with five in the fourth quarter.

Schell, surrounded by a senior-clad defense, has been lights-out this season. Cannella attributes this to a confidence built through continuity, but again was quick the mention that they need to approach each game with the same aggressiveness.

"As long as that group plays with the intensity that they have played with, they will do well. It's not about yesterday, it's about tomorrow," Cannella said. "There's some confidence on that side of the field with the players and the coaches as well, but you're only as good as your next one. It's an old cliché, but I think it should be that you're only as good as your next one."

St. Hilaire runs lax practice

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will visit New Hampshire this weekend to compete in its seventh game of the season. It is the first game of a two-game road swing that will end at Boston College Saturday, April 2.

The Minutewomen have been working out the kinks after a humbling loss to the Hofstra Pride, 14-8 at Garber Field on Wednesday.

Senior captain Kristin St. Hilaire took over the coaching duties at practice on Thursday in place of coaches Carrie Bolduc and Tracey Down, who were out scouting Hofstra's weekend opponent. St. Hilaire and the rest of the Minutewomen are going back to basics to try to prepare for this weekend.

"We're just trying to stay positive right now," St. Hilaire said. "We're working on turnovers, especially in games, and were trying to focus on taking individual responsibility for them."

The Minutewomen, who have committed 109 turnovers in six games while forcing just 48, are going to extreme measures to try and work out the problem.

"We actually took out our stat sheets to look at our turnovers versus opponents and who is actually turning the ball over during games," St. Hilaire said. "We're starting to take personal responsibility for that and working through it."

The women's lacrosse team has faced New Hampshire 33 times, the most of any opponent in the teams' history. Out of those 33 games, UMass has compiled a record of 15-16-2 against UNH. Combine that record with a thrilling double-overtime game last season, and this series cannot get much tighter.

"We'd like to take care of them in the first 60 minutes," St. Hilaire said. "It's always a tough game when we play UNH. They are a lot like us. We're both physical teams, and neither of us give up so it's always a fight to the end."

Working out the turnover problem is a given for the Minutewomen, but there also needs to be a focus on another reoccurring problem. UMass was up 3-2 against No. 10 Hofstra in the first half on Wednesday, then the Pride came out with five straight goals in the second to deflate UMass' chances. On March 12, the Minutewomen played the No. 15 ranked Syracuse Orangemen and fought hard in the first half to keep the game close at 7-5, but the Orange scored four straight to start the second.

So what does UMass need to do to win?

"Play an actual 60 minute game. I don't think we've done that all year," St. Hilaire said.

The coaches and captains are well aware of the lapses and are frustrated by how close the team has gotten to breaking through.

"It happened again against Hofstra," St. Hilaire said of the team's stalls. "We came out and played the first half excellent and then they came out and made adjustments and we didn't react to them.

"This weekend we have to be ready for whatever they throw at us and shut it down."

Torra tries to get team rolling

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

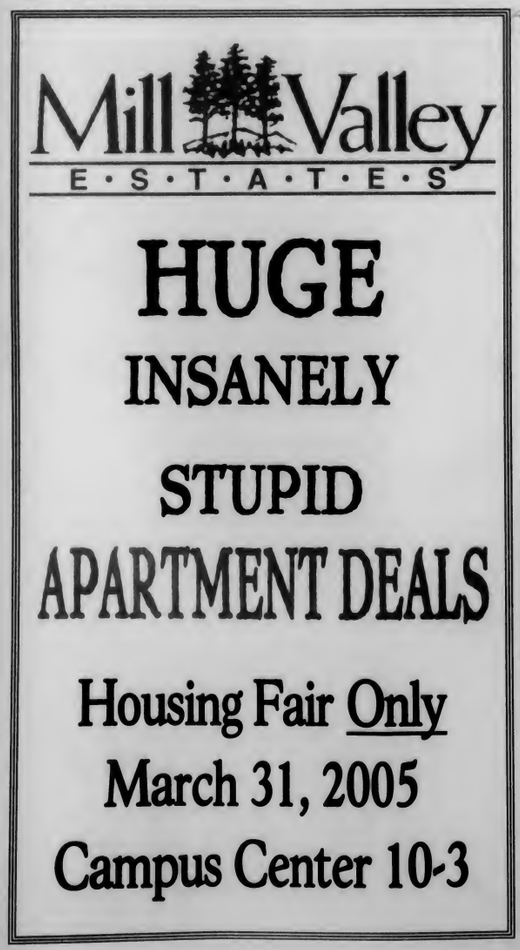
After losing its last four games, the Massachusetts baseball team will be looking to rebound from a slow start when it travels to battle another struggling team, Xavier, in a Saturday doubleheader. Then, on Sunday, the Minutemen will play a game at Hayden Field in Cincinnati, Ohio, with each game set to start at noon.

Both teams have struggled to chalk up notches in the win column, as the Minutemen have won only three out of 13 games this season, though the Musketeers are struggling just as much at UMass, sporting 5-16 record in 2005. Xavier is also riding a six-game losing streak.

But UMass has dominated the all-time series in the past, as it is 10-0 against XU since Xavier joined the Atlantic 10 in 1995.

"We're just trying to take advantage of the opportunity presented to us," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We need to play better offensively and defensively, but I feel good about having [Matt] Torra on the mound. We just need to get people on base and manufacture some runs."

Torra has been impressive on the mound in his first four starts. Torra is 1-1 with a 0.90 ERA. He has struck out 39 batters while walking seven, and opponents are hitting .194 against him. Torra was named Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week on March 13. The junior hurler will be starting the first game on Saturday.



Offensively, however, the Maroon and White have not fared as well at the plate so far, displaying a .181 team batting average, and have been kept scoreless over their last 21.1 innings.

"When two of your top-three hitters are injured, you are not in ideal situation," Stone said. "Those are our veterans, but we've got to deal with it. What can you do?"

The Musketeers have struggled on offense as well with a .247 team batting average, but one player in blue and gray has got off to a hot start this season. Senior outfielder Jay Johnson is hitting .319 with three homeruns, 18 runs, 15 runs batted in and 22 hits.

"We are looking for a low scoring game, because we've got a good pitcher on the mound in Torra," Stone said. "We just need to get people on base."

The second game on Saturday will feature Brian Doherty on the mound, who was outdueled by preseason All-American Nick Hill of Army, 3-0, in his last appearance. Jermey Demers will pitch Sunday for the Maroon and White.

It's college hockey's third season, and it begins tomorrow afternoon in Amherst.

The NCAA Northeast Regional kicks off at the Mullins Center at noon with Denver set to do battle with Bemidji State, and the puck is slated to drop for the second game at 3:30 p.m. between two New England Schools, New Hampshire and Harvard.

The two winners will play at noon on Sunday for a free ticket to Columbus, Ohio, to play in the Frozen Four with a chance to be crowned king of the college hockey world.

Here is a breakdown and scouting report of the four teams in the Amherst bracket:

No. 1 Denver vs. No. 4 Bemidji State

On paper, or to the average college hockey fan or United States citizen, this matchup truly showcases the new-school version of David verse Goliath.

Denver plays the roll of defending national champion, and Bemidji State, located in the northern part of Minnesota, plays the roll of the obvious underdog. Denver coach George Gwozdecky wants nothing to do with that theory, though.

"This team is not like last year's team," Gwozdecky said. "It has a completely different identity. Last year's team was a championship team, but I have no idea what this year's team can accomplish. I would hope that this team can move on to the Frozen Four, but for that to happen, lots of work has to be done.

"Bemidji State is the hidden strength of this tournament. No one really knows who they are, but when you watch them on tape, you realize they are talented, a great team, and they have solid defense and goaltending."

Pioneer fans can't ask much more of their team after winning a championship, as they have a high-powered offense, a stingier defense than last year (allowing 2.62 goals per game as opposed to 2.73 a season ago), and two goalies who have each seen a solid share of time in net.

Rookie Peter Mannino has been the better of the two netminders, statistically at least. He has a .921 save percentage in comparison to his sophomore counterpart, who has a not-so-inspiring .890 save percentage. Mannino is also allowing a little more than a half-goal less per game than his elder teammate.

The Pioneers can score with the best that college hockey has to offer, too. Fourteen players have scored at least 10 points, seven have at least 10 assists and seven have at least 10 goals. Gabe Gauthier leads the team in points (20-26-46), Luke Fulghum leads the team with 21 goals, and Brett Skinner is the team-leader with 30 assists.

On the other side of the ice, the lesser-known Beavers are making their first trip to the Division I NCAA tournament since becoming a Division I program in 1999. What no one else knows, however, is that BSU has won more national championships than any other school in the tournament and has one of the most storied hockey programs in the nation.

"It's exciting for us, but we've been there many times," Bemidji coach Tom Serratore said. "We've got 13 national championships at the small-college level. Hockey is huge here. People are used to seeing hockey succeed here. They have high expectations for us and this hockey program."

Also working for the Beavers is the man they have stationed between the pipes. Freshman Matt Climie is the hottest goalie in the country, coming off two consecutive shutouts, eight consecutive scoreless periods and he has not allowed a goal in 171:06 of play. Climie hasn't allowed a goal since the first period in BSU's 4-1 win over Air Force on March 5.

And those two shutouts, 6-0 against Air Force in the CHA semifinals and 3-0 over Alabama-Huntsville in the CHA finals, mark the first time in history that any team has won its conference championship without allowing a goal.

"Climie is a terrific goaltender, and he has a great run going," Gwozdecky said. "We have to get traffic in front of the net and take away his eyes. We're going to have to create rebound opportunities to beat him."

The Beavers will once again be without their senior captain and CHA Player of the Year, Andrew Murray, who fractured his collarbone against Air Force on March 5.

An underlying story within this matchup is that Beavers coach Tom Serratore's brother, Frank, used to coach Denver. Frank Serratore coached the Pioneers for four years, but his contract was not renewed, and Gwozdecky took the program over in the spring of 1994.

No. 2 New Hampshire vs. No. 3 Harvard

Former Boston Bruin and first-year Crimson coach Ted Donato has instated a "no excuses" policy in his locker room this week.

They will shed no tears after losing the ECACHL Championship 3-1 to Cornell after beating Colgate 4-3 in double overtime the night before, and they will not whine about playing national powerhouse UNH in the first round of the 16-team tournament.

Harvard has been to the tournament four years in a row now and Donato was a player on the 1989 national championship team, so this group does know a thing or two about winning once Spring arrives. While winter was still in session, the Crimson knocked off three Hockey East teams.

"It gives us confidence that we've been able to beat BC once, BU once and Maine once," Donato said. "UNH is an excellent team, but we've still got a very good team. We expect a great challenge.

"UNH is a special team, offensively, and you've got to somehow find a way to keep up with them in scores and create enough offense. It will be a great challenge."

The Wildcats really turned it on once the Hockey East tournament started, sweeping Northeastern 2-0 by scores of 6-1 and 4-0 and then knocking BU out by a 5-2 margin.

But in the championship, Boston College played a relentless defense, not giving UNH a free inch of ice, cutting off all passing lanes and keeping the shots on goalie Cory Schneider relatively easy ones to handle.

That doesn't bode too well for the Cats now, as coach Dick Umile notes that Harvard plays a very similar defense to the Eagles.

"They really do [play a similar defense as Boston College]," Umile said. "They play a lot like the teams in our league, like BU and BC. Teddy [Donato] has done a really good job with that team, and this is going to be a good matchup.

"Harvard is a team that plays very well on defense, and they have great goaltending. We have to be able to create scoring opportunities, get through their defense and execute."

That is one thing UNH has done well all year. The Wildcats have 12 players who have notched at least 20 points this season, headlined by the nation's third leading scorer Sean Collins (18-36-54) and Preston Callander (24-29-53).

Players like that and the level of play that UNH has been at for a few weeks now has kept Umile optimistic.

"The thing that we can take out is that we played well enough to win," Umile said. "If we play like that, we will be tough to beat. We're playing good hockey, and we feel good about ourselves."

Let the third season begin.

UMass Vox hold protest against Wal-Mart

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

HADLEY – Protestors from various women's groups stood in the mud beside Route 9 outside Wal-Mart Thursday to protest the retailer's refusal to carry emergency contraception.

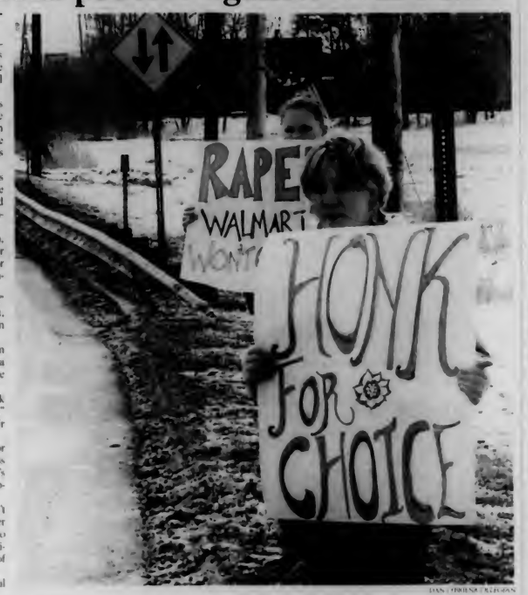
The protest, organized by UMass Vox: Voices for Choice, is part of a nationwide effort to convince Wal-Mart to carry emergency contraception, which is also known as the "morning after pill." All of the protestors emphasized that the morning after pill is not the same as RU-486, "the abortion pill."

"I don't quite feel that they understand that it's not the same thing as the abortion pill," said Janice Miles, a UMass senior who interns at Planned Parenthood in Springfield. "It just prevents pregnancy from happening, just like the birth control pill."

The protestors, including Linda Forman, President of UMass Vox, believe it's important for Wal-Mart to carry emergency contraception for women who have limited access to other pharmacies, such as those who live in rural areas.

"Wal-Mart is one of the biggest chains there is," Forman said. "We have access to CVS and Target, but some women don't. There only is a Wal-Mart in their neighborhood."

Wal-Mart should not have the final say in women's health, according to Christina Rex, a Planned Parenthood volunteer who joined the protest.



"They're stating it's an ethical issue, and I think it's not up to them to make the choice for people," Rex said. "I think it's the patient's call between their health care provider and [herself]."

Jess Parker, a UMass sophomore, a Voices for Choice member and a member of the UMass Women's Health Project says part of Wal-Mart's reasoning for not providing emergency contraception has to do with it's family image.

"It's a family kind of store... They probably don't want to look like they encourage unsafe sex," Parker said. "If they're providing people with materials to have sex... like condoms and Viagra, it's hypocritical of them to not deal with the consequences of that."

A statement released by Wal-Mart's national

Lombardi hands extention due to complaints

By MATT ELDER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After hearing many complaints over his "Draft Action Plan," University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi said that he would revise the plan and push back the public comment period.

The "Draft Action Plan" was Lombardi's response to the Commission for Campus Diversity's recommendations that it made about a month ago. The plan was posted on March 12 on the commission's Web site.

Originally, Lombardi had a public comment period slated to end on April 1. After over 100 UMass faculty members and students showed up at the Faculty Senate meeting on Thursday, Lombardi realized that he had to push the date back.

"It's great progress," said an upbeat Student Government President Eduardo Bustamante. On March 1, the 23-member commission posted its 86-page report on its Web site.

"I recognize that we probably need to go back and revise the plan," Lombardi said at the meeting. He added that the university has struggled with diversity for a long time.

On Thursday, more than 100 members of the UMass community spoke out about Lombardi's plan. In the Cape Cod Lounge, before the Faculty Senate meeting, Bustamante spoke out in a panel to oppose the draft.

Later in the day, at the Faculty Senate meeting, various people spoke out against Lombardi's plan. Many got agitated when they felt that Lombardi was ignoring them.

"It seems like there's an agenda being presented outside of the issue of diversity," said sociology professor Dan Clawson. "This suppresses free speech and the diversity of opinions."

Finally, Lombardi said what he intends to do about his report.

"We are eager to be sure everybody's voice will be heard," Lombardi said. "Their (students) sense of angst, their sense of pain is real."

Most people seem to have a problem with a section of Lombardi's report that says he will take over 40 student groups by placing them in a new center, the Center for Student Development.

Groups such as ALANA, Office of Jewish Affairs, and the SGA would fall under this new center. Many people expressed their frustration of the Center at the Faculty Senate meeting.

Bustamante was very upset at the thought of the SGA having to be run by the administration.

"I think students are adults. We don't need adults telling us what to do," he said.

To pay for the center, Lombardi would have to reallocate university funds, about $800,000, into a chancellor's tax. As a whole, the plan would cost over $1 million.

The head of the center would be a newly appointed Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Even though he didn't like the proposal as a whole, Bustamante said that there were portions of the draft that he thought were a step in the right direction, namely the academic recommendations.

"It's half of what we want," he said. Bustamante said that Lombardi's plan accepted all 12 of the commission's recommendations for academics, but rejected all 11 of the student affair's recommendations.

"It's so far off. It has nothing to do with diversity," he said.

To counter Lombardi's proposal, Bustamante compiled his own alternative plan that embraced all recommendations that the commission made.

Lombardi said that he would post Bustamante's plan on the commission's Web site.

Pope John II struggles to speak at Easter mass

By NICOLE WINFIELD
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ROME — Pope John Paul II's own suffering kept him away from his flock for the first time on Good Friday, but he appeared to the faithful via video, adding poignancy as Christians reflected on the suffering of Jesus on the most solemn day of the church calendar.

The thousands who gathered at the Colosseum for the Way of the Cross procession cheered and waved torches as the 84-year-old pontiff appeared on video screens. He was seen sitting alone in his chapel at the Vatican with his back to the camera, watching the ceremony on a television screen under the chapel's altar.

He didn't speak, and his face was never seen.

John Paul sent a message to the crowd that was read by his vicar for Rome, Italian Cardinal Camillo Ruini. In it, John Paul said he was spiritually among those at the Colosseum recalling Christ's last hours.

"I also offer my suffering, so that God's design is completed and his word walks among the people," he said in the message. "I am near all those who in these moments are tested by suffering. I pray for each of them."

Vatican TV had installed giant television screens at the Colosseum to allow the pope to appear via video linkup from the Vatican, but officials waited until the last minute to decide on the pope's appearance, depending on his health.

Images of John Paul at his Vatican chapel were broadcast several more times during the ceremony. Toward the end of the procession, John Paul was seen in the chapel, clutching a crucifix.

Thousands of people gathered for the haunting procession, and on the plateau overlooking the Colosseum where the pope used to sit there was a torch-lit cross.

"We will miss him but we know he's here, even if not physically," said Cecilia Padombo, a 20-year-old Italian Girl Scout who was giving out torches to the faithful.

The pope used to carry a lightweight wooden cross during the Colosseum procession, which symbolically traces Christ's path to the Crucifixion. He stopped in 2001 because of his difficulty in walking, but he would observe the procession from a chair and offer prayers to the crowds.

The pontiff's physical suffering has been evident for years as he battled Parkinson's disease and crippling hip and knee ailments. But it has worsened with the effects of breathing problems that prompted two hospitalizations and surgery to insert a tube in his throat last month.

John Paul has been absent for the major events of Holy Week, although he has appeared silently at his studio window twice this week and has delivered messages telling the faithful that he is spiritually near them as he recovers.

"It's very obvious that the pope is carrying a very heavy cross indeed, and he is giving a marvelous example of patience in the face of suffering, and of long suffering which in itself is a virtue," a top Vatican official, U.S. Archbishop John Foley, told Vatican Radio on Friday.

The pope hasn't spoken in public since shortly before he was released from the hospital March 13, and his only commitment during Holy Week is to deliver a blessing on Easter Sunday.

John Paul watched Holy Thursday services recalling the Last Supper of Christ on television from his Vatican apartment, and he relinquished another cherished tradition Friday morning when he didn't hear the confessions of faithful in St. Peter's Basilica.

U.S. Cardinal James Stafford stood in for John Paul for a Friday afternoon meditation service in the basilica. The preacher for the papal household, the Rev. Raniero Cantalamessa, delivered the homily and ended with a prayer that the pope recover quickly.

"Come back soon, Holy Father," he said. "Easter isn't Easter without you."

O'Malley allows closed church to hold Easter mass

By MICHAEL KUNZELMAN

SUDBURY, Mass. — Easter Mass at St. Anselm opened with a standing ovation and closed with the solemn lighting of a vigil candle. In between, parishioners in this suburban Boston town savored every moment of the church's first Mass since September.

Almost a year has passed since Archbishop Sean O'Malley announced the closing or consolidation of 80 parishes, a move brought on by the Boston Archdiocese's financial troubles and a shortage of priests.

For the past 197 days and counting, St. Anselm parishioners have kept a round-the-clock vigil inside the church while they appeal O'Malley's decision.

Easter, however, afforded the Sudbury parish a fleeting reprieve. For one day only, the archbishop dispatched priests to celebrate Mass for three of the churches he ordered closed, including St. Anselm.

"The fact that we have a priest here today is a sign of hope for the community that decisions will be changed," said Joe Ramrath, a deacon and 25-year member of the parish.

Others were more puzzled by O'Malley's move.

"Was he throwing us a bone? Was it a peace offering? Who knows what it could be. You take what you can get and keep plugging away," Sudbury resident Tish Oksanen said as she left the church with her husband and two young daughters.

More than 400 worshippers filled the church's pews for the occasion, roughly twice the crowd that usually showed up for Mass before St. Anselm closed.

"You can't even park here," Jane Murphy said as she entered the church with her 11-year-old son, Jack. "Why would they want to close it? It's crazy."

O'Malley picked the Rev. John Sassani, the archdiocese's director of spiritual development, to celebrate Mass at St. Anselm.

"I think (O'Malley) wants them to know that even though all of this difficulty has gone on, he still values them as members of the church," Sassani said after Mass.

The archbishop also allowed Easter Masses at St. Albert in Weymouth and at a local elementary school for parishioners of Mary Star of the Sea church in Quincy.

Parishioners are staging 24-hour vigils at other closed churches, including St. James the Great in Wellesley. Suzanne Hurley, who helped organize the vigil, said they asked for permission to hold an Easter Mass, but didn't get a response from the archdiocese. She accused O'Malley of playing favorites and pitting Catholics against each other.

"Part of it is pure politics," she said. "I think he sees St. Anselm and St. Albert as more of a threat because of their sheer size. Our vigil is smaller than theirs."

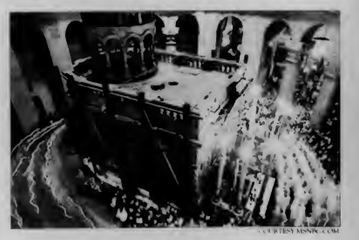
Jerusalem celebrates Easter

JERUSALEM (AP) — Thousands of Christians from around the world gathered at Jerusalem holy sites to celebrate Easter Sunday, marking the day with prayer and hymns.

The Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem, Michel Sabbah, the top Roman Catholic official in the Holy Land, celebrated Mass at the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, built over the skull-shaped rocky mount believed to be the place where Jesus was crucified.

More than 20 Armenian priests cloaked in black gowns and head dress followed Sabbah into the candlelit church singing the Lord's Prayer. The Catholic priest emerged from the Sepulcher with a flame and lit worshippers' candles, which gradually illuminated the painted dome ceiling erected in the Crusader era.

The Easter services underlined one of Christianity's doctrinal differences: Roman Catholics believe Jesus Christ was buried in the Holy Sepulcher, while many Protestant denominations believe he was buried in the nearby Garden Tomb.



The recent calm in Israeli-Palestinian fighting has attracted many more foreign pilgrims to Jerusalem this year for the Holy Week than in recent years. But the numbers were still lower than the several thousand who used to come before the outbreak of violence in September 2000.

Karen Abel, 59, a secretary from Eclectic, Ala., was among the Protestants gathered at sunrise to mark the day at the site of the Garden Tomb. She said she did not hesitate to make her first trip to the Holy Land.

Bix Baker, 53, and his wife Becky, 51, came from Minnesota to spend the Easter holiday with their daughter, who does consulting work for city officials in Ramallah.

Vox wants E.C. at Wal-Mart

DAN CORNISH/COLLEGIAN

UMass students Ashley Lessard, Laura Beltis and Linda Forman stand outside Wal-Mart in Hadley on Thursday.

Administration advisory board recently recommended that emergency contraception become available over-the-counter. The FDA later turned down the measure for political reasons, Forman believes.

"When the head of the FDA was up for reappointment, he was grilled by the Democrats for not legalizing emergency contraception over-the-counter," Forman said. "In the next couple of weeks, we're going to see a lot about that."

Many of the protestors felt that Wal-Mart's refusal to carry emergency contraception is very similar to an incident that happened at the CVS pharmacy on University Drive in Amherst where a pharmacist there denied birth control pills to a UMass student last fall.

"It makes no sense to me," Forman said. "If we want to prevent unplanned pregnancies, we need to offer people options."

By law, pharmacists can deny prescriptions to customers as long as they inform them of where they can obtain the drug. Wal-Mart's policy regarding a pharmacist's refusal to fill a prescription is very similar to the law.

Wal-Mart's official statement regarding this issue reads: "Wal-Mart pharmacists may decline to fill a prescription based on personal convictions. However, they must find another pharmacist, either at Wal-Mart or at another pharmacy, who can assist the customer by filling his/her prescription."

Several protestors feel that pharmacists should not have the right to deny customer's prescriptions.

"[Pharmacists] prescribe Viagra and not emergency contraception. I feel that's inappropriate," Forman said. "Wal-Mart] wants to have this family image, but they're really just devaluing our own choices and rights."

Afghanistan attack kills four

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — A land mine exploded under a U.S. vehicle south of Kabul on Saturday, killing four soldiers in the deadliest incident for American troops in Afghanistan in almost 10 months, the military said.

The blast highlighted the dangers still facing foreign and Afghan troops more than three years after the fall of the Taliban, although there were conflicting accounts about whether the mine was freshly laid or left over from Afghanistan's long wars.

A Taliban spokesman claimed responsibility for the blast. But U.S. spokeswoman Lt. Cindy Moore said investigators suspected the mine was an old charge dislodged by recent rain and snow or that the vehicle had wandered into an unmapped minefield.

The victims were among a group of American and Afghan officials scouting a potential site for a shooting range in Logar Province, 25 miles south of the Afghan capital, when one of their three vehicles hit the mine, Moore said.

The bodies of the four dead, none of whom was identified, were airlifted to the main U.S. base at Bagram, Moore said.

About 17,000 U.S. troops are in Afghanistan battling a stubborn Taliban-led insurgency focused on the south and east and training the new Afghan army. The U.S. military says its air and ground operations have killed eight suspected militants and four civilians in the past week alone.

Terri Schiavo nears the end of her life

By Mitch Stacy
Associated Press

PINELLAS PARK, Fla. — After another round of losses in the courts, Terri Schiavo's parents kept watch over their dying daughter Saturday, trying in vain to give her Easter communion as their attorneys acknowledged the fight to reconnect the brain-damaged woman's feeding tube was nearing an end.

Attorneys for Bob and Mary Schindler decided not to file another motion with a federal appeals court, essentially ending their effort to persuade federal judges to intervene — something allowed by an extraordinary law passed by Congress.

Late Saturday, the Florida Supreme Court dismissed a request from the parents' attorney to have their daughter's feeding tube reinserted, turning aside an emergency petition arguing that a Pinellas County judge ignored new evidence of Schiavo's wishes and her medical condition.

At least two more appeals loomed by the state and Gov. Jeb Bush, but those challenges were before the state 2nd District Court of Appeal, which has rebuffed the governor's previous efforts in the case.

Family supporters said Schiavo's breathing became increasingly labored during the day. An attorney for the Schindlers, Barbara Weller, said hospice workers began giving morphine to Schiavo to ease pain brought on by her body's failure.

Schiavo's husband, Michael, has said she would not want to be kept alive artificially. The Schindlers believe their daughter could improve and say she laughs, cries, responds to them and tries to talk.

Weller said Terri cried when her mother hugged her Saturday night. "She knows what's going on. She was trying to vocalize something with Mary."

"The governor should know that Terri still knows who her mother is, and she's extremely distressed," Weller said. "She's not a vegetable who doesn't know what is happening."

Paul O'Donnell, a Roman Catholic Franciscan monk, said the family unsuccessfully urged Michael Schiavo to allow his wife the sacrament of communion during the holiest feast of the Catholic year. She received last rites the day the feeding tube was pulled.

Report reveals DeLay allowed father to die

LOS ANGELES (AP) — House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who has helped lead a congressional effort to keep Terri Schiavo alive, joined members of his own family nearly 17 years ago in allowing doctors not to take extraordinary measures to extend his father's life, a newspaper reported Sunday.

DeLay had just been re-elected to his third term in Congress in 1988 when his father, Charles DeLay, was severely injured in an accident. As the elder DeLay's vital organs began failing, the family chose not to connect him to a dialysis machine or take other measures to prolong his life, the Los Angeles Times reported Sunday, citing court documents, medical records and interviews with family members.

"There was no point to even really talking about it," Maxine DeLay, the congressman's 81-year-old mother, told the Times. "Tom knew, we all knew, his father wouldn't have wanted to live that way."

DeLay helped push through Congress a special law allowing Terri Schiavo's parents to ask federal courts to order their brain-damaged daughter's feeding tube reinserted after state courts allowed it to be removed. However, after hearing their pleas, federal judges refused to intervene.

The Texas Republican also accused Schiavo's husband and the courts of "an act of barbarism" against Schiavo, who doctors say is in a persistent vegetative state.

The congressman declined to be interviewed about his father's case, but a press aide said it was "entirely different than Terri Schiavo's."

"The only thing keeping her alive is the food and water we all need to survive. His father was on a ventilator and other machines to sustain him," said DeLay spokesman Dan Allen.

Charles DeLay, 65, and his brother and their wives were trying out a tram the brothers had built to carry their families up and down a slope from their Texas home to the shore of a lake when the tram jumped the tracks on Nov. 17, 1988.

said his students told him he was crazy to travel to Israel.

"We weren't afraid to come," Baker said. "Things seem to be different now, but we would have come anyway because this is where our daughter lives."

Catholics arriving in missionary groups from Spain and France said they included the ailing Pope in their prayers Sunday.

As part of ongoing efforts to ease travel restraints on the Palestinian population, the army announced Sunday that as many as 8,200 Palestinians from the West Bank and 250 from Gaza would be granted daily permits into either Jerusalem or Nazareth during the Easter celebration.

However, with this year's celebrations coinciding with the Jewish Festival of Purim, the Israeli military imposed general travel restrictions on Palestinians in West Bank and Gaza from Wednesday through Sunday, steering many Christians away from requesting permission to travel to Jerusalem.

In Bethlehem's Church of the Nativity, hundreds of worshippers prayed and lit candles. A few Palestinians inside the church called for the resignation of Patriarch Irineos I, the highest Greek Orthodox cleric in the Holy Land, to protest alleged property deals the Greek Orthodox church has made with Jewish groups trying to expand their hold on Palestinian neighborhoods in the disputed city.

Public opinion vs. public school

Joshua Stearns

The University of Massachusetts Amherst, as the state's flagship public institution, is charged with offering top-quality, affordable education to the citizens of this state. For a long time, UMass has strived to meet this challenge, providing unmatched opportunities for learning and research and producing knowledge that serves the commonwealth and the nation. In recent years this commitment has faltered in the face of real budget concerns. However, in the face of steadily growing income from increased fees, increased enrollment and increased state appropriations, UMass has continued its fiscal assault on faculty and students at UMass Amherst.

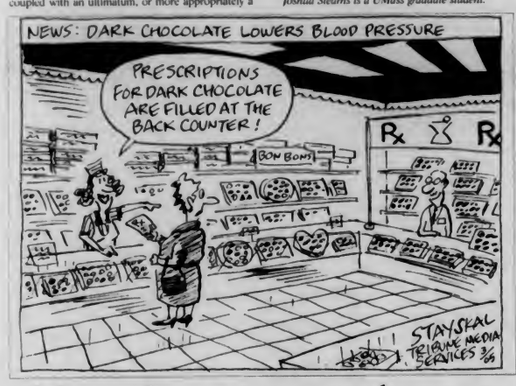
The public is taking note. On Feb. 22, 2005, the Boston Globe published an article entitled "Full-time faculty cuts reverberate at UMass," in which the author writes that UMass "has lost almost 200 permanent, full-time professors in the last decade." The article goes on to note that this 19 percent cut in tenured and tenure-track faculty "has damaged educational quality and threatens the university's reputation."

With cuts in scholarships and increased fees, cuts in faculty positions and salaries and cuts in graduate student benefits, UMass will not be able to attract the top level people that create a top level institution.

Just six days later, the Associated Press released an article reporting that, "the state has cut spending on grants and scholarships for college students by more than $20 million over the past five years, while enrollment increased and public colleges raised tuition and fees as much as 75 percent. As a result, fewer needy students receive state aid." A week later the Boston Globe claimed, "UMass Amherst has already gone through two decades of slow but dramatic erosion."

What is not mentioned in any of these articles is another example of unnecessary cuts being made to the foundation of UMass' mission – the striking changes in the graduate student employee contract being proposed by the UMass administration. The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), which represents nearly 2,500 UMass graduate student employees, has been bargaining with the university for over a year to secure a fair contract.

The university's current proposals would gut the current contract, cutting real wages and increasing the cost of healthcare and childcare. These cuts have been coupled with an ultimatum, or more appropriately a threat, that if they do not settle on the university's terms by March 31, graduate students risk forfeiting retroactive pay increases back to the start of 2005.



UMass already ranks sixth out of seven peer institutions in terms of the economic package offered to its graduate employees. Departments use the allure of tuition and fee waivers to draw the best and brightest. In contrast, non-waived fees at UMass have nearly doubled in the last eight years. With cuts in scholarships and increased fees, cuts in faculty positions and salaries and cuts in graduate student benefits, UMass will not be able to attract the top level people that create a top level institution.

The leading scholars and teachers, both faculty and graduate students, will not invest in UMass if UMass does not invest in them. UMass currently employs excellent faculty, but they are stretched too thin. With a faculty to student ratio of 1-24, and without permanent faculty positions that offer competitive pay, the university will never be able to attract leading scholars or teachers who will stay and help build the best institution possible.

This is a critical time for the university. In the coming months, prospective graduate and undergraduate students will be receiving acceptance letters from campuses across the country. When they compare UMass to other colleges and universities, what will they think? When they come and visit campus, what will they see? If they look past the website and the glossy brochures, to the newspaper articles and the union signs posted in so many windows across campus, they will see a university that is offering them less opportunity, less faculty contact, less interesting courses and while offering less they are charging more.

At this critical moment, I challenge UMass to invest in its people. As the slogan of the graduate student union reminds us, "UMass works because we do." As the university looks to welcome a new class of students, and seeks to fill faculty, staff and graduate employee positions, it needs to weigh its priorities. I suggest that people should always be the priority.

Joshua Stearns is a UMass graduate student.

Never live to regret the past

Becky Martins

There can be nothing worse than living life with regret.

We have all been in disagreements with friends, family etc. At first, neither party wishes to back down since stubbornness is practically human nature. But is holding onto a grudge for a prolonged period of time really the best solution? Our pride may be encroached upon by admitting our faults. We may feel spineless by forgiving others for their wrongs. Nevertheless, nothing is more personally trying than knowing it is too late for our ill-will to be resolved.

If I were to define myself in a few words, 'strong-minded' and 'stubborn' would be at the top of the list. Most of the time, I believe these are a few of my best qualities, since I take pride in my opinionated personality. But on the other hand, having such a strong-will has landed me in tough situations. When fighting with friends, I have found myself hesitant to acknowledge all of my wrongdoings. When debating an issue, it is not always easy for me to admit a mistake, for fear of looking stupid. In regards to family relationships, my strong personality has caused me to butt heads with one individual in particular: my father.

Growing up, I was always told my dad and I share many of the same characteristics, though not all are good. Both him and I know what we stand for and are quick to defend our beliefs, but unfortunately are cursed with a short fuse. Thus, as I matured and grew into my own person, lights between us became more frequent and harsh. We found we may have argued similarly, but our opinions often stood at different ends of the spectrum.

Typically, we could never have just a healthy debate and instead, one person would always end up storming off in sheer frustration. Personally, disagreements even started growing into deep-seeded resentment. Thus, the relationship my dad and I shared became increasingly "hot/cold." I began to consider the reality of a future lacking strong paternal ties.

This year, I became friends with a person who could relate to my familiar problems. Like me, she also was on terms with her dad that ranged from loving to loathing. When I would ask about her relationship with the man, she would reply that one hardly existed. And sadly, this appeared to be how their ties would remain in the future.

But a few weeks ago, my friend received devastating news. Her father, though he had appeared to be a healthy middle-aged man, had been diagnosed with small cell cancer. His chances of survival were uncertain. A cure for this rare form of cancer was unknown. Suddenly, my friend was forced to face her harsh reality.

Though her father could overcome the disease, there was still a chance he would not make it. The upcoming months that would consist of his treatment could prove to be his last. Thus, it became obvious that if something were to change between this father/daughter relationship, it would have to be now.

In recent weeks, both my friend and her dad have begun taking small steps toward building their relationship. Both encourage and compliment the other. They now enjoy spending time together, even if it's doing something as minor as watching T.V. It is mutually understood, however, that although their growing relationship is late in the works, at least it is happening at all. With the success of their progressing bond, I got to thinking about my own life.

By putting aside my pride, I realized the relationships currently shared between my father and I do not have to remain this way. We are fortunate to have time on our side to strengthen our ties. If we are both willing to admit our wrongs and make a change, we could be met with positive results. And although not all of our problems may be solved, at least we will have the chance of gaining an understanding of each other's point of views and try to gain respect for them.

Often enough, people are too proud to simply "forgive and forget." Sometimes, it is not always easy to. But unless the effort is made, we also face losing the chance to ever change previous wrongdoings. If possible, revisit relationships that need mending. Reevaluate those that have never been strong. For if we do not, the future could be permanently affected by problems left unresolved in the past.

The start of Syria's troubles

This is part two of a two part column series.

Todd Hanaburgh

As the situation in Lebanon is brought to a head with incredible international pressure on Syria to comply with UNSC Resolution 1559, massive demonstrations by the people and car bombs exploding in Beirut, one is compelled to imagine how all of this began. The obvious answer is that it began with the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, but who is responsible for that? Though we may never know the truth, an exploration of alternative scenarios may shed some light on the issues.

Scenario #1: Syria Orders Hariri Assassination

Despite the odds that they may be able to successfully coerce voters and/or otherwise rig the upcoming elections in May or to render elected officials ineffective afterward, Syria decides to assassinate a popular political figure in one of the biggest cover-up blunders of all time.

Scenario #2: Israeli Government Responsible

The assassination is carried out to destabilize Syria's grip on Lebanon, distracting Hezbollah from preoccupation with the Palestinian situation and creating chaos within Lebanon's borders, simultaneously complicating matters for Syria and furthering Israel's own national interests.

Scenario #3: U.S. Intelligence Responsible

U.S. intelligence and/or proxy forces (possibly also involving Israel) assassinate Hariri to illustrate exactly why UNSC Resolution 1559 needs to be enforced, punctuating "fundamental instability" in the region. Popular response is either a complete but pleasant surprise or the product of a carefully executed propaganda campaign.

The Iranian reaction calling the entire situation a 'Zionist conspiracy' was anticipated as elemental to further characterization of Iran as a dangerous state with a psychotic leadership bent on obtaining nuclear weapons technology.

Scenario #4: Hezbollah or Jihadists Responsible

Aware of the possible consequences of international pressures, Jihadists carry out the assassination in order to rid themselves of the worthy opponent Hariri. Also renewing tensions in the Palestinian/Israeli situation, and thereby plowing through the diplomacy that has been crippling the goal of destroying the Zionist infidels completely and potentially expelling American influence through increased direct conflict in the region.

Regardless of who planned the attack, opportunists have gained influence over the situation by manipulating evidence and reporting, by invoking UNSC Resolution 1559 and by creating a martyr of Rafik Hariri. The advantaged are the U.S., Israel, pro-Independence

But the terrible reality is that there must be some occupation force in Lebanon to maintain peace until such time that a sufficient domestic peacekeeping force is established ...

Lebanese and possibly Jordan. The decidedly disadvantaged include Syria/Syrians in Lebanon, the Palestinians, Iran, the Hezbollah Party and any neutral parties residing within Lebanon's borders.

A realistic course of action is to allow the Syrian forces to withdraw to the limit of what was outlined by Syria and Lebanon in the Taif Accord in 1989, which is a partial withdrawal retaining troops in the Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon. Instituting a partial or gradual withdrawal may allow Lebanon to work toward a higher degree of stabilization on their own.

But the terrible reality is that there must be some occupation force in Lebanon to maintain peace until such time that a sufficient domestic peacekeeping force is established, additionally with an effective governing body elected or appointed, whether it is Syria or otherwise.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice acknowledged this fact herself, stating that if there was a full and complete Syrian withdrawal that there "... would obviously have to be some kind of international peacekeeping force ..." moving in to fill the vacuum. And although they are cautious to proclaim it outright, it does not take a genius to decipher just which "international peacekeeping force" the administration has in mind.

This arrangement will allow the U.S. to further regional interests by giving the administration a hands-on opportunity to shape Lebanese politics.

Bush's insistence that Syria withdraw completely may stem from apprehension over Syria retaining control of the Bekaa Valley, which, according to U.S. intelligence, is brimming with terrorists and is the source of a counterfeiting ring which produces a U.S. 'supernote' that evades detection.

The U.S. presence in Lebanon could neutralize the Hebollah Party's militant wing, limiting Syrian and Iranian influence over the Israeli-Palestinian situation and effectively isolating Syria, Palestine, Lebanon and Israel from the rest of the Middle East. This is a significant strategic move.

The question is, though; will the Lebanese feel as though the "International Peacekeeping Force" merely replaces the current occupation with troops who understand neither their culture nor their language?

The risk of alienating the population may put the security situation in Lebanon on par with the Iraq occupation. If that is the result, what will the Syrian response be?

If, consequently, Syria moves to conflict with U.S. forces/the IPF, will we be catapulted into a much wider regional conflict?

The Bush Administration is about to remove the keystone in a house of cards. And I for one can't wait to see what happens next.

Bush's new appointees dangerous

Ramzi Kanazi

Bush recently returned from a fence-mending trip to Europe. During his trip, he spoke of reconfirming "the importance of the transatlantic alliance" and putting differences between Europe and America in the past. Upon his return, he is nominating appointees to two international institutions that Europe would loathe to accept. He is trying to inject two neocons who care little for diplomacy and international relations into the United Nations and the World Bank.

Bush seems to have a way of appealing to his opposition with controversial appointees — always a good strategy. His two newest candidates are Paul Wolfowitz and John Bolton. Bolton, now serving as Under Secretary of State for Arms Control and International Security and nominated as a United Nations ambassador, can be noted for a list of vocal criticisms of the institution that he is nominated to that spans even longer than his current title. He has stated, "there is no such thing as the United Nations" and "if the U.N. secretary building in New York lost ten stories, it wouldn't make a bit of difference." It's a good thing that he has not been appointed to a position as a pilot.

Bush seems to have a way of appealing to his opposition with controversial appointees — always a good strategy.

His next nominee, Paul Wolfowitz, would head the World Bank. Wolfowitz presently enjoys his position as the Deputy Defense Secretary. He was the mastermind of the Iraq war. I remember reading a journalist who suggested that Wolfowitz's failures in estimating the costs of the Iraq war (at about $50 million while having eclipsed $200 million) should earn him a promotion, as president of the World Bank.

Unfortunately, nominees to Wolfowitz's anticipated position as President of the World Bank have yet to be overturned. He will be replacing a member of the Clinton pack, James Wolfensohn.

Wolfowitz, while differentiating politics from economy has been quoted as saying, "It's not a secret that I care a lot about the spread of freedom and democracy ... but as I've said over and over again, I think there is a political stream and an economic stream, and they flow together and reinforce each other. If I'm president of the World Bank, I know which stream I'm focused on." I know what stream that is too: it's a stream of lies, the same kind of stream he was focused on when facilitating propaganda for the invasion of Iraq. He couldn't care less about freedom and democracy, but he does care about American hegemony, and he will use whatever means, political or economic, to preserve it.

Wolfowitz is one of the guys responsible for misusing intelligence concerning Saddam Hussein's supposed weapons of mass destruction. He was all about promoting the idea that Iraqi's would immediately embrace their newfound liberators and greet American forces with cooperation. He grossly underestimated the cost of the war, and now he is getting ready to continue using the World Bank as a tool of American Foreign Policy.

Some have quipped that at least Wolfowitz is out of the Department of Defense, but now he will be on his way, with John Bolton, to an area that involves cooperation with the rest of the world. Neither of these people seems so interested in petty things like world cooperation. That's so boring. These people are proponents of unilateral action, and they are just who the president wants in positions of international power. He wants people who will guarantee his interests, and these people would do just that. They are the perfect adjuncts to his sycophantic cabinet, which includes Vice President Dick Cheney, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Think it's just a simple cup of joe? Keep your caffeine in check

By Karen Ravn
Knight Ridder

MONTEREY, Calif. — Robert Reynolds Hewitt wasn't aware until Friday that March is National Caffeine Awareness Month.

But he's been aware of caffeine ever since he was a newly enlisted 18-year-old sailor more than 60 years ago.

"The water in San Diego was horrible," he said. "I took up drinking coffee in self-defense."

Then came Pearl Harbor, and soon Hewitt was drinking 12 cups a day while defending his country.

Now 82, Hewitt has cut back a bit, to one cup a day. So he makes sure it's a good one.

Every morning he walks the Rec Trail from his home in Monterey to his table at the Pacific Grove Coffee House, where he slowly sips his Ethiopian sidamo.

Katherine Delis is picky about her pick-me-ups, too. Her favorite is an Americano at Morgan's Coffee and Tea in Monterey, and she's happy to drive 30 minutes from her home in the Salinas, Calif., area to get it.

"I used to think coffee was that hot brown stuff that kept you awake on road trips," Delis said.

Now, after five years of serious coffee drinking, she believes, "It's about finding people who treat their beans right."

Still, even though Delis has become a coffee aficionado, she had never heard of Caffeine Awareness Month either.

But it's regular coffee drinkers like Hewitt and Delis that the Caffeine Awareness Alliance is hoping will get its message this month, namely, that caffeine can be dangerous to your health.

Maybe they should have called it Caffeine Beware-ness Month.

According to Maria Kushner, the alliance's founder and the developer of a coffee substitute made from soybeans, caffeine is not just habit-forming, but actually addicting.

And she believes it increases the risk of heart disease, pancreatic cancer, miscarriages and birth defects.

Others share her concerns about caffeine. Peter Ciarrocchi, for example, seemed of two minds about his Morgan's double mocha. He was looking forward to it.

"Let's face it," he said. "It's almost like having a dessert."

But he felt much more virtuous about the natural fruit juices and water he usually drinks. And he spoke of bad things he's heard caffeine can do, such as leaching the calcium out of bones and causing osteoporosis.

This is a claim that's often made. However, there's no evidence to support it, although some still recommend that caffeine consumers should drink extra milk or take calcium supplements.

In fact, the scientific community largely agrees that most charges against caffeine are just a tempest in a coffee pot. And the FDA says it's "generally recognized as safe."

But that doesn't mean the Millions of people the world over wake up, keep going, and wind down with a cup or two of coffee. When is too much coffee too much?

Crazy about iPods: the fanatic craze

By Heather Svokos
Knight Ridder

And he shall be called BoBo.

With many iPod owners, this is how it starts. The anthropomorphizing sets in early. You cradle it, for a piece of technology, perhaps a bit too lovingly. You show it off to your friends. You brag about all the songs it can play, all the tricks it can do, and you extol it and all its wondrous, bliss-filled, digital music-playing glory. Then you discover that you can give your iPod a name. And so you do.

Hence the "BoBo."

That's the name of Bruce Wood's iPod, and it's a little funny, considering he was "so" sure he didn't want one. The founder and artistic director of Bruce Wood Dance Company in Fort Worth, Texas, said he would never use one, ever. Waste of time, waste of money.

And yet, and yet.

One of the dancers on the company's recent Northwest tour had an iPod, and Wood thought, well, maybe it would be good to take on the road instead of carting around a load of CDs.

So after Christmas, he caved and bought himself a 40G iPod (which can hold about 10,000 songs).

"Now I'm an iPod 'freak,'" says a giddy Wood. "I'm hysterical."

Wood has plenty of company in the Podosphere. Since the product's debut in 2001, Apple has sold 10 million iPods, 4.58 million of those were sold during the company's wildly successful holiday quarter.

And though not all 10 million of these 'Pod people would label themselves lunatics, many are proud to let their freak flag fly.

While touring with his company in Montana, Wood used his iPod to teach a dance class in the theater. "I hooked it up to a little speaker system, punched in my iPod, and we 'rocked.'"

(Note: They rocked to Bach, Aaron Copland and Lyle Lovett.)

BoBo has become a member of the family. "There's my dog, there's me and there's my iPod," Wood says.

In addition to family, he and BoBo are now members of a special society. "Two of the dancers also have iPods, so we're all standing around at the airport with white wires coming out of our ears," Wood says, laughing. "You see someone else, and you go: 'Yeah, dude, you get it don't you?'"

Or maybe it's a cult. "But in a good way," Wood says. "Not in a creepy sort of Waco way. iPods united!"

Mmm-hmm, cult.

For Paul Blight, it's less of a cult, more of a mission.

The Dallas man is a land developer, a Mac-o-phile, a married father of twins, and he lives in a household that contains four iPods. His wife has a pink iPod Mini; he has a silver Mini and the new 60G photo iPod; he's awaiting delivery of his iPod Shuffle, Apple's cheaper, ultra-scaled-down version of the iPod (all the better to run with).

Since 2001, he has owned about seven iPods; when new versions come out, he sells an old one on eBay.

Like many a Mac-o-phile, Blight tries to convert his friends and family to not only the iPod, but all things Apple.

"That's what it's like, when you're a Christian and you share the Gospel with people," says Blight, whose iPod is loaded with contemporary Christian music. "When you're a loyal Apple fan, you share it with the same enthusiasm, and you're not shy about it."

He has not given his iPod a cheeky name (unless you think "Paul's iPod" is cheeky), but he does anthropomorphize just a tad.

"I do love my iPod and I do cradle it with affection," he says. "I always buy silicon covers for them to protect them and I wipe them off if they get the slightest bit of dirt or grime on them . . . But I don't sleep with it. It sleeps on the counter or the drawer."

Kenneth Robison's sleeps in a hand-knitted iPod cozy.

His girlfriend, Kerri Reece, is a knitter.

"She's been knitting cozies for all of our friends with iPods," says Robison, 23, of Fort Worth. "They all got them for Christmas. Everybody's has personalized buttons on them and they fasten with the buttons. It protects them, it's better than the standard old iPod neoprene cases."

Robison has had his 10G iPod for several years, ever since the first generation players came out.

"I couldn't wait to plug it in and start wasting time loading CDs into it," he says.

Since then, he's maxed out his 10G with 3,300 songs, and is thinking about an upgrade to a 40G.

Like every good iPod missionary, Robison has brought his girlfriend into the fray. She now has one, and she loves it. However . . . "She doesn't use it as much as I do, which is upsetting, but whatever."

Why upsetting?

"She has to 'nerd up' with me."

Susan Wade won't cross that line. The 42-year-old counselor has never contemplated giving her blue iPod Mini a name. ("That would kind of concern me.")

But thanks to her new gadget, she is now bopping through life on her own frequency.

"It's like Radio Susan," Wade says. "It's so fabulous, because every song that comes on, it's like: 'I love this song!' Then the next song, 'I love this song!'"

When Wade goes to the gym, the Ramones come with her. So do Green Day and Jane's Addiction, and any other band she wants to load onto her 1,000-song Mini.

So whether you name it, knit for it, stroke its inanimate casing like a kitty or just chuck it into your gym bag, you are grateful, because this tiny, tidy contraption has given music lovers the ultimate gift: a portable soundtrack to our everyday lives.

Sometimes, it can also come with a life-altering discovery. After Wade had her iPod for a while, her 12-year-old son announced:

"I think you're happier now."

Apple's latest technological advance, the iPod, has been selling by the millions. Some people go to extreme lengths to take care of their iPod.

Too much caffeine?

more the merrier. On the contrary, too much caffeine can make you tense, irritable, anxious and unable to sleep. And too, too much can do worse things than that.

"As usual, moderation is key," said Barbara Quinn, a clinical dietitian at the Community Hospital of the Monterey Peninsula. "After all, even too much water can be bad for you."

For most adults, moderation means three or four cups of coffee a day. For pregnant women, it may mean one or two.

Of course, coffee is a major source of caffeine, but not the only one. Other big suppliers are tea, soft drinks, "energy drinks," chocolate, and some pain relievers.

Caffeine acts as a stimulant and increases alertness and concentration. According to most psychiatrists, it's not truly addictive, although if people stop taking it suddenly, they may experience headaches or other "withdrawal" symptoms.

And there's more good news. Instead of causing any serious illness, caffeine may actually reduce the risk of many, including Parkinson's disease, diabetes and colon cancer.

Other pluses: It's better than aspirin at reducing muscle pain; it increases the rate at which we burn fat; and it improves both mental and physical performance, so much so that the International Olympic Committee has set allowance limits.

Richard Fenton, one of the owners of Rollick's Specialty Coffee in Salinas, once read an article about some of these possible perks. Now he keeps the clipping posted on his wall.

"So people can see it's okay to have caffeine," he said.

One person who doesn't need any convincing is Kathy Cusson. She started drinking coffee about the same time that she first signed on for the early morning shift at Number One Java Drive in Salinas, a drive-through kiosk where cars start lining up at 5 a.m.

Now the manager there, she said, "Sure, caffeine is a drug. ... But it's not a bad drug."

People can go overboard, though. "We have a drink called a tall blonde," said Joey Shein, a long-time local barista. "Four shots of espresso. And sometimes people come in and get a second and third. ... They'll be talking really loud, almost shouting, and they don't notice."

Customers seem to frequent coffeehouses for two basic reasons: to rev up and to wind down. At Plumes Coffee House in Monterey, there's an "in-and-out" crowd in the morning of people going to work, manager Rachel Marotta said. In the evening lots of students come in. And then there's the bunch of regulars that just hang out there all day. "I don't know what they do," Marotta said. "I can't figure it out really."

held on to win it, 6-5.

A combination of poor pitching and lack of hitting on behalf of UMass on Sunday equated to an 18-5 demolishing of the Minutemen by Xavier, as the Muskies banged out 18 hits, three times that of the Maroon and White (six hits).

Twomley racked up his third homer of the season in one of the few bright spots on the day for UMass, as the Musketeers tore the game open and off the hinges in the second. The XU batters registered seven runs in the second inning, six off of starter Jeremy Demers (1-4) and one off John Tolley.

Mike Weiner drove in Twomley to put the Minutemen up 1-0 for the third straight game before homers from Chris Lozan and Brewer and five runs with two outs left made it 7-1. Following the shelling of Demers, Stone went with a variety of pitchers. Jason Lavorgna (one hit, three earned runs), Aaron Smith (six hits, six ER) and Chris Lloyd (three hits, two ER) accounted for the remaining 11 runs allowed.

kneecap and proved to be the hero for the favored Pioneers, who snuck by an aggressive and underrated Bemidji State team (23-13-1).

With the game tied at 2 in the second period, Ulanski one-timed a tough angle shot from the left side of the net passed Beaver freshman goalie Matt Climie, whose 45 saves weren't enough to help Bemidji State become the first four-seed to beat the first seed of the tournament since the field expanded to 16 teams in 2003.

The Beavers were able to force overtime when Brendan Cook deflected a Peter Jonsson shot through Denver goalie Glenn Fisher's five-hole at the 2:17 mark of the third period.

"The one thing for me," Ulanski said," being a senior and sitting in the locker room before overtime, to have a fluke goal go against you and end your career."

In Denver's minds, the game's final play wasn't a fluke, just a lucky break. But don't try explaining that to Climie.

Brett Skinner sent a pass to Ulanski, who was cutting towards the goal in the slot, and the puck redirected off of his shin and passed Climie to end the game after just 3:26 of bonus hockey.

"I think it went off his knee or his shin pad," Climie said. "It just kind of caught me off guard. It was kind of a cheesy goal."

No. 2 New Hampshire 3, No. 3 Harvard 2 (OT)

Kevin Regan became just the second goalie to start an NCAA tournament game other than Ty Conklin and Mike Ayers since 1998, and the freshman netminder would have made the two UNH legends proud, registering 39 saves to earn the overtime win for the Wildcats.

"It's obviously unbelievable company [to be in]," Regan said. "It's a great lineage of goaltenders the last few years with Ty and Mike, and a lot of credit goes to goalie coach David Lassonde, who does a really good job of developing goaltenders. That's a big reason why I chose to come here because I knew he was great at developing goaltenders. I wanted to be a part of that group… just for you to even mention it is an honor."

UNH never led in the game until Winnik received a perfect cross-ice pass from Aitkins and deflected it through Harvard (21-10-3) goalie Dov Grumet-Morris' five-hole 15:06 into overtime.

REGIONAL NOTES: Wildcat Sean Collins tied the first round game at 1 with a goal at 7:35 of the first period, and Harvard's Alex Meintel answered with his first career goal just eight seconds later at the 7:43 mark. It was the fastest consecutive goals by opposing teams in the history of regional play. Clarkson's Scott Thomas and Northern Michigan's Scott Beattie scored within nine seconds of each other on March 27, 1992…

Kevin Regan was the only goalie in the regional to start two games. He recorded 42 saves against Harvard and 39 against Denver for a two-game total of 81…

Attendance at the Mullins Center will go down on the wrong side of the record books. The combined attendance (7,063) for the two days and average attendance (3,532) were both the third worst figures in regional history, just more than both the Midwest and West Regionals in 2004. Regional play began in 1992.

great competitor himself and a great leader of young people.

"They all pretty much had the right answers, but what separated Travis from the rest was he had the backups to the answers. It wasn't just 'we've got to do this,' it was, 'we've got to do this, and this is how we'll do it.'"

Ford was recently credited with turning around an Eastern Kentucky team that suffered through seven straight losing seasons prior to his arrival. He methodically transformed the Colonels into competitors during his five years at the helm, culminating with a 22-9 record this season – one in which they captured the Ohio Valley Conference Championship and an NCAA Tournament birth.

His new job in Western Massachusetts will be to breathe life into a dormant UMass program and field teams that are perennial contenders within the Atlantic 10. In addition, he will be entrusted with reigniting the passion of a detached fan base that annually yearn for a return to glory but have yet to see such results since the departure of coach John Calipari in 1996.

"I've seen the thirst in UMass people's eyes about what they want from their basketball team," Ford said. "I'm not trying to build a program. I'm taking over a situation now that's got legs. We just need to put the body and head on it to get it back to where we all want it to be.

"How are we going to do that? It's going to take a lot of long hours and hard work. These basketball players sitting in the front row are going to be the hardest working players in America, bar none."

Ford began his playing career at the University of Missouri in 1989, before transferring to Kentucky to play for UMass graduate and then-Wildcat coach Rick Pitino. Ford led the 'Cats to the 1993 NCAA Final Four, and spent a training camp with the Golden State Warriors following his graduation in 1994.

games and that they had to be, "a part of the team." He spoke of how his doors were always open and how this was the community's team. For the first time in years the men's basketball team at UMass took on the image of something bigger than a maroon and white team lost in the Berkshires.

After telling the crowd what they needed to do, Ford directed attention to the men in black warm-ups sitting in those front row seats. Each hunched over figure had his eyes transfixed on the coach as he mentioned what their responsibility was. He told them that they were about to learn what it meant to truly work hard.

Each player had a straight, objective face after the initial comments, but Ford switched gears and had a few of his future pupils smiling. He said it was going to be fun, that as hard as they worked, they were going to have more fun than any other team they came across.

This comment appeared to hit everyone there that afternoon. Amidst the very heart of March Madness, the University of Massachusetts was absent, yet very much alive. Players and fans alike have been missing this fun the past few years and Coach Ford was adamant and confident that it was coming back sooner than later.

A new era of UMass basketball has arrived in the form of a hardworking southern man from Madisonville, Ky.

Perhaps it is truly time for this community to have some fun.

Minutewomen topple Flyers

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team opened its Atlantic 10 schedule with two blowout wins at Dayton on Saturday. UMass won game one of the doubleheader 11-1, and pounded the Flyers 8-1 in the second game.

UMass	11
Dayton	1

This domination has come to be expected from the Minutewomen, who have won 14-straight A-10 regular season titles and were predicted by A-10 coaches to finish first again this year.

UMass	8
Xavier	1

"League games are the most important ones," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "They are the doorway to the NCAA Tournament. Obviously, it doesn't get any better than this weekend."

The Minutewomen (10-9, 2-0) came into Saturday's games well rested as they hadn't played in a week. They were supposed to have had their home opener Thursday against Syracuse, but the game was cancelled due to unplayable field conditions.

Next up for UMass is a doubleheader at home against Central Connecticut State on Tuesday beginning at 2:30 p.m.

UMass wasted no time reminding Dayton (6-8, 0-2 A-10) who rules the A-10, jumping out to a 1-0 lead in the top of the first inning of the first game. The run was knocked in by senior Denise Denis, who had a huge first game. The reigning A-10 Player of the Week went 3-for-3 with five RBI and two home runs. Denis leads the team with 16 RBI this season and is second with a .689 slugging percentage.

"Denise is a strong hitter," Sortino said. "She came up with a big walk last weekend with the bases loaded, but this weekend she showed she can really hurt you if the ball is over the plate. The most impressive thing was that she was hit one of her home runs to the opposite field."

Denis gave UMass a 4-0 lead in the top of the third with a three-run shot. The homer was the first ever at the brand-new UD Arena Softball Stadium.

UMass broke the game open in the sixth inning with seven runs. The big blow was delivered by senior Hilary Puglia who hit a deep three-run homer to give UMass a 10-1 lead. Denis followed with a long ball two pitches later to close out the scoring. This marked the first time this season that UMass has hit back-to-back home runs.

The 11 runs were more than enough for UMass ace Barb LaFogg. The senior hurler took a no-hitter into the fifth inning, but surrendered a solo homer to Laura Matthews. The home run was the only hit for Dayton, as LaFogg (7-6) recorded the mercy-rule win.

LaFogg, who was named A-10 Pitcher of the Week last week, lowered her ERA to 2.73 in the performance and is holding batters to a stingy .239 batting average.

In the second game, UMass picked up where it left off, seizing a 2-0 lead in the top of the second inning. UMass extended its lead to 3-0 in the next inning on back-to-back two out doubles by Denis and Stacy Cullington. Cullington had two doubles and three RBI in the two games.

UMass tacked on two more runs in the fourth. Kristi Stefanoni doubled in Amanda Morin who had singled earlier in the inning. Stefanoni came around to score on an error.

Three runs by the Minutewomen in the sixth gave them an 8-0 lead. Once again UMass received a superb pitching performance, this time from junior Jenna Busa.

Busa had a no-hitter entering the bottom of the sixth, but like LaFogg, her bid was spoiled by a solo home run. Busa (3-3) allowed three hits in the game and just the one run in recording the second mercy-rule win of the day for UMass.

Busa had been a tough-luck loser earlier in the year, as her record does not indicate how well she has pitched (2.61 ERA). But on Saturday both pitchers received excellent defense, as UMass did not make an error on the day.

"The team executed well," Sortino said. "It's a reflection of our practices this week. We worked hard and got consistent effort all week. We were very prepared."

Ford: the man for the job

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts athletic director John McCutcheon was searching for a passionate tutor, a fiery personality and a dedicated professional to lead the Minutemen men's basketball program into the future, and it appears as if he has found the right man for the job in Travis Ford.

Ford was officially introduced as the successor to Steve Lappas on Friday afternoon inside the Curry Hicks Cage, and wasted little time in delivering a spirited address to the throng of supporters on hand for his baptism into the UMass family; an event that was more pep rally than press conference.

Speaking before members of the media, new colleagues and friends within the UMass family, his family and coaching staff as well as the crowd of fans that included most of the players he will be inheriting, Ford promised to produce on-court success and create the type of excitement level around his new team that has been lacking in Amherst for nearly a decade.

"UMass basketball is going to be the hottest ticket in the East," Ford said. "Don't wait; jump on board now, because this is going to be the most exciting thing you've ever been a part of. We are going to staff a basketball program that is second to none. Not only in the Northeast, but we're going to crack that Top 25, and I think we have the pieces to compete, without question.

"We are going to pack the Mullins Center every night. We've got to make it an event, not just a game. You're going to be extremely proud to call yourself a UMass fan."

Ford, 35, signed a five-year contract that guarantees him a base salary of $200,000 - a number that could double if the coach meets certain incremental incentives.

McCutcheon hired Ford from a group of six candidates, all of which he described as extremely capable and qualified. What set Ford apart was his outstanding character, both as a teacher and a competitor, and what his new boss described as a "clear vision for the future."

"We did a lot of research and gathered a lot of facts," McCutcheon said. "We had a very defined and deeply researched group of people. We met with six of them individually and got to know them very well. In that process one person emerged: a person of great distinction, a

UMass gets new look with hiring

On March 5, the Massachusetts men's basketball team played its final regular season game and its last game at the William D. Mullins Center until next season. As I walked around the court, towards the Green Room, where the press conference is held, I stopped and looked at the sea of maroon one last time.

It was one last glance at the vast silence which emcompasses this arena. One last time to see empty maroon seats and hear the solemn banter of apathetic fans looking for more than a two point nail-biting victory over a lesser opponent.

A mere 20 days later the university decided that not only would this be a last time for me, a graduating senior, to see this depressing scene, but it would be the last time the Minutemen ended a season with less energy than it started with.

Enter Travis Ford.

On Friday afternoon, the University of Massachusetts introduced Ford as its new head basketball coach. Cheerleaders lined the walkway to the podium and in the middle of dozens of side-conversations throughout the stands, the familiar UMass light song broke through, turning the heads of those in attendance to the man who will be changing the face for their program.

Forty seconds they stood. Shouts and cheers from a spirited audience lilled with students and alumni rang through as Ford stood at the podium. He looked around with a straight face and tried to cut in, but the crowd wasn't having it. They stood and Ford let them cheer, this was exactly what he was looking for.

When the crowd finally sat, bringing into view a large sign in the back row which said, "Welcome to UMass Travis Ford," Ford began talking about what he wants for this program. He mentioned that it was, in essence, a time for change.

The entire time he spoke, the Curry Hicks Cage sat in silence, occasionally cheering when he would hit a nerve. He mentioned how UMass was going to be, "the hottest ticket in town," a phrase which resonated with the alumni and represented something that most of the students had never truly seen... a sense of school pride.

Most of the team lined the first row of the Cage, just behind the two sections of chairs set aside for the press. None of the players had been introduced to their new coach, or his subsequent staff, and sat in the same position as everyone else, listening and analyzing this southern man that appeared to be saying all the right things.

He told the crowd that they needed to come to

Denver heads to Frozen Four

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

On Thursday night around 9:30, Denver coach George Gwozdecky said he didn't know what his hockey team was really capable of in this national tournament, even though the Denver Pioneers are the defending national champions.

He said this year's team is a different version from the 2004 squad. They have a different identity, Gwozdecky was sure that a lot of work had to be done for his Pioneers to reach the Frozen Four.

Well, between 9:30 p.m. on Thursday and 2:30 p.m. yesterday, Gwozdecky appeared to have ironed out his team's shortcomings, and Denver eliminated Bemidji State 4-3 in overtime on Saturday and outlasted New Hampshire 4-2 yesterday to advance to the 2005 Division I Men's Ice Hockey Championship Frozen Four.

UNH (26-11-5) advanced to the regional final by knocking off Harvard, 3-2 in overtime on Saturday.

Denver (30-9-2) will move on from the Northeast Regional at the Mullins Center to the national semifinals in Columbus, Ohio to play archrival Colorado College on April 7. North Dakota will meet Minnesota on the other side of the bracket in the first Frozen Four to feature four teams all hailing from the same conference, the WCHA.

Pioneer junior Gabe Gauthier was named the Northeast Regional MVP after recording a hat trick in the championship game, a day after he dished out three assists in the win over Bemidji State. According to Denver coach George Gwozdecky, Gauthier's performance shouldn't have been that difficult to forecast.

"I remember when we were recruiting him, we talked about the things that really get him charged up, things he really enjoys about playing the game," Gwozdecky recalled. "Usually kids say, 'I love making a great pass,' or 'I love making a great save,' or 'I love scoring a goal.' His response to me was, 'I love playing in the playoffs.' And I thought that was so different from the kind of responses that I get from young men when I ask that question. He's right. "He thinks he is [a big time playoff player], and he sure has proven it."

UNH's Daniel Winnick scored on a penalty shot against Denver yesterday. Denver won 4-2.

Denver came out flying in the first period, at one point out shooting the Wildcats 18-5. But a second consecutive solid performance by freshman goalie Kevin Regan, paired with a few lucky bounces in favor of UNH, kept the game tied heading into the first intermission.

With 6:33 remaining in the second period, Wildcat Daniel Winnik broke free down the ice but was caught from behind by defenseman Matt Carle and dragged down, and the referee ordered for a penalty shot.

Winnik, who scored the overtime game-winner to beat Harvard just 18 hours prior, looked right the whole way down the ice, but once Denver goalie Peter Mannino committed, Winnik crossed back to the left and waited until the last second to slide the puck past the Pioneer netminder and give the Wildcats a 2-1 edge.

Denver battled to tie the game before the break when Gauthier one-timed a pass from Adrian Veidman into the back of the net with 1:58 to play in the second frame.

Veidman was only on the ice at the time because he was moved onto the second line in place of Luke Fulghum, who left the ice for a few minutes after an injury to his midsection.

As fate would have it, Fulghum made it back onto the ice to set up the game-winner with just 3:43 to play in regulation.

Carle took a shot from beyond the right point that Regan couldn't cover up. With the puck dangling in the crease, Fulghum failed at a rebound bid, but Ryan Dingle got his stick on it and beat Regan for just his sixth career goal.

"I think one of the defensemen just got the puck and threw it to the net," Regan said. "I remember getting a piece of it. I think it hit off his skate, someone got a stick on it; I think I got a piece of it, and then I just totally lost it. I had no idea where it was. I thought it was underneath me, and the next thing I knew, they were celebrating. The puck was in the net."

Gauthier added an empty netter with 23 seconds remaining in the game.

Denver's high-flying efforts finally paid off at the 13:42 mark of the first period when Gauthier wristed a shot into the UNH goal on the Pioneers' 16th shot of the opening frame.

It only took the Wildcats 54 seconds to respond. Justin Aikins fired a slap shot wide left of the net, and it caromed off the boards back to Jacob Micflikier, who shoveled the puck into the net from his knees after being tripped.

Baseball team falters in Ohio

By Brendan Hall

Not even senior Jason Twomley's return to the diamond could put a stop to the bleeding suffered by the Massachusetts baseball team this past weekend.

Twomley (.444 batting average), playing in the outfield for the first time since he broke his wrist in a Mar. 5 game against Delaware, didn't seem to encounter mu-ch trouble at the plate, going 7-for-10 and hitting two home runs—including two in one game—in three games this weekend against the Xavier Musketeers.

Xavier	18
UMass	3

The Muskateers manhandled the Minutemen (3-13, 0-3 Atlantic 10) this weekend, outscoring them 26-9 and out-hitting them 30-19 in the three-game sweep.

Xavier	2
UMass	1

The weekend marks the seventh straight loss for UMass, which has now dropped 11 of its last 13 decisions. Xavier (8-16, 3-3 A-10), on the other hand, broke out of a five-game losing streak with its sweep of the Maroon and White, and did so on the strength of some heavy-hitting bats.

Xavier	6

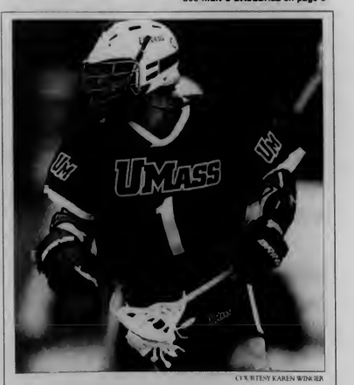
While the Minutemen showed improvement in the hitting department, even producing double digits in the hit column (10 hits in game 2 Saturday), they could not provide the bats when they most critically needed them, as shown in two one-run losses on Saturday.

Game one saw No. 1 starter Matt Torra (1-2) take the mound in a game shortened to seven innings due to rain. The ace threw well to start off the game, allowing just one hit through the first three innings, but a series of hits in the fourth ultimately sealed the junior's fate.

Freshman Colin Salzenstein led off the bottom of the fourth with a single to left centerfield, followed by a double down the right field line by Sean Brewer to put Salzenstein in scoring position. Next, Brett Smith (2-for-3) cleared the bases by singling through the left side of the infield, giving them a 2-1 advantage that they held on through the rest of the game.

Twomley provided all three hits and one run for the Minutemen, racing home on a wild pitch after singling to center three at-bats prior. Mike Lucas (3-for-3) kept the other eight silent, striking out three in the complete game.

Bill Rankin (3-for-4) and Dan Coury (2-for-3, HR) joined Twomley (2-for-5, two HR) in creating some runs for the Maroon and White in game two. But the improvement in the batter's box was not enough to redeem Keith Doherty (1-4) of a sub-par outing on the mound.



The lefty fanned just one while giving up five earned runs on four hits in 2-2/3 innings, while David Sullivan yielded in the winning run in relief of Doherty.

Twomley put UMass ahead immediately, leading off the game with a dinger over the left-center wall for a 1-0 score. Coury then loaded up the bases with a single to shortstop, but Anthony Santos then grounded out to end the inning.

The Musketeers broke through in the bottom of the third with a five-run inning. After Doherty loaded up the bases by walking two batters and giving up a Brewer single, Smith sent everyone home with his first grand slam of the season over the left field wall. Drew Roberts made it a 5-1 affair by nailing a solo shot over the friendly left wall.

Coury closed the gap with his first homer of the year to left, making it 5-2, but Jay Johnson singled in Danny Hayden from third in the bottom of the fourth to push the lead back to four. XU

Elections stir controversy on charter

By Brian Castro and Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

As campaign signs line the town roads, two members of the University of Massachusetts community are trying to impact the future of the Amherst government.

For the second time, Amherst will decide on in a vote whether to change it's local charter from a town meeting and select board form government to a mayor and town council.

However, the idea of a new charter has drawn stark positions for and against it. Those who oppose the charter say it concentrates too much power. Those in favor say Amherst needs a more effective government.

UMass junior political science and journalism double major Morris Singer and mathematician and UMass professor Robert Kusner are both running in today's election. Singer is running for town meeting member and Kusner for the select board.

However, the biggest issue in today's election is what will happen in the town's government, and if it will change for the first time in almost two centuries.

Currently, the Amherst legislative body consists of 240 elected town meeting officials, 24 from 10 different precincts, plus members of the select board, school committee, president of library trustees, chair of the finance committee and town manager.

COURTESY KATHLEEN FISHER

An Amherst citizen stands uptown protesting the charter question that will be on today's ballot.

The new proposed charter would replace the current system with a nine member elected town council, and would replace the select board with a mayor.

"There's a 240 person town meeting and a five person select board and the student voice is vastly underrepresented in that," said Singer. "Could you imagine how difficult it's going to be to get the student voice get represented in a ten-person body?"

"I think I would do a great job representing a student voice," Singer said. According to both Singer and Kusner, the first ballot referendum question could give the students less of a voice.

According to the Town of Amherst's Web site, the widely-debated question will read as follows: Shall the town approve the new charter recommended by the charter commission, summarized below?

The Web site then summarizes the question.

"The proposed charter would replace the representative town meeting with a nine member town council, and would replace the select board with a directly elected mayor. The mayor would be the town's chief executive officer, and would chair the council, have veto power over most council actions (subject to 2/3 override), appoint most committees, and provide overall policy leadership to the town. The town manager would remain the chief administrative officer, subject to policy decisions of the mayor and council. The school committee and board of library trustees would continue unchanged, and the mayor would be a non-voting member of each," the site says.

The Web site also says that the question was asked — and defeated — two years ago by 14 votes. According to the site, the law stipulates that the same

The votes are in: Payano named President of SGA

Elections have been held, votes have been tallied and Pavel Payano and Valerie Louis will serve the University of Massachusetts as the next President and Trustee of the Student Government Association, respectively.

Payano received the majority of the votes with 1,289 and Louis with 1,506, taking the win.

Absentee ballots and Commuter votes are "especially tentative" according to the Chancellor of Elections, but "it is definite Pavel and Valerie won," said Secretary of Public Policy Jeff Napolitano.

During last week's debates, Payano and Louis introduced their 42 page platform in which they plan to implement many ideas and follow many goals set by current SGA President Eduardo Bustamante.

Payano said last week that he hopes to continue the success of the textbook rental system. Last summer the SGA proposed a textbook rental program that would save students, "4% percent on the costs of their books," Payano said. He said he hopes to save students even more money as the program begins to grow.

Both Payano and Louis said that it is vital to gather students and lobby against legislators to fight for more funding. Payano said that he wants to institutionalize these student groups so that the "legislators actually see how serious we are."

Several other SGA members won positions, to view the unoffical results, visit the Web site at www.umass.edu/SGA/

Niether Payano nor Louis were available for comment at press time. To contact Payano, e-mail him at ppayano@student.umass.edu.

Schiavo's parents lose hope as Terri's condition worsens

By Mike Schneider
Associated Press

PINELLAS PARK, Fla. — Weak and emaciated, Terri Schiavo clung to life Monday as police stepped up security outside her hospice room and protesters praying for last-minute intervention by the government kept vigil.

As supporters of the severely brain-damaged woman carried their protest to the White House and Congress, her father repeated plea that his daughter be kept alive.

"Don't give up on her," Bob Schindler told reporters after a morning visit with his daughter, saying that she showed facial expressions when he hugged and kissed her. "We haven't given up on her, and she hasn't given up on us."

Schiavo, 41, was in her 11th day without the feeding tube that sustained her for 15 years. Her parents pressed again for President Bush, Congress and the president's brother Gov. Jeb Bush to intervene to have the tube reinserted, and a small group of supporters protested outside the White House gates.

Schindler said he recognized that his daughter was dying but insisted that it was not too late to save her and that she was "fighting like hell to live and she's begging for help. ... She has just incredible strength to live."

As Schiavo drew closer to death, extra police officers blocked the road in front of the hospice, and an elementary school next door was closed so students could avoid the crowd.

Yeagley speaks about patriotism

By Kathryn Sullivan
Collegian Correspondent

Are you proud to be American? A June 2000 Zogby poll revealed that one in three college students is not.

In his article "Campus Brainwashers Cannot Kill Patriotism," Comanche Indian and scholar David A. Yeagley claims that unpatriotic feelings on college campuses are perpetuated by leftist professors who comprise of approximately 90 percent of faculties in many departments.

Yeagley will be visiting the University of Massachusetts to elaborate on this controversial perspective and many more tomorrow night in room 163 of the Campus Center. He is expected to express controversial views on topics ranging far beyond the boundaries of many college campuses.

One of his most adamant arguments is that against fellow Native American, Ward Churchill, the author of the controversial article "Some People Push Back, On the Justice of Roosting Chickens."

Churchill found himself in a maelstrom of negative media attention in 2001 when he published the article, in which he called the terrorist attacks of 9/11 "inevitable" due to the natural result of years of oppressive U.S. policies.

Churchill wrote, "America's indiscriminately lethal arrogance and psychotic sense of self-entitlement have long since given the great majority of the world's peoples ample cause to be at war with it."

Yeagley does not fail to acknowledge America's history of mistreating his people, yet he feels it is justified when one considers the natural human instinct to dominate. He goes so far as to say, "I am proud of the fact that it took the mightiest nation on earth to defeat [the Native Americans]"

Yeagley's point of view often defies what most would expect from a Native American in our country. He has issues with white women, liberal professors and Ward Churchill, but he is not angry at America. In fact, he plans on saving "the white man from himself," specifically from his political correctness, he says. Yeagley dishes his controversial, tongue-in-cheek perspectives in his regular columns for FrontPage Magazine.com.

His views are conservative but by no means easy to understand. In 2001, he was dismissed from his teaching position and consequently banned from the campus of Oklahoma State University. His dismissal was rumored to be in connection with what was seen as a little too much flexing of his conservative muscles, when he led the campaign for mandatory patriotism in Oklahoma public schools. When he spoke at the University of Colorado May of 2001, liberal students responded by defacing flyers announcing the event. He continues to face criticism head on, speaking his mind at universities across the country, where he is not always greeted with open arms.

"White guilt is the biggest flaw in the American psyche," he said. His view on the campaign to disrobe Native American Barbie of her traditional Indian garb, which has been criticized as reinforcing stereotyped images. "Leftists pretend to honor Indians while destroying any respect America may hold for us," he elaborated.

In regard to the media's lack of focus on the Indian heritage of the latest school shooting perpetrator, 16-year-old Jeff Weise, Yeagley calls it, "reverse racism." He criticizes the media's "studious" aversion to racial profiling. "No Indian wants to assimilate to the point of not being called an Indian," he assures his readers.

Although he disagrees with total assimilation, he believes that Indians can gain equality by "studying the white man's ways and learning to be as strong as he is."

Massive quake shakes Indonesia, killing many

By Michael Casey
Associated Press

BANDA ACEH, Indonesia — A major earthquake struck late Monday off the west coast of Indonesia, and a local government official said 296 people were killed in collapsed buildings. Thousands panicked in countries across the Indian Ocean as tsunami warnings were posted.

Fears of another catastrophe similar to December's devastating tsunami eased within hours, as officials in countries closest to the quake's epicenter said there were no reports of big waves striking their coasts after the temblor was reported.

Early reports of damage and casualties were confined to the island of Nias, off the Sumatran coast, close to the epicenter.

The quake collapsed about 70 percent of houses and buildings in the town of Gunungsitoli, said police Sgt. Zulkifli Sirait.

Agus Mendrofa, deputy district head on Nias island, told el-Shinta radio station that 296 people were killed. He said this figure was based on reports from humanitarian workers on the island.

"We still cannot count the number of casualties or the number of collapsed building because it is dark here," Sirait said in a telephone interview. "It is possible that hundreds of people trapped in the collapsed buildings died."

Nias, a renowned surfing spot, was badly hit by the 9.0 earthquake and subsequent tsunami on Dec. 26 that killed at least 175,000 people in 12 Indian Ocean nations and left another 106,000 missing. At least 340 residents of Nias perished and 10,000 were left homeless.

The U.S. Geological Survey said Monday's quake, which occurred at 11:09 p.m. local time (11:09 a.m. EST), measured a magnitude of 8.2. A later reading put the magnitude at 8.7, said Paul Earle, a USGS geophysicist.

A tsunami warning was issued in Thailand and Sri Lanka, although officials later canceled it. The only tsunami reported within four hours was a tiny one — less than 4 inches — at the Cocos Islands, a group of 27 islands about 1,400 miles west of Australia with a population of about 600, meteorologists in Sydney said. No damage was reported.

"It seems this earthquake did not trigger a tsunami. If it had, the tsunami would have hit the coastline of Sumatra by now," said Prihar Yadi, a scientist with the Indonesia Geophysics Agency. "And if there's no tsunami on the coastline near the epicenter

April showers ... in March?

As winter departs and the snow melts, the April showers seem to have come early. Yesterday, UMass received nearly two inches of torrential rainfall. Today's weather is expected to be more of the same.

Earthquake death toll still climbing

of the quake, there will not be one heading in the other direction."

Indonesian officials said the epicenter was in the Indian Ocean about 56 miles south of the island of Simeulu, off Sumatra's west coast, and just north of Nias. It was described by a USGS geologist as an aftershock of the devastating Dec. 26 quake.

Preliminary indications are that energy from the quake might be directed toward the southwest, said Frank Gonzalez, an oceanographer with the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration in Seattle. He stressed it was based on "very scanty information" about the epicenter and magnitude.

Monday's quake had an epicenter about 110 miles southeast of where the Dec. 26 quake was centered. The USGS said it occurred on a segment of the same fault line that triggered the Dec. 26 quake, the world's biggest in 40 years.

Two aftershocks — one measuring 6.0 and another measuring 6.7 — were reported in the same region late Monday and early Tuesday, the USGS said.

The quake occurred at a depth of 18.6 miles, and was centered 125 west-northwest of Sibolga, Sumatra, and 150 miles southwest of Medan, Sumatra, the USGS said.

The depth does not mean a lot for a quake this large, Earle said, calling it a near-surface earthquake and comparable to the one in December. After that quake, the agency initially recorded the depth of the temblor at six miles. Shallow earthquakes like that generally are more destructive because the seismic energy is closer to the surface and has shorter to travel.

Monday's quake was considered to be at a moderate depth.

The Dec. 26 quake triggered a huge tsunami that swept across the Indian Ocean at the speed of a passenger jet. More than 1.5 million people were left homeless in 11 countries.

In Banda Aceh, the Sumatran city hit hardest in December, Monday's quake spread panic as it briefly cut electricity. Thousands were awakened and poured into the streets.

The quake lasted about two minutes and felt like gentle swaying, like a rocking chair, causing people to feel dizzy.

People grabbed small bags of clothes as they fled tents and homes. Many were crying and jumping into cars and onto motorbikes and pedicabs to head for higher ground. Two women wearing prayer shawls and savings grabbed a fence and chanted things to foreign governments.

Parents out of options for Schiavo according to judge

After overnight wind and rain thinned their ranks, about 100 protesters returned Monday with signs and renewed prayers. But the day also saw some of the harshest rhetoric, with some in the crowd mocking the police by goose-stepping like Nazis.

President Bush's aides have said they have run out of legal options. The governor said Monday that while it "made sense" to have federal courts review the case, he had to respect their decisions last week not to order the tube reinserted.

"I have not seen any means by which the executive branch can get involved. My legal counsel has talked to the Schindler family and their lawyer over the weekend," the governor said. "My heart is broken about this."

Schiavo's parents dispute that their daughter is in a persistent vegetative state as court-ordered doctors have determined. Michael Schiavo contends his wife told him she would not want to be kept alive artificially.

At least two more state-filed appeals seeking the feeding tube's reconnection were pending, but those challenges were before a Florida appeals court that had rejected the governor's previous efforts in the case.

Doctors said Schiavo would probably die within a week or two when the feeding tube was pulled out on March 18. She suffered catastrophic brain damage in 1990 when her heart stopped because of a chemical imbalance that was believed to have been brought on by an eating disorder.

Schindler said he feared the consequences of the morphine drip given to his daughter to relieve any pain. "I have a great concern that they will expedite the process to kill her with an overdose of morphine because that's the procedure that happens," he said.

Hospice spokesman Mike Bell said federal rules kept him from discussing Schiavo specifically, but "a fundamental part of hospice is that we would do nothing to either hasten or postpone natural death."

Comfort measures, including morphine drips, are taken in consultation with a patient's guardian, physician and hospice care team, Bell said.

Amherst citizens concerned

question can be asked again only one time before it must be changed.

While the summary portrays it as a great thing for the town, Kusner and Singer share a greatly different opinion.

"[Right now] students have a chance to participate in the town meeting," Kusner said, adding that if this is passed, students would have a much harder time in participating in meetings.

"It's a much harder hurdle," Kusner, a professor at UMass since 1988, said of how students would get their voices heard in the nine-member town council. Kusner said that Amherst has had the same form of government for about 250 years, and parts of the state has had this type of government for over 400 years.

There are however, some in favor of the charter. "Amherst is a terrific place to live and to raise a family but the things we like best about it, the great schools, the open space, the community are in jeopardy right now," said charter supporter Brian Harvey. "We think the current system isn't equipped to plan for the future."

Currently, there are 240 town meeting members broken up into precincts. Singer is running in the fourth precinct, which represents most of the Southwest residential living area and part of Amherst. Kusner is running for the select board, which is not broken up into precincts.

"I am one of two candidates who supports town meeting," Kusner said.

Kusner said that the town meeting members are apathetic to college students, and he doesn't know if that will be the case if the referendum is passed. He also said that if a town council wins, their primaries would be in the summer, when most college students are at home.

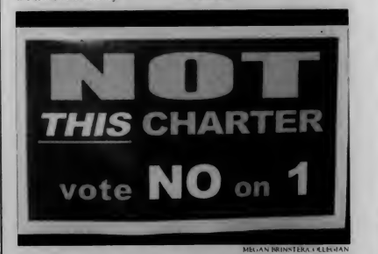
The UMass professor said that there is no guarantee that a town council would listen to college students who had a problem with their community. However, Kusner said, the requirements to speak at a town meeting are much less.

Singer said that if the referendum is passed, it would also cost the town more money.

The current town meeting is made up of volunteer members. Singer said that if this is switched to the nine-member council, it would cost an estimated $180,000, which means taxes could go up.

Singer said that Amherst is $1.2 million in debt, and has paid off some of it recently. He thinks that this will put the town in further debt.

"It's a bad idea. It's really scary," he said.



For students who voted in the recent presidential election, they are already registered to vote in today's election.

In 2001 Amherst voters created a nine-member charter commission to make improvements to Amherst's government. After meeting more than 50 times, the seven members of the commission went further by proposing to make an entirely new charter.

Three years later, voters rejected the same charter by a margin of 2,400 voting yes and 2,414 voting not. If the charter fails to pass again it can't be brought up in a third vote.

Charter supporters say the mayor would give the town more direction.

"Change is scary but we're without leadership and we lack with our biggest employer, UMass," said resident Clare Bertrand.

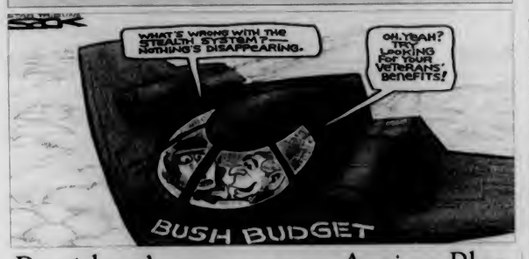
Proposed charter not in the best interest of Amherst

Amherst residents and University of Massachusetts students will be at the polls today, voting in the 2005 town election, an election that will have great implications on the town's future.

A question will be on the ballot about changing the current form of government in town. The town's Web site, www.amherstma.gov, has a link to the current town charter, which outlines the form of government in place now, as well as a link to the new proposed charter that is to be voted on.

Currently, "the legislative body of the town of Amherst is a representative town meeting, consisting of 240 elected town meeting members, 24 from each of 10 precincts plus 14 ex officio members, including the five members of the select board, the five members of the school committee, the president of the library trustees, the chair of the finance committee, the moderator and the town manager."

The new proposed charter would replace the current representative town meeting form of government with a nine member elected town council, and would replace the select board with a directly elected mayor.



This proposed charter is harmful in many ways. Essentially, it would be taking away a form of government that is proven to be efficient and cost-effective, as well as representative. Electing town officials is crucial to preserving the democratic ideals of the town. The new system, which would implement a mayor and a town council, would be highly exclusionary. It would also put many key decisions regarding town government in the hands of a small group of people. These decisions will not only affect Amherst town residents, but UMass students as well.

The charter has already failed once, two years ago, when it was voted down by a margin of 14 votes. Law allows the same charter to be voted on one more time. The charter must be denied this time around as well.

The right to vote is one of the most sacred rights in a democracy. Therefore, not only should all registered students vote in the town election, but they should vote against the proposed charter. The rejection of the charter is vital in keeping the current democratic form of government in tact.

UMass students have various locations to vote, depending on where they live on campus. All sites are accessible via the PTVA. Students in Southwest, members of either precinct 10 or four, vote at the Bangs Community Center. Orchard Hill and Central residents are members of precinct two, and vote at the North Fire Station. Sylvan and Northeast residents, a part of precinct three, vote at the Immanuel Lutheran Church.

President's response to Action Plan

I write this as one of my last official acts as Student Government Association President, to shed light on a telling question raised by the Chancellor's Proposed Action Plan to Improve Diversity released on March 12, 2005. Why is it that Chancellor John Lombardi's proposed plan supports 100 percent of the recommendations regarding Academic Affairs, and zero percent of the recommendations regarding Student Affairs?

Eduardo Bustamante

Specifically, Lombardi's plan accepts all 12 of the academic affairs recommendations, and none of the 11 student affairs recommendations.

For thorough background and details of the Chancellor's plan and the issues that surround it, see "Open Letter to Chancellor Lombardi and the Campus Community," at www.takebackumass.com.

I sincerely wish that I was wrong about this, but this reveals a longstanding plan by a high-ranking UMass official to usurp the autonomy of the SGA and silence the voice of dissenting students. This plan has been in the works since long before the Commission on Campus Diversity was formed. If allowed to proceed, it will take control of the following SGA functions: the school newspaper, television station, radio station, legal services office, commuter services center, and office of minority advocacy and education.

The recent ban on indoor campus demonstrations was in direct response to a protest against actions related to this plan, and was the direct action of the force at work here to marginalize student government. In fact, closer inspection of the content and writing style of Chancellor Lombardi's response to the Commission Report suggests that the document was actually drafted by this same official.

If this plan is implemented, it will form an umbrella with one purpose: to ensure that the University speaks with one voice. It will finalize many years of planning to control any voices that may possibly dissent from the campus' message.

The Commission on Campus Diversity Findings

The main question that the Commission on Campus Diversity raised was: How will you recruit and retain minority students? On this issue the Commission adopted a strong position when it stated: "It is critical to the UMass Amherst mission that Commonwealth students who achieve against the odds are given the opportunity to attend the flagship campus."

Perhaps, the most the most telling event in the Diversity Commission experience was the testimony of Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Michael Gargano.

Uri Strauss, Graduate Student Senate President asked, "V.C. Gargano, we have heard for quite some time about a reorganization of 41 agencies in Student Affairs that is coming down regardless of what the Diversity Commission recommends. Can you, here and now, publicly deny this rumor?"

Gargano responded, "I have tried to move this campus forward but have met tremendous resistance, and the resistance is 'orchestrated by some shall we say, 'Directors' ... I am going to reorganize Student Affairs because I need total cooperation to move the campus forward."

He said total cooperation, we heard total control. The Student's Response: Take Back UMass

It so happens that the tremendous "resistance" that the Vice Chancellor sees as an impediment to the university moving forward resides within the organization that currently houses much student activism, the SGA. It appears that the Vice Chancellor has come to three conclusions: 1) that the resistance he faces is wrong; 2) that it resides in a capricious and misguided few; and 3) that it is best solved with the removal some "so called Directors."

Gargano's mention of resistance in his testimony is reminiscent of a physician who thinks he is operating on insignificant surface tissue, but is actually tampering with a vital organ. He attributes the resistance to a select group of individuals that he seeks to over power, but fails to realize that these individuals in fact represent the spirit of the founding mission of UMass.

The Vice Chancellor faces tremendous resistance because he overlooks the founding mission of the organization that he serves: to provide high quality education for the average citizen of the Commonwealth. He and Chancellor Lombardi seem to forget this in their zeal to solve the University's financial woes with the single minded pursuit of elite rankings and affluent students.

We have witnessed a growing rhetoric from the administration over the past year that we perceive as insensitive to the struggle for equality of the disadvantaged. I am referring here to statements made by the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, such as: "If you are poor go to Community College." "At UMass, we need more Abercrombie and Fitch and less GAP." "The state has decided that higher education is a privilege and not a right," and, "It is discriminatory to offer separate services based on skin color."

Preserve a Noble Tradition

UMass shines in our eyes because of its longstanding tradition of providing quality education for families with limited resources and special needs. No other place that we know of maintains this tradition as a core value. There is no place else for these families to turn to. Community Colleges are a wonderful resource. However, we all know that that you cannot compare the quality of education they offer to the State's flagship school.

We realize the importance of improving the ranking of UMass Amherst and attracting quality affluent students. The problem we have is with the single minded pursuit of status at the direct expense of the disadvantaged.

Do the missions to attain high academic standards and offer affordable world class education to the average citizen have to conflict? Do we have to exclude the bright, motivated minds that come from disadvantaged families to attract the affluent, successful student? Would that not transform us into one more of the many private elite colleges that abound in the Commonwealth?

The administration would be well served to realize that there is wisdom in the collective voice of Take Back UMass. It can feel proud to serve a university that is blessed with a noble tradition and gives its students a strong voice. It can honor that voice by recognizing the Alternative Proposal submitted on March 22 on www.takebackumass.com. Then it will find that strong cooperation to move this campus forward is within its grasp.

Get Involved

Chancellor Lombardi has scheduled a period to receive feedback on his proposal. The SGA urges you to make your voice heard by e-mail, at campusdiversity@umass.edu. The SGA and its allies have submitted an alternative proposal from the one prepared by the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs. I ask that you let Chancellor Lombardi know your values. You want to preserve UMass' 30-year tradition of student advocacy. You want a student newspaper run by students, and a student government that allocates its own budget. Most of all, you want a campus that preserves its founding mission.

Eduardo Bustamante is a UMass student and SGA president.

The cancer of colonization

This past week has been a pivotal one in the future of the conflict in Palestine. What has evolved, in displays of policy from the Israeli and American end, has shed serious doubt on any workable solution to the ongoing conflict.

Yousef Munayyer

The West Bank and Gaza, two territories on which a Palestinian state was supposed to be established, are not very large. In fact the land is equivalent to roughly 22 percent of the state of Maryland. When dealing with territory that small to establish a state for a people who have been deprived of their independence for years, every inch counts.

That is why last week's announcement by the Israeli government to expand the largest illegal colony in the West Bank by thousands of homes is so disappointing. What is just as disappointing is the stance which the United States has taken towards this action in the past and has continued to take after this most recent decision.

Israel, by virtue of being the controlling party, is able to shape the geography of the conflict. Every time an illegal colony is expanded, every time a wall is built to divide Palestinians on their land, every time another military base is established, the facts on the ground change. Many times this can be irreversible.

Politically the situation is a mess. Ariel Sharon, the Israeli Prime Minister, has been facing criticism from the colonists for his stance on disengagement. About two weeks ago, when students at Tel Aviv University were protesting high budget cuts, police entered the university and according to many used excessive force to silence what was for the most part a peaceful demonstration.

Earlier that same week when colonists were protesting violently in the streets of Tel Aviv the response was much gentler. Coming down harsh on the colonists would be political suicide for Sharon. Yet, Sharon had agreed to the road map which sought to establish an independent and contiguous Palestinian state. This is at odds with the colonies and expanding them makes the seemingly impossible task of disengagement even more difficult.

So why would Israel choose to expand colonies in the illegally occupied West Bank if they had agreed to the establishment of a contiguous Palestinian state there? The answer is simple: The colonies are there to stay.

After Secretary of State Condoleeza Rica had told the Los Angeles Times that the decision to expand the colony of Ma'ale Adumim was contrary to American policy in the region. Israel's ambassadors to and from the United States told the Israeli press that the United States supported Israel's retention of major population centers like the colonies under a final status agreement thereby digging the grave of the contiguous Palestinian state.

Like a cancer, the colonies which have been established in the West Bank grow continuously, eating more and more land which is supposed to be Palestinian under the final status agreement. This is simply unacceptable to even the most moderate Palestinians.

The colonies in the West Bank start small and have a large security perimeter around them so that the Arabs will keep their distance. The trend has been to build up colonies to the security perimeter and then expand that outer boundary again. Like a cancer, the colonies which have been established in the West Bank grow continuously eating more and more land which is supposed to be Palestinian under the final status agreement. This is simply unacceptable to even the most moderate of Palestinians.

Is this part of a long term Israeli strategy to acquire all the land? That can not be answered for sure but if it was not one would assume they would be doing more to stop colonial expansion instead of perpetuating it.

Perhaps the saddest part of all of this is that it is nothing new. Ever since the first initiative to create peace based on a two-state solution Israel has only continued to expand the colonies making the solution less reachable.

While all of this is going on, while the two-state solution was being buried under the colonies of Ma'ale Adumim, Ariel and Modi'in the United States, the so-called honest broker, have done nothing to stop it. With every uprooted olive tree, every bulldozed home, every colonial outpost, and every religious zealot, peace gets further and further away.

I have heard so many people say they are hopeful about the current situation. The language sounds the same as that which was heard after Madrid so many deaths ago. Since then the trend has been colonial expansion and because of that there is absolutely nothing to be hopeful for.

With the two-state solution well into the grave and with few honest mourners for it, Israel is pursuing its own One-State solution. The colonies will continue to eat up the West Bank's land and water supply until almost all of it will come under colonial control.

One has to wonder though, what will happen to the millions of Palestinians caught in between?

Looking on the brighter side

I have a paper due today. Within the next two weeks I have another two papers due, although two weeks is far shorter than the time I've spent complaining about having to write them. I started writing three different columns, all on different topics before I began to write this one.

Stacy Kasdin

All the others were about things that bothered me or things I was unhappy about. I got about halfway into each of them before I erased the entire thing and started over. I couldn't figure out what the problem was, but I think I finally know. I don't want to write about things that bother me. I'm sick of concentrating on what bothers me. Like so many others I am so preoccupied with my problems that I forget to appreciate all the good I am privileged to have in my life.

Sure, I have a few papers to write. That's because I have the good fortune of being able to attend a four-year university. I am getting an education that will not only help me attain a job in today's competitive market but that also changes the way I think about things and makes me aware of things I never knew before. Every Sunday night I watch "Extreme Makeover: Home Edition," and I see children whose families would have otherwise not been able to send them to college receiving scholarships and crying their eyes out. Although college can sometimes feel like a burden, it is important to keep in mind, as many professors remind me regularly, it is a privilege.

... At this very stressful time in many of our lives, no matter what the reason for the stress, take a minute and think of everything you are blessed to have. This world is not the awful place so many are beginning to think it is.

This time of year is also when most of the universities have their spring break weeks. I was supposed to go to Chicago for spring break, but due to monetary issues and ultimately illness as well, the trip was cancelled. I sat at home and read away messages about how my friends were traveling internationally, going on cruises, visiting the islands, and going to Cancun.

I moped around for a while thinking about all the work I had done planning the trip gone to waste and how nothing I plan ever works out. It took me the majority of the week to appreciate being woken up by my dog in the morning instead of the sound of the construction they are doing outside my window on campus.

I was a little quicker to acknowledge how lucky I am to live half an hour away from the best matzoh ball soup retailer in New Jersey.

I often find myself considering what it would have been like if I had attended one of the other 10 colleges I applied to. Many of them were private schools, at which the majority of the students would most likely have had no problem funding a spring break trip, a dinner out, or some form of costly entertainment. Many of my friends at UMass are often strapped for cash, and we end up spending a lot of nights hanging out in the dorms or at someone's house instead of going out. When I find myself getting frustrated at this I remind myself that dinner and a movie is nice, but there's no way I'd trade it for the best friends I've ever had.

Not to mention the fact that in the past three and a half years I have developed a strong appreciation for all the fun that can be had for free. Furthermore, when you only go out every so often it makes the occasion all the more special.

This time of year when spring holidays are beginning to occur I am also reminded of another of my complaints: having the tiniest family in the universe. I have always had a small family, but over the past 5 years or so it has gotten much smaller. Seeing everyone celebrate holidays with their large families I find myself getting terribly jealous. Well, my family may be small, but they are incredibly supportive of everything I do and are always there for me when I need them.

Family is also not only the people you are related to by blood. I have a family here at school whom I celebrate Thanksgiving with every year. I have a family back in New Jersey that took care of me throughout my early childhood and will be here to watch me graduate college. My family is actually quite large, when you include all those related simply by love.

So in short, at this very stressful time in many of our lives, no matter what the reason for the stress, take a minute and think of everything you are blessed to have. This world is not the awful place so many are beginning to think it is. There is so much good all around us that we end up forgetting about when there are too many things worrying us.

Don't stop worrying, because sometimes you certainly need to worry, but sometimes you also need to smile. Sometimes you need to take a deep breath, feel it in your lungs, and appreciate its existence, your existence and all it entails.

Poker Parties

You got to know how to bluff, too — here's what the fun's all about

By Vanessa Willis/Knight Ridder Newspapers

If you think poker nights mean cigar smoke, folding tables in back rooms and low stakes, it's time to get with the program.

The Travel Channel set off a trend in March 2003, when it began airing the World Poker Tour, making celebrities of poker players.

The already-famous followed suit, dealing in on Bravo's "Celebrity Poker Showdown," where they vie to benefit their favorite charities.

Now professional players such as Annie Duke, the most successful female player in World Series of Poker history, are becoming household names. She's appeared on "Late Night with David Letterman" and has tutored Ben Affleck.

A word to the wise: Gambling is illegal in many states, so any exchange of money over cards is a no-no. That said, we offer a guide for all that you need to know to host your own poker party, including etiquette, suggested menus and a list of supplies. Whether you're in the mood for a swanky soiree or a casual gathering, it's easy to deal your friends in.

HAVE ON HAND

●A couple of decks of cards. (You'll use just one deck at a time, but it's good to have extras in case cards get bent or marked with food.)

● Plenty of chips — at least 40 per person is generally OK. (Remember, playing for money is illegal in some states.) Check dollar or drugstores for cheap chips; visit sporting goods stores for fancier ones. eBay is a good source, too.

●A table big enough to comfortably seat players with additional room for food and drinks.

●A printed list of hand values at each seat, but only if guests are beginners.

● Appropriate tunes. If you're thrifty: Make a mixed CD or hook up your iPod to your stereo system, with laid-back tunes and an occasional poker-themed song like "The Gambler" by Kenny Rogers thrown in. Going all-out: Buy greatest-hits CDs by Rat Packers like Sinatra or lounge-music compilations.

●Ashtrays to go around, if you allow smoking in your home.

ETIQUETTE

● If most guests are beginners, play a couple of practice games to help them learn the rules before you start keeping track of who's won. Have a list of ranked hand values at each seat.

●Respect the art of bluffing, a paramount strategy for winning. When players fold or lose a game, don't ask to see their cards. Knowing what they had would tip you off to their "tells," body language that reveals how players react to certain hands. That's why professional players often wear sunglasses.

● Deal carefully. Casually tossing cards could flip them over, creating an opportunity for players to count cards. If they do turn over, be democratic in how you handle the cleanup. Players may want to start fresh if you're not too far into a game.

MENU

●Messy foods like wings are a major poker party foul. Saucy and greasy foods make fingers messy, which can mark cards. And they're hard to eat with one hand. Food.com and cocktails.about.com are great sources of recipes for finger and snack foods, and cocktail and mocktail recipes.

● Going swanky: Set out plates of fancy crackers topped with store-bought spreads or finer cheeses. Serve simple mixed drinks, such as apple martinis, in nice glasses.

●Strictly casual: Bowls of mixed nuts, pretzels, small candies and plenty of cold beer are just right.

HAND VALUES

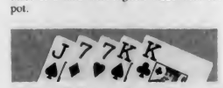
Listed from most valuable to least valuable, from Homepokergames.com.

ROYAL FLUSH: The highest possible ranked hand. Ace, king, queen, jack and 10 of the same suit.

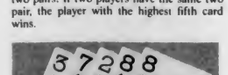
STRAIGHT FLUSH: Five cards of the same suit in sequential order. In the event of two players with a straight, highest card takes the pot.

FOUR OF A KIND: Four cards of the same value. If two players hold this hand, player with the higher four of a kind wins.

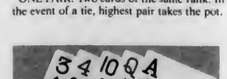
FULL HOUSE: Three of a kind and a pair. In the event more than one player has a full house, the player with the higher value three of a kind wins.



FLUSH: A hand containing five cards of the same suit. If two players have the same hand, the winner is the player holding the highest-valued cards.

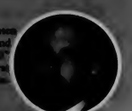


STRAIGHT: Five cards of any suit in ascending order. The ace can be either high or low, and the high straight wins the tie.



THREE OF A KIND: Three cards of the same rank. If two players hold this hand, the three of a kind with highest value wins the pot.

TWO PAIR: Two sets of pairs. Highest pair takes the pot if more than one player holds two pairs. If two players have the same two pair, the player with the highest fifth card wins.

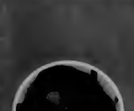


ONE PAIR: Two cards of the same rank. In the event of a tie, highest pair takes the pot.

HIGH CARD: Highest card takes the pot if there aren't any of the above hands.

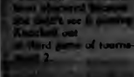
CARD SHARKS

Bravo's "Celebrity Poker Showdown" attracts movie and TV stars, musicians and professional athletes, who play for their favorite charities. Here are a few who've tried their hands:



BEN AFFLECK

Appeared in the first show, but was beaten by eventual winner Willie Nelson ("Coy and the City"). By all accounts that "Daredevil" is a serious poker player; he's the first celebrity to win a major poker upset tournament.



ELIZABETH HASSELBECK

The former Bad Hair Child Pepper and husband of Clarence Thomas made the final table in Tournament 1. But Keith Olbermann of "Saturday Night Live" got the last laugh.

CEDRIC ZOMBIE

The "Dirty" actor knew when to fold his hand because he didn't see it coming. Knocked out at third game of tournament 2.

The late-great NASCAR champion made it to the final table in Tournament 3, where he ran out of gas.

MARK HILL

"Wild Video" star finished an hour after the conclusion of Tournament 2. Lost to eventual champ Clonie Gowen.

JENNIFER TILLY

The "Bride" star stayed alive through several games, including Tournament 2.

Aww nuts, we could have been eating them all along

Founder of Ram Nut Diet, Dr. Leonard J. Ram, goes nutty and loses 30 pounds

By Desonta Holder
Knight Ridder

Go ahead and get a little nutty. That's what Dr. Leonard J. Ram of Stuart, Fla., wants you to do.

As founder of The Ram Nut Diet, created over the past three years, he tried it out on himself and lost 30 pounds over a year. He has kept the weight off for two years and he's still sticking with the program.

It's not about counting calories, eating special meals or riding the StairMaster to exhaustion. It's about nuts, almonds, cashews, pistachios, etc. Before you balk at the fat and calorie content, consider that most of the fat in nuts is unsaturated, meaning it can lower your LDL cholesterol. Nuts are also high in fiber and protein, and they're a good source of vitamins and minerals.

"Nuts were taboo 10 or 15 years ago," Ram says. But they're "not only healthy, but extremely satisfying."

The Ram Nut Diet focuses on eating raw or roasted nuts to control hunger. For optimum benefits, Ram suggests you exercise and hire a nutritionist or dietitian to help turn this diet into a lifestyle.

The program is outlined in his book "The Ram Nut Diet," and it's taught at his eight weight-loss centers across the state, with one in Miami, Weston and Boca Raton.

At the weight-loss centers, a 12-week program starts at about $60 a week for an individual and includes sessions with a nutritional consultant. Just knowing you have to check in with a counselor will help keep you on track.

Claudia Gonzalez, a dietitian at Ram Nutrition and Weight Loss in Miami, says snacking on an ounce of nuts between well-balanced meals will make you feel fuller, causing you to eat less.

"You'll have a nutritious, satisfying snack so you won't need to eat extra," Gonzalez says. If you were to snack on junk food instead, "the empty calories won't satisfy you" and you could end up overeating.

With a weight-loss coach, dieters "learn not only how to eat well, but how to deal with food issues," Gonzalez says. "They learn about the basics of nutrition. ... They become aware of how to maintain their weight.

"The clients eat real food, no special bars or shakes. It's a lifestyle. You can apply the tools to your daily life."

Some of Ram's diet guidelines include:

-Eat slowly and only when you are hungry.

-Stop eating when you are full.

-Avoid nuts that have added oil.

-Avoid foods that contain sugar.

-Exercise three to five times a week.

"A lot of dieters feel like they're starving themselves," Ram says. "We convince people this program can be continued indefinitely because they're not hungry and nuts are tasty food. It's a very satisfying program."

Ram Nut Diet shows that nuts can be a key component in weight loss. Doctor Leonard J. Ram's program is outlined in his book "The Ram Nut Diet" and is taught in eight weight loss centers across Florida.

A stripper's modest proposal: less flesh and more flash

By Michael Precker
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — Catherine D'Lish is an old-fashioned girl.

She wants to take us back to an all-American entertainment of a bygone era, to the kind of show our moms and dads enjoyed (well, dads for sure), before crudeness overtook our culture and gratification had to be immediate.

OK, so she's a stripper. Her words, not mine. But not the kind you see on HBO or in gritty urban cop shows or in teasers for TV news reports about the bad part of town. No poles, no vulgar gymnastics, no bills wedged between elastic and skin.

"Nothing against any of the other acts," she says. "The way I present myself is just more modest. I do a retro act."

COURTESY MICHAEL ARDOVINI

Stripper Catherine D'Lish is on the forefront of a new trend in adult entertainment known as neo-burlesque.

D'Lish is in the forefront of a trend called neo-burlesque. Maybe you haven't noticed, but the era of fan dances, elaborate costumes and leaving something to the imagination seems to be coming back.

There are big shows from Coney Island to Las Vegas, an annual convention called Tease-O-Rama, amateur groups and instructional nights, even an organization called the Burlesque Revival Association (you figure out the acronym).

"It's sexy, but it's not offensive," D'Lish says. "I've always been doing this, but all of a sudden, it's everywhere. Girls come and see it and they love it, and they say, 'I can do that.'"

Let's stop here to point out the obvious. Our subject's name surely isn't Catherine D'Lish (my hunch is Hermione D'Lish, or maybe Camilla D'Lish). But it seemed impolite to inquire about that, as well as her age.

We can reveal that she's from San Diego, the daughter of a prominent physician, who couldn't believe the easy money attached to a job about which she had no moral qualms, and never looked back.

She won a few beauty queen titles that included the word "nude", "you have to make a name for yourself," she explains, and embarked on a performing career.

But then D'Lish changed course.

"I'd grown up watching big movie musicals, and I have a very strong musical background," she says. "I started making shows that I thought were more glamorous."

That meant designing her own costumes, with plenty of feathers, satin, sequins and lo-o-o-o-ng gloves. That meant ditching thumping rock n' roll and bringing back classic orchestral bump n' grind. That meant creating routines with themes and props, her most famous of which is a huge champagne glass filled with bubble bath.

"It's visually appealing in a lot of ways," D'Lish says.

But not everywhere. That last time she played a gentleman's club (who coined that term, anyway?), "I was well received by the audience," she says. "But the manager said, 'In this club we generally show more,' and he didn't mean rhinestones and feathers. I said, 'Too bad. That's what you get.' So he paid me and I left."

Not that you should worry. D'Lish makes a nice living at corporate parties, charity benefits, private events and a growing number of burlesque revival shows around the country. She can tone down the act to PG-13 (wouldn't that be a memorable bar mitzvah video?) or spice it back up to HBO territory.

"I'm always certain to know before the show what's appropriate and what's not," she says. "I've never done a performance my mother wouldn't watch, well, with very few exceptions."

For the past few years, D'Lish has teamed with another big name in the business, Dita Von Teese. Sometimes they tour together, sometimes separately.

Surely that can't be a real name, but it doesn't matter. When Dita marries her boyfriend later this year, she'll be Mrs. Marilyn Manson Reality.

Burlesque may be booming, but it hasn't found its way back to the swanky gentleman's clubs (there's that term again), where the patrons want raunch, not retro. Yet here's D'Lish at The Lodge in Dallas, booked for a weekend as the headliner, charged with bringing flair and humor and personality to what is a fairly predictable enterprise.

"This is the first time I've been in a strip club in years," she marvels.

Can it work? The first focus group isn't sure what to expect as the usual dancers slip into the shadows and D'Lish takes the stage. As she smiles and sashays and gradually litters the floor with articles of clothing, some just watch. Some hoot, as if they've watched old movies on the subject and feel they have to play their part. Some seem impatient until the star finally splashes into the champagne glass and the club resumes its usual proceedings.

"I don't get it," muses a young fella next to me. "My grandpa might get it. But I don't get it."

Funk wins at home

foot par putt caught the left lip on the 18th. He shot 70, one shot behind.

Donald, the 54-hole leader, recovered from a 40 on the back nine and had a chance to force a playoff until his putt up the slope and down toward the hole stayed slightly to the left.

He closed with a 76.

Funk became third player to win before a home crowd at The Players Championship, joining Mark McCumber in 1988 and David Duval in 1998. He was followed around by a group of friends called "Funk's Punks," and he kept them on the edge of their seats.

"I never made anything easy on myself," Funk said.

Nothing has come easy for a guy who once coached at the University of Maryland until deciding to give the PGA Tour a try. He had won six times on tour, but always against weaker fields - two victories were opposite-field events; two others are no longer on the PGA Tour schedule.

He was criticized last year for skipping the British Open and instead playing the B.C. Open, with hopes of earning Ryder Cup points.

But he showed plenty of spunk at Sawgrass by beating the strongest and deepest field in golf, playing 32 holes Monday on a course that was the hardest it has ever been.

The wind was the strongest since the tournament moved in 1982 from Sawgrass Country Club across the street and next to the ocean. It nearly blew flagsticks out of the hole, swept sand from the bunker and produced the highest final-round scoring on the Stadium Course.

There were 16 rounds in the 80s, more than two dozen balls in the water on the island-green 17th and never a dull moment during a marathon Monday.

With so much attention on the Big Four at the start of the tournament, none finished in the top 10.

Vijay Singh was within four shots of the lead until he three-putted from 8 feet for a double bogey on No. 15. He closed with a 72 and tied for 12th, enough to retain his No. 1 ranking by finishing ahead of Tiger Woods.

Woods tied for 53rd by shooting a 75. Phil Mickelson dropped out of contention with two balls into the water on the 17th in morning, and another one in the afternoon. He shot 75 and tied for 40th.

Ernie Els started his day with a double bogey and a triple bogey, but closed with a 69 to tie for 17th.

Defending champion Adam Scott had a 73 to tie for eighth, four shots behind.

Already bizarre because of the rain, The Players Championship got downright wicked in sunshine. The most fearsome element of all is the wind, and that showed up with a vengeance.

As expected, some players paid dearly.

Tway was only four shots out of the lead late in the third round when he dumped four ball into the water on the island-green 17th and took a 12, the highest score ever on the infamous par 3. Two of those shots from the drop area landed on the front of the green and spun off.

Lee Westwood was only three shots out of the lead until playing his final five holes of the third round in 8 over par, including a quadruple-bogey 8 on the 17th.

Donald recovered from a double bogey on the 14th to take a one-shot lead into the final round. He had only 15 minutes to grab lunch, and his lead was gone even quicker than that.

The lead changed four times in the first four holes, and everyone else strapped in and tried to survive, just like they do at most majors.

Not enough respect for Big Ten

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Excuse the Big Ten if it gloats a bit these days.

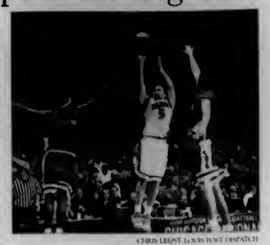
Dissed and dismissed all year as being weaker than the other power conferences, the Big Ten is showing its mettle when it counts. After putting three teams in the regional finals of the NCAA tournament, the Big Ten is sending Illinois and Michigan State to the Final Four this weekend.

For those keeping score, that's one more Final Four team than the vaunted ACC. And two more than either the Big East or the Big 12.

"We're proud of our teams and our players," Big Ten commissioner Jim Delany said Monday. "You don't take it too seriously. You'd like people to say nice things instead of not-so-nice things. But I think the criticism, to the extent there was some, I don't think it was justified."

But knocking the Big Ten has become the thing to do in recent years. Critics say it isn't as strong as it once was, with an RPI this year that was sixth-best among the elite conferences and only three teams in the final Top 25. Others say it can't compare with the ACC.

After Illinois lost for the first time this season, for example, it kept its No. 1 ranking but 22 voters went for North Carolina, a team with three losses.



Delany disputes all that, and can rattle off the numbers to back it up. The Big Ten had seven teams in the top 50, and beat 32 of the top 50-ranked teams. The Big Ten also won 70 percent of its 110 nonconference games.

Those who claim the Big Ten is too plodding? Delany said the ACC averaged 71 points a game, a mere 3-pointer ahead of the Big Ten.

And when it comes time for the NCAA tournament, few conferences match the Big Ten. It has the most appearances of any conference, and trails only the ACC in victories (309-278). This is the third time since 1999 it's had two teams in the Final Four, and seventh time since 1976.

Since 1997, more than half of the conference - six teams - has made at least one Final Four appearance. Michigan State, which will play North Carolina on Friday night, is playing in its fourth Final Four since 1997.

"When they put it on the TV screen, the conferences and the records, we're on top right now, so it's a good feeling," Illinois coach Bruce Weber said. "I know our coaches in the league have been upset about it really since last spring. ... Our image is being hurt, because it mainly affects recruiting.

David Wells shines against the Phillies

By Rob Maaddi
Associated Press

CLEARWATER, Fla. — Bring on the Yankees.

David Wells tuned up for his opening day start against New York with another rough outing for the Red Sox in Boston's 9-5 victory over the Philadelphia Phillies on Monday.

Wells allowed five runs and eight hits in five innings. The 41-year-old left-hander will make his debut for the World Series champion Red Sox against Randy Johnson on Sunday night at Yankee Stadium.

"I finally threw the pitches where I wanted them. Unfortunately, they hit them," said Wells, who finished the spring with a 7.94 ERA. "It's the best I've felt. I didn't feel I was losing anything. I could've gone longer."

Wells signed a two-year contract with Boston last December after spending one season in San Diego. He won 68 games with the Yankees over four seasons (1996-98, 2002-03).

Red Sox manager Terry Francona tapped Wells to start the opener because Curt Schilling still is recovering from ankle surgery.

"I'm fired up. Who wouldn't want to pitch that game?" Wells said. "It's always an honor to pitch the opener. It's special."

A fan favorite when he played for the Yankees, Wells isn't sure how he'll be received now that he's with the rival Red Sox.

"Hopefully, the uniform doesn't change the perception of the people," he said. "I am who I am. If the uniform bothers them, I can understand that."

Wells said he hasn't spoken to Yankees owner George Steinbrenner since he left New York after the 2003 season, but he wouldn't mind running into his former boss on Sunday.

"He's been great to me. He's been nothing but nice," Wells said. "He's stubborn, but so am I. He's a very generous man."

Kevin Millar hit a three-run homer off Cory Lidle in the sixth and the Red Sox scored four runs with the help of two errors off minor leaguer Erick Burke in the eighth.

Lidle, who will open the season as Philadelphia's No. 3 starter, cruised through the first five innings before allowing four runs in the sixth.

An RBI single by Manny Ramirez cut it to 5-2, before Millar ripped a wind-aided, liner over the right-center field wall to tie it at 5.

"I felt good. I thought I made some decent pitches," Lidle said.

In his last start against Baltimore, Wells allowed two runs on seven hits but no walks in the first five innings before giving up four runs in the sixth.

He allowed three runs in the first against the Phillies, including consecutive RBI doubles by Pat Burrell and Jason Michaels. Bobby Abreu hit a two-run homer off Wells in the third.

NOTES: Phillies 1B Jim Thome, who has missed the last six games with a lower back strain, went 3-for-4 with a homer in a minor league game against Tampa Bay's Triple-A affiliate. ... Phillies RHP Vicente Padilla, sidelined all spring with triceps tendinitis, threw 40 pitches in a Class A game. He could pitch in another minor league game on Saturday, but won't start the season in Philadelphia's rotation.

Minutewomen postponed with field conditions

Due to inclement weather and non-playable field conditions, the Massachusetts softball team (10-9 2-0 Atlantic 10) will not play its scheduled doubleheader against Central Connecticut today. Those games have been postponed until April 13 and the Minutewomen (pending field conditions) get back into action tomorrow against Dartmouth at the UMass Softball Complex.

Senior outfielder Denis Denis was recognized as the A-10 Player of the Week and freshman Stacy Cullington was named A-10 Rookie of the week for their performances in last Saturday's wins against Dayton. Denis was 4-for-6 with two home-runs and Cullington went 2-for-4 with three RBI. For Denis, who now leads the team in RBI with 16, this is her second earned A-10 honor in a row. The Maroon and White have had eight games canceled this season.

Minutewomen roll

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

Only six seconds remained in the game when sophomore Samantha Sepulveda scored the game-winning and possibly season-changing goal for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3-4) on Saturday against the New Hampshire Wildcats (3-4).

The Minutewomen forced a shot, which was saved by UNH goal keeper Ashley Milley instead of killing time with a tied score and only one minute remaining. However, Milley's clearing pass couldn't be controlled by the Wildcats, giving UMass another chance to beat their evenly matched opponent.

Sepulveda's goal ensured her team a much needed win after two second half collapses to ranked teams, Syracuse (No. 13) and Hofstra (No. 7) respectively. The young team responded to these two previous let downs by playing a full 60 minutes all as a team and with more shots and less turnovers in the second half than in the first. For the first time all season a total of seven team members scored goals, led by freshman Ashleigh Swazlowski who had three.

"An issue that we've had in the past are our second halves. I think we've been able to hang with really good teams like BU, Hofstra, Syracuse, [against] Syracuse we were down by two and Hofstra ahead by one," said UMass coach Carrie Bolduc. "We've had some issues somehow not coming out in the second half and recognizing that these other teams aren't going to come out as strong and beyond what they imagined so I think they finally recognized that and knew that they would have to elevate their play in order to win the game."

The game remained close the whole way through with the lead for either never exceeding two. The Minutewomen kept the turnovers to a minimum, especially in the second half when they only had five to the Wildcats' seven. Bolduc feels confident that Saturday's game gave back confidence that her team may have lost in the previous two losses and then some.

"They clearly needed a win and certainly it was a turning point in that we beat a team that they had to work for," Bolduc said. "I don't mean to put down the other two wins but this one they had to work for and they worked for 60 minutes and I think It built a lot of confidence, however there's still more work ahead of us, but it will clearly help going into A-10's."

Although numerous freshmen like Kathleen Typadis (22 points) and Melynda Zwick (13 points) have been stepping up big time for a team with only three seniors, it was the team's performance as a whole that made Bolduc feel best about her team's future. The team has shown it can play with some of the best teams in the country, but beating them is another story, which is why the Minutewomen's most recent victory just might begin a string of wins.

"I think collectively everyone really just played, Lauren [McCarthy] our goalie had a key save at the end and our freshman are doing a good job, they're cradling the ball I mean Ashleigh Swazlowski had three goals," Bolduc said. "If you look at the stats we had seven different people score on attack and that's the first time this year that we've had so many people score to the point that that was very huge for us in that everyone was contributing and it took all 12 to win the game."

Women's tennis takes down Spiders, 2004 A-10 champs

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team (10-6 2-0 Atlantic 10) was able to come out on top of a close 4-3 match against the defending Atlantic 10 champion Richmond Spiders (7-7 1-1 A-10) Friday in Philadelphia.

The victory gives the Minutewomen their fourth win in five matches. It was also the second consecutive match, which they were able to win by a score of 4-3. On March 24 the team downed the Temple Owls by the same score.

The Minutewomen returned home this weekend having won both of their matches in Philadelphia.

"I just think this team is peaking at the right time," UMass assistant coach Celeste Frey said. "This was a huge week with us being able to come out of it with two wins."

Once again the Maroon and White were lead by a gritty performance from sophomore Michele Spiess. Spiess competed at the No. 2 singles and doubles. Her singles match with Richmond sophomore Robin Carter went into overtime twice and lasted nearly four hours. Spiess won the match 7-6 (8-6), 6-7 (5-7), 6-1. This season Spiess has a team-leading 19 wins.

"Michele is a really good player. I knew she would pull it out," Frey said.

Frey also noted that one of the biggest matches of the day came from junior Dorothy Iwanowicz. Iwanowicz won her match in the No. 4 spot over junior Meghan Wolfgram 4-6, 6-4, 7-6 (7-5). At one point Iwanowicz rallied from being down five points to take the set and the match.

"Dorothy played a huge match to keep us alive," said Frey.

The Minutewomen and the Spiders split the six singles matches they played. Along with Spiess and Iwanowicz, UMass freshman Kristin DiPiero was able to gain victory by default.

Losing their matches for the Maroon and White were freshman Masha Pozar, senior Sasha Edelstein and junior Iana Bartolini in the No. 1, 3, and 5 spots respectively. This makes two matches in a row that UMass was unable to grab a No. 1 singles victory.

Once again the doubles point ended up deciding the match for the Minutewomen. However, the team began the doubles matches on the wrong foot as Iwanowicz and junior Susan Johnson dropped their match to the Richmond duo of senior Lindsay Cox and Wolfgram by a score of 8-2.

The No. 2 doubles match was another hard fought battle that included the team of Spiess and Pozar against the Spiders' sophomore Robin Carter and senior Courtney Klein. UMass won the match that decided the doubles point beating Richmond 8-6.

The Minutewomen tandem of Edelstein and Bartolini won by default.

"The No. 2 doubles really came together for us today," Frey said, "Everybody played real hard and overall the team played well."

UMass returns home this Wednesday with a match against A-10 rival Rhode Island. The Rams come in with a record of 2-7 overall and 0-1 in A-10 play.

Payton day-to-day for Celtics

BOSTON (AP) — Celtics point guard Gary Payton will be evaluated on a day-to-day basis after the results of an MRI on Monday showed no further damage to his ailing back, a team spokesman said Monday.

Payton, a 16-year NBA veteran, has experienced back problems late in his career, and has sat out some practices in the last two weeks. He complained of increased tightness in his lower back after Friday's home game against the Chicago Bulls.

Payton will continue to have physical therapy on his back and will undergo a chiropractic evaluation, but it was uncertain on Monday whether he will be able to play in Wednesday's home game against the Dallas Mavericks, team spokesman Jeff Twiss said.

The Celtics have lost three consecutive games but still hold a 2 1/2-game lead over the Philadelphia 76ers atop the Atlantic Division prior to Monday night's schedule.

Funk takes Player's crown

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

PONTE VEDRA BEACH, Fla. — It took five days for The Players Championship to resemble a major. Fred Funk had to wait even longer to show he's a big-time player.

A former college golf coach and career grinder, Funk delivered clutch shots over the water and the only par putt that mattered, a 5-footer on the final hole that gave him a one-shot victory Monday in the toughest round the TPC at Sawgrass has ever had.

"I can't believe it," Funk said, choking back tears. "I didn't fathom this happening."

He closed with a 1-under 71, then had to wait until Luke Donald missed a 20-foot birdie putt from just off the green before celebrating the seventh - and by far the biggest - victory of his career.

Funk, 48, became the oldest winner of The Players Championship with a final round that aged him even more, with conditions that were tougher than most majors because of 35 mph wind.

He had three-putt bogeys on consecutive holes to lose a two-shot lead. He got it back with a bold 3-iron from 234 yards that narrowly cleared the water on the par-5 16th and set up a two-putt birdie. He found land on the island-green 17th, a victory in itself, only to three-putt for another bogey.

And after a bold tee shot over the water and a bad shot into the bunker on the 18th, he saved par with a 5-foot putt that ultimately spared this wacky week from stretching into a sixth day.

"Yes!" Funk screamed out as the putt disappeared, giving a quick thrust of his fist and slamming his cap to the ground.

Funk finished at 9-under 279 and earned $1.44 million from the richest purse on the PGA Tour, nearly three times as much as his previous largest paycheck.

Without that putt, it could have been a four-way playoff with no daylight remaining.

Scott Verplank, who earlier Monday watched best friend Bob Tway take a 12 on the par-3 17th, watched in disbelief as his 10-

McCarty finds spot on the Sox

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — David McCarty went to work this week with the World Series champions not knowing if he'd have a job the next day.

Spring training was winding down and teams were making roster cuts. For some young players, that's just a detour on the way to a major league career. For others, like 35-year-old backup first baseman-outfielder McCarty, it could be the end of the line.

"I don't want to stop playing," he said at 8:45 a.m. Sunday, "but, at the same time, you get to a point in your career where you're not just going to bang your head against the wall."

"He's fighting for his baseball life," Boston manager Terry Francona said an hour later.

McCarty put on his Red Sox uniform, went on the field to stretch and took batting practice. He was back in the clubhouse when, shortly before noon, bench coach Brad Mills told him Francona wanted to see him.

He knew he was about to find out if he'd be wearing that uniform again.

Then Mills told him, "It's not bad."

McCarty met with Francona and learned that he had made the club. Four position players had been cut and he wasn't among them. The only job competition remaining was between relief pitchers Byung-Hyun Kim and Anastacio Martinez.

"This is special, especially after what we went through last year, winning it all," McCarty said.

But then he spoke with the experience of an unfulfilled career - from third pick in the 1991 draft to being labeled a bench player early in his career to spending most of 2003 in the minors at age 35 before being claimed on waivers by the Red Sox in August.

"You never know. Trades could happen," McCarty said. "It's not April 3 (opening day) yet."

Players around the league face the same rite of spring training - spend six weeks trying to impress the roster makers and hope that hard work on hot, humid fields pays off.

"We think about it so much," Francona said, "that I think the decisions kind of become apparent as we go."

He knows that even the final cut to the 25-man roster is important to the 25th player, even if he doesn't play much, and the 26th, whose life is about to change with a trip to the minors or a realization that it's time to give up the game.

"The day I forget that, I'm going home," Francona said. "Guys have families."

This spring, McCarty changed his swing to compensate for a back injury and struggled with his hitting, although that's improving. But he's been a bench player so long that he didn't obsess over whether he'd make the team.

"When I was younger, I probably would have," he said before learning he wasn't cut. "I can't worry about something that I can't control. They don't pay me to make the decisions. When I'm done playing, maybe, but not right now."

Had he been cut, McCarty would have waited to see if another major league team picked him up. If none did, he would have retired rather than be away from his wife and two children by returning to the minors. With an economics degree from Stanford, he might have tried a career in money management, commercial real estate, broadcasting or maybe even in a baseball front office.

"It just depends on what they want to do with those final few pieces of the puzzle," McCarty said before talking to Francona. "It's just something you get used to every year."

He never thought his baseball career would go the way it has — just 618 games with a .242 batting average.

Two years after being drafted by Minnesota, he reached the majors, hit .214 in 350 at-bats and said Sunday he wasn't ready for the big leagues. He split the next two seasons between the Twins and the minors.

"It was frustrating because it happened so quick," McCarty said. "I got a chance to get a fair number of at-bats my rookie year but the bad part is the very next year, There I am, 24 years old, and I get labeled a bench guy. And, unfortunately, it's tough to shake labels in this game."

He went on to play for San Francisco, Seattle, Kansas City, Tampa Bay and Oakland and was in the minor league systems of Cincinnati and Detroit.

With Boston last season, he played the outfield, first base as a defensive replacement, pinch hit and even pitched in three games. The left-hander allowed one earned run in 3 2-3 innings and hit .258 in 151 at-bats.

His chances to stick with Boston this year were helped by his versatility and injuries to outfielders Billy McMillon and Adam Stern, who could have competed for his roster spot. Now McCarty looks forward to April 11, Boston's first game at Fenway Park.

"I want to be there for the home opener and get my (championship) ring and be a part of that," he said before Francona gave him the good news.

All-American Andrew Bogut will go pro

By Doug Alden
Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — Utah center Andrew Bogut will enter the NBA draft, forgoing his final two years of eligibility to possibly become the No. 1 choice.

"I have no regrets and full-speed ahead," the 7-footer from Australia said at a news conference Monday.

Bogut, the leading vote-getter on the AP All-America team, averaged 20.4 points and 12.2 rebounds while leading the Utes to a 29-6 season, which ended with a loss to Kentucky in the regional semifinals of the NCAA tournament.

"My decision is about what is best for my basketball career," Bogut said.

He's already hired an agent.

Bogut considered leaving after last season, when he was the Mountain West Conference freshman of the year, but a visit to Australia from new Utah coach Ray Giacoletti convinced Bogut to put off the NBA at least another year.

Bogut is expected to be a lottery pick in the NBA draft and possibly the first player chosen overall with his exceptional ball-handling skills for a center. Bogut led Utah in scoring and rebounding and was third on the team in assists with 82.

Bogut recorded double-doubles in all but nine games this season and finished with at least 10 points and 10 rebounds 40 times in his Utah career. And at just 20 years old, NBA scouts - fixtures at Utah games this season - are convinced he can only get better.

Bogut was a starter on Australia's Olympic team last summer and averaged 14.8 points and 8.8 rebounds.

It would have been a much bigger surprise if Bogut had elected to return to Utah for another season. Bogut declined to talk about his future after the 62-52 loss to Kentucky, but his teammates had a good idea what was coming.

"Bogut is definitely gone, you can see it in his eyes," Utah forward Bryant Markson said after Friday's game.

Former Utah coach Rick Majerus, who resigned midway through last season because of health concerns, pulled off one of his best recruiting achievements when he got Bogut to sign with Utah. Bogut was scheduled to join the Utes midway through the 2002-03 season, but had trouble getting cleared by the NCAA.

Bogut could have gone pro right away in Europe or signed with another school because his commitment to Utah expired during the delay, but kept his word and arrived in Salt Lake City in 2003.

Singer, Kusner in; charter question out

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

The unofficial numbers are in, and the charter that threatened to change Amherst's government was defeated yesterday by a much larger number than the last time it appeared on the ballot.

Unofficially, the charter was defeated by a by 2950 to 2702 vote. Last year the charter was defeated by 14 votes. According to the Town of Amherst Web site, a question can only appear again on a ballot once before it must be changed.

"It's very significant because last time it was 14 votes. People want to be governed by the people, for the people," said University of Massachusetts junior Morris Singer, who also had a good day yesterday.

Singer won a seat on the town meeting by receiving an unofficial total of 76 votes. A total of 238 votes were cast, but Morris led the group of 13 people who officially ran for the seat in the fourth precinct, which is made up primarily of UMass students.

Also winning from the UMass community was mathematician and professor Robert Kusner, who won a seat on the select board by receiving an unofficial count of 2,538 votes. Hewi-Ling also won a seat on the select board with an unofficial total of 3,430 votes.

However, the biggest question on the ballot was the charter. People were seen around town lobbying for their cause, but untimely the people of Amherst wanted the government to stay the way that it's been for about 250 years.

The Web site said that the widely-debated question read as follows: Shall the town approve the new charter recommended by the charter commission, summarized below?

The Web site then summarized the question.

"The proposed charter would replace the representative town meeting with a nine member town council, and would replace the select board with a directly elected mayor. The mayor would be the town's chief executive officer, and would chair the council, have veto power over most council actions (subject to 2/3 override), appoint most committees, and provide overall policy leadership to the town. The town manager would remain the chief administrative officer, subject to policy decisions of the mayor and council.

The school committee and board of library trustees would continue unchanged, and the mayor would be a non-voting member of each," the site says.

The town meetings are made up of 240 elected town officials, broken up into 10 different precincts of 24 people.

In Singer's precinct, the charter passed by an unofficial vote of 137 to 99, with 2 blank ballots. A total of 238 people voted.

UMass students living in the Central residential living area were able to vote at the New Africa House, and there the charter was rejected by an eight to nothing vote.

Singer said that he felt these numbers accurately reflected how UMass students felt about the charter.

"That is the cleanest number as to how students feel. They don't like it," Singer said.

Singer said that he spent four hours yesterday driving around campus and making announcements about the importance of voting. He said that he feels the charter being rejected means that the people of Amherst were knowledgeable as to the facts.

"It was an intense day," Singer said.

Office of Naval Research awards grant to chemists

By Gabriel Dye
Collegian Staff

A team of chemists at the University of Massachusetts was awarded a $1.3 million grant by the Office of Naval Research to develop new techniques for detecting potential bio-warfare agents.

Chemistry professors Richard Vachet, Vincent Rotello and Sankaran Thayumanavan will use nanotechnology and mass spectrometry to isolate and identify miniscule amounts of endocrine disrupting chemicals and microsystins.

EDCs are a broad class of chemicals found in pesticides, detergents and other industrial products. They are increasingly found in environmental waters and, with current technology, cannot be completely removed by wastewater treatments systems. Microcystins are waterborne toxins that could be used in biological weapons.

"Effective detection of EDCs is important because exposure to these compounds is implicated in breast cancer, weakened immune systems, thyroid dysfunction and reproductive problems in young adults," said Vachet, the principle investigator on the project.

"The Navy is always interested in new ways to detect compounds that have adverse effects on its personnel or operations."

In the three-year study, Rutello and Thayumanavan will design nanoparticles that are coated with chemicals to capture the target compounds. The team could potentially increase the capture of these compounds by as much as 100 times more than current methods. "That's a huge jump," Vachet said. "[The Navy is] interested in methods that can detect more rapidly and with more sensitivity in ways that are less prone to error."

Once the compounds have

Blockbuster agrees to refund customers after failed campaign

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — Blockbuster Inc. has agreed to make refunds to customers — and pay an additional $630,000 — to settle allegations the nation's biggest movie rental chain deceived people with its "No Late Fees" campaign.

The agreement was announced Tuesday between Blockbuster and 47 states and the District of Columbia.

Many customers were angry to discover that despite the "No Late Fees" policy, if they were eight days late with a movie or a game, they owned it; their credit card accounts were automatically billed for the purchase price. If they then tried to return it, they were refunded the purchase price but were charged a $1.25 restocking fee.

Under the settlement, Dallas-based Blockbuster must make refunds to customers who claim the campaign misled them into thinking they could keep the video or DVD for as long as they liked.

Also, Blockbuster agreed to pay the states about $630,000 to reimburse them for the costs of their investigations into consumer complaints.

In addition, the rental chain will have change its advertising to ease any confusion.

Blockbuster spokeswoman Karen Raskopf said that the "no late fees" program will continue but that signs will be added to stores to better explain the fine print.

Blockbuster launched the no-late-fees program at its 4,600 U.S. stores on Jan. 1. The states that were not part of the settlement are New Jersey, which is pursuing a separate lawsuit, Vermont and New Hampshire.

Lost and found: 13 years in the making

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

We have all, at one time in our lives, lost something that was truly important to us. Whether it was that teddy bear you were so fond of when you were three, or that old baseball hat you thought you'd always wear, or as in one man's case, a class ring. Losing prized possessions is a part of life; we lose something, we search for it, and after an unsuccessful attempt, we declare it gone forever. In most cases the lost possession remains just that, "lost forever."

But in the instance of John Nolan's lost class ring, forever only lasted 13 years.

After graduating from the University of Massachusetts in 1987, as a gift from his parents, Nolan was given his class ring. The ring itself was flawless, a gold ring surrounding a blue sapphire. There was one small problem with it; it's size. The ring was too big for Nolan's fingers and this would cause the ring to occasionally slide off his finger without Nolan knowing.

So when Nolan finally did lose his ring, he wasn't surprised.

"I tried to not wear the ring all the time because I knew the risk of losing it was there," said Nolan. "So when I did finally lose it, I wasn't shocked. I was just mad at myself."

Nolan, along with his brother, sister, and a friend, had taken a day trip from Carbondale, Ill., to the city of St. Louis, Mo. There, they would board a riverboat casino that toured the Mississippi River. After losing $40 on the slot machines, Nolan and the others left the boat and began the drive home, stopping at a fast-food restaurant for a bite to eat.

COURTEST MATT BELLIVEAU

John Nolan, UMass class of 1987.

"We were back on the road after leaving the restaurant and I realized I didn't have my ring. We turned around and went back to the restaurant, went in and searched everywhere, under all the tables, the floor, gave the 'evil eye' to everyone in the place. But it was nowhere to be found," said Nolan. "I had lost other things in my lifetime and none of those things seemed to turn up, so even though the ring had my named inscribed in it I still just assumed it gone."

Months past, and Nolan moved to Sun Prairie, Wisc., leaving the town of Carbondale, as well as the memory of the ring, far behind.

Little did Nolan know, his lost ring had indeed been found.

While walking to a riverboat casino in St. Louis, Wilma Boca, 75, nearly stepped on a class ring from UMass. Unaware of any way to return the ring to its rightful owner — and unable to bring herself to just dispose of it — Boca kept the ring tucked away safely in her jewelry box.

"Even though she didn't know John, she had enough personal knowledge of him like his name, his major, where he went to school and the year he graduated, that the ring became attached to a real person for her," said Wilma's daughter, Barb. "And to just dispose of it, even though she might never find him, didn't seem right."

It's likely that the ring would have stayed in Wilma's jewelry box forever, but one December episode of "The Jane Pauly Show" changed its course for good.

That day, the shows premise revolved around the guests' incredible stories of personal treasures that had been lost, and then miraculously found.

One man told the story of his missing wedding album and its return 25 years later; another man's dog was delivered 1500 miles to its owners after a

Pope in need of hospitalization

By Nicole Winfield

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II may have to return to the hospital to have a feeding tube inserted because he is having difficulty swallowing, an Italian news agency reported Tuesday.

The Associated Press news agency said no decision had been taken and the feeding tube was one option being considered to help the 84-year-old pope get better nutrition and regain his strength.

Calls to the Vatican spokesman went unanswered late Tuesday.

Citing an unidentified source, the agency said the pope's doctors were considering the procedure, which involves inserting a feeding tube through the throat and into the stomach. The tube is drawn through the throat then extended from inside the stomach to outside the body through a small incision in the abdomen. Liquid formula is fed through the tube into the stomach, and the tube does not remain in the throat.

The technique — percutaneous endoscopic gastrostomy, or PEG — was developed in 1979 and is used more than 250,000 times a year in the United States alone. If performed, the pope would be receiving nutrition the same way Terri Schiavo did before her feeding tube was removed. Schiavo, a severely brain damaged woman, is at the center of a legal battle in the United States.

The Vatican last week strongly condemned a police log

Subject arrested for assault and battery charges

Tuesday March 22

12:09 a.m. 10 to 12 subjects were reported to be marching around and yelling near John Quincy Adams Hall. The group was performing a sorority routine, and was warned about the noise by a police officer.

12:54 p.m. Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, Michael Remen, 22, of Amherst, was arrested on a warrant charge.

5:16 p.m. Two digital cameras worth approximately $400.00 were taken from Kennedy Hall.

7:26 p.m. A person made a complaint to a subject in Chadbourne Hall about a loud gathering in the subject's room. The subject then entered the person's room with an unknown weapon and threatened to physically harm the person. A search warrant was issued to obtain the weapon from the subject's room, and, following the search, Craig Monteith, 20, of Needham, was arrested for breaking and entering, assault with a dangerous weapon, and possession of a false identification.

7:41 p.m. A person reported to be struck by a rock while jogging on North Pleasant Street. The injury required medical attention.

Wednesday March 23

12:42 a.m. A party stated that they were struck by a water balloon near Leach Hall. The party also stated that water balloons were being thrown a vehicles driving by.

9:59 a.m. Following a traffic stop on Commonwealth Avenue, Alex Ballo, 24, of Auburndale, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license .

3:46 p.m. Following a traffic stop on University Drive, Juan Pablo Pizzaro, 31, of Chicopee, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a revoked license.

6:38 p.m. A bag was reported stolen from Boyden Gymnasium. The bag contained notebooks, an ID card, a room key and a cell phone.

9:43 p.m. Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, Donna Pimentel, 44, of Roslindale, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and operating an unregistered motor vehicle.

Thursday March 24

3:02 a.m. A person stated the laundry room in Patterson Hall was flooded due to a washing machine spraying water.

8:58 p.m. Joelle Pecci, 18, of Wareham, was arrested in John Adams Hall on warrant charges.

9:19 p.m. A party stated that approximately 10 lockers were broken into in the Totman Physical Education Building and numerous wallets, purses and cell phones were taken.

10:27 p.m. Following a date of birth request in the parking lot behind Sylvan, Eric Ramstrum, 18, of Amherst, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

10:53 p.m. Maurice Maxwell, 22, of Philadelphia, Pa., was arrested on warrant charges in John Quincy Adams Hall.

Friday March 25

12:12 a.m. Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, Christopher Giorgio, 21, of Shutesbury, was arrested on warrant charges.

2:42 a.m. A person stated that a subject was pushed by a group, and that the group urinated on the subject's door in John Adams Hall.

Saturday March 26

5:02 a.m. Water was reported pouring out of one of the towers and freezing on the ground.

4:28 p.m. A party stated that the windshield of their vehicle was smashed in the parking lot next to Orchard Hill. A police officer reported that the vandalism appeared to have been caused by a fire cracker or a bottle rocket.

7:55 p.m. A computer, Playstation, digital camera and multiple pairs of shoes were stolen from a room in Emerson Hall.

15-month disappearance. And one woman told her tale of finding a message in a bottle and tracked down the man who launched it 21 years earlier.

"Mom and I were watching the show, and if there hadn't been a specific story about a class ring, I don't think it would have occurred to my mother to remind me that she still had John's ring in her jewelry box," said Barb. "When she mentioned it to me, I suggested that I try an Internet search to contact the UMass or the Alumni association."

After sending an email to the Journalism department and Alumni Association, the Boca's were ready to wait a while before they received any sort of response. So they were both shocked when they were sent an email from UMass stating that they had already contacted Nolan and given him Barb's email address in order to reach her.

"I called my mom the minute I received John's email and spoke to him on the phone. I told him that I was going to ship his ring to him after my Christmas vacation from work," said Barb. "My mother was extremely happy to know that the ring she had kept all those years was finally going back home."

"I have to admit I was pretty shocked. It was a jaw-dropper if for no other reason I had written the ring off so long ago," said Nolan. "It never entered my mind that I would ever see it again."

Things were going smoothly, until Barb's computer was hit with a virus that devoured her hard drive and deleted Nolan's address and phone number. Leaving the Boca's with no way of contacting Nolan. Nolan, who had no way of knowing Barb's computer decision by a U.S. judge not to order the reinsertion of Schiavo's feeding tube after it was removed on orders from another judge. The Vatican said the decision was akin to capital punishment for someone who had committed no crime. Schiavo's tube was removed March 18.

John Paul has been having trouble swallowing since a tracheotomy tube was inserted in his throat Feb. 24 to help him breathe. He was admitted to the hospital twice in February because of breathing crises.

The pontiff was unable to preside at Holy Week events because of his ailments. On Sunday, he tried but failed to speak to tens of thousands of people gathered for Easter Sunday Mass in St. Peter's Square.

Earlier Tuesday, the Italian daily Corriere della Sera reported that the pope's doctors were considering a new hospitalization next week both to perform tests on the breathing tube and to adjust his diet because of problems swallowing.

There was no comment from the Vatican. Nicola Cerbino, a spokesman at Polyclinic Gemelli hospital where John Paul was rushed twice last month, called it media speculation.

Another newspaper, La Repubblica, quoted the pope's Vatican physician, Dr. Renato Buzzonetti, as saying doctors are "reasonably calm" about the pope's condition.

John Paul last spoke to the public on March 13, shortly before he was discharged from the hospital for a second time in a month. In addition to the breathing tube, John Paul suffers from Parkinson's disease, which also makes it difficult for him to talk.

Jackson trial hears from key witness

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. — The organizer of a comedy camp for underprivileged youth, who introduced Michael Jackson's accuser to the entertainer, testified Tuesday about his efforts to help the boy through his recovery from cancer.

Jamie Masada, owner of the Laugh Factory in Hollywood, said the boy attended the camp with his brother and sister in 1999 and worked on a standup act. He also described going to see the boy in a hospital while the youngster was struggling through chemotherapy for cancer.

"Oh God, don't bring that memory back," Masada said of the boy's illness.

Masada, taking the stand a day after the judge ruled that evidence also may be introduced about earlier allegations against Jackson, said he gave the boy gifts to encourage him.

"I would say, 'If you eat I'll give you 50 bucks.' I would give him every week, maybe some money," he said.

Prosecutors say the boy met Jackson through Masada when the club owner introduced him to celebrities to cheer him up, and Masada said he also took comedians to the hospital.

Jackson appeared upbeat as he arrived at court, waving to screaming fans and raising a fist.

On Monday, Judge Rodney S. Melville delivered a major setback to Jackson's stuck to the nanoparticles, Vachet will assemble them into larger superstructures for analysis by mass spectrometry, a method used to determine the masses of atoms and molecules. He will release the captured compounds with a laser and measure their mass and identify the substances.

The team will use model systems in place of the actual agents. They will send the models and results to the Navy's research laboratory for testing.

If research goals are met within the projected 30-month time frame, the study is eligible for a fourth year of funding. According to Vachet, the fourth year of the study would focus on using the new technology to analyze actual contaminated samples.

Most of the $1.3 million grant will finance research assistantships for undergraduates, graduate students and postdoctoral students. It will also fund new equipment necessary for detection technology and specialized chemicals to manufacture the nanoparticles.

troubles, was left wondering what had happened to the Boca's.

"Luckily, John emailed me and inquired as to what had happened. With address in hand, I went the next day to the UPS store and shipped it to him," said Barb.

"I almost felt like it might not make it to him with all the adversity we had had over the years trying to track him down and then for something as aggravating as a computer virus to cause me to lose his address, it seemed somehow cursed. I tracked the ring on the UPS site every day until it reached John and he let me know it was on his finger."

Finally, on Valentine's Day of 2005, the ring was returned to its rightful owner. And the action-filled voyage of an UMass class ring ranging from St. Louis to Wisconsin was ended.

"Obviously a class ring has very little monetary value, but the sentimental value for some people makes it have a great overall value," said Barb Boca.

"It was a part of John's past, not mine or my mother's, so we were happy to reunite him with that symbol of his past."

"It's pretty much in the same shape," said Nolan. "It looks like it might have been kicked around a little, but all things considered, I guess it had a great place to hang out the past 12 years."

After going through all of this trouble, Nolan surely has had the ring re-sized right?

"I haven't had the ring re-sized. While I admit I'm inviting trouble, I would rather keep it as is," said Nolan. "I'm not heavy by any means, but you never know, at 39, when the metabolism will slow to the point that I start gaining weight. There's a lot of beer and cheese out here and sudden weight gain can come on pretty rapidly. So, when my fingers get pudgy, I'll be set!"

Jackson jury hears testimony in trial defense, ruling that prosecutors can introduce evidence that the pop star molested or had designs on five other boys, including actor Macaulay Culkin and two youngsters who reached multimillion-dollar settlements with the singer.

Prosecutors say the evidence will show Jackson's alleged behavior with his current accuser follows a pattern of abuse.

"It will show the jury and other people that there's more to this than what has been portrayed in this case so far," said Jim Thomas, an NBC News analyst and former Santa Barbara County sheriff who investigated the earlier cases.

District Attorney Tom Sneddon said Jackson's past inappropriate activities with boys included kissing, hugging and inserting his hands into their pants.

He also said there was a pattern of "grooming," or preparing the boys for molestation, but did not elaborate.

Jackson, 46, is on trial on charges he molested the former cancer patient at his Neverland ranch in 2003.

In most criminal cases, evidence of past behavior is not admissible against a defendant, but the California Legislature changed the state's rules of evidence in 1995 so that it can be admitted in some cases of child molestation and domestic violence.

The incidents allegedly happened 12 to 15 years ago, and the prosecutor acknowledged that only one of the five boys has agreed to testify at Jackson's trial. The boy received $2.4 million from Jackson in a settlement after he alleged he was molested in 1990.

Michael Jackson walks into court yesterday morning. The jury heard from a key witness who claim that Jackson was an influential figure.

Other witnesses are expected to include the 1990 accuser's mother and the mother of a boy who received a multimillion-dollar settlement after alleging he was molested in 1995.

Defense attorney Thomas Mesereau Jr. asked the judge to exclude the allegations, saying many came from third parties who were after Jackson's money. The reference was to former Jackson employees who previously sued the singer and lost, and were then ordered to pay him $1 million in court costs.

Former Boy Scout official charged with porn distribution

DALLAS (AP) — A former high-ranking Boy Scouts of America official has been charged with possession and distribution of child pornography.

Douglas Sovereign Smith Jr., 61, who as program director coordinated scouting programs with schools and churches, was accused of receiving images over the Internet in February of children engaging in oral sex, intercourse and other sexually explicit conduct. The charges were filed by federal prosecutors March 21.

"We're shocked and dismayed to learn of this," said Gregg Shields, national spokesman for the Boy Scouts, based in the Dallas suburb of Irving. "Smith was employed by the Boy Scouts for 39 years and we had no indication of prior criminal activity."

Law enforcement officials indicated the pictures did not show boys who were with the Boy Scouts organization, Shields said.

Smith's job did not involve working directly with children, Shields said. Smith was put on leave immediately after the Boy Scouts officials learned of charges, then chose to retire, he said.

Smith, reached Tuesday at his home in Colleyville, near Fort Worth, referred all questions to his attorney, Jack Strickland, who said: "He's not taking this well. I've got to tell you, this is a good man and I would hate to see the entirety of his life and the good things he's done defined by one incident."

He was expected to appear in federal court Wednesday.

"This is the first time ever we recall anything like this being charged against a Boy Scouts employee," Shields said. "We're proud of our dedicated and hardworking people, but never heard of anything like this."

Indonesia still digging out

By Chris Brummitt
Associated Press

GUNUNG SITOLI, Indonesia — Indonesians searched through smoldering rubble for survivors on Nias island Tuesday and relatives wept over the bodies of the dead after an 8.7—magnitude earthquake hammered the region, triggering a tsunami scare and killing at least 330 people. Some officials said the death toll could rise as high as 2,000.

U.N. and other relief agencies rushed to ferry aid supplies to the island, which bore the brunt of the quake almost three months to the day after an even bigger temblor nearby sent waves crashing into coastlines around the Indian Ocean's rim, killing at least 174,000 people.

Fears of a second tsunami faded Tuesday when seas failed to rise up in the hours after the overnight quake, but at least 15 aftershocks between magnitudes 5.0 and 6.1 kept nervousness high.

In Gunung Sitoli, the biggest town on the island of some 600,000 people, an Associated Press reporter saw many residents huddled around candles outside their homes, too fearful to spend the night indoors after the aftershocks that set some buildings swaying.

Budi Atmaji Adiputro, a spokesman for Indonesia's Coordinating Agency for National Disaster Relief, said rescuers found 330 bodies in the rubble Tuesday. The toll was expected to rise because more bodies were believed to be trapped in collapsed buildings, he said.

Vice President Jusuf Kalla told the el-Shinta radio station in Jakarta that the death toll could rise to 1,000-2,000, based on the amount of destruction to buildings. Other officials said the dead numbered in the hundreds, not thousands.

From the air, it appeared that about 30 percent of buildings in Gunung Sitoli were destroyed, and the island's second biggest town, Teluk Dalam, suffered significant damage.

An Associated Press Television News cameraman who landed briefly in the city said he saw at least one dead body and about four injured islanders who had yet to receive medical treatment.

At least two fires smoldered in Gunung Sitoli. About 1,000 people gathered in a large field in the town.

A soccer pitch in the town was turned into a makeshift triage center, with about 50 badly injured survivors awaiting evacuation by relief agency helicopters. People swarmed around U.N. helicopters as they landed to deliver relief supplies.

A steeple had been knocked off a church on the mainly Christian island.

In Jakarta, the SCTV network showed images from the island, including survivors weeping over the sarong-covered bodies of a child and a middle-aged woman. In another image, two men on a motorbike carried what appeared to be a body wrapped in sarongs.

'Draft Action Plan' needs revision in order to grow

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi has been under heavy fire before recently announcing his plan to push back the public comment period regarding the "Draft Action Plan." This decision was a wise move on Lombardi's part, as the proposals in the plan offer a major set back to the University as a whole.

As a response to the Commission for Campus Diversity's recommendations, Lombardi has drastically misinterpreted the intentions of the report and the goals that the commission hopes to achieve.

Diversity on campus is, and always has been a major issue. Many students have acknowledged this fact and taken steps in order to correct the situation. For example, groups such as the ALANA community and the Graduate Student Organization, have been trying to paint a broader picture for the campus at large. According to Lombardi's proposal, over 40 student groups will be lumped into one center, the Center for Student Development. This is an extremely detrimental move to make and will only portray the University as a whole in a terrible light to the rest of the nation.

Additionally, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, along with a newly appointed Associate Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, will head this Center for Student Development up.

Gargano, who ran into much controversy earlier in the year with former members of the SGA, is hardly the right person for the job. By allowing him to have the final say in student organizations, many of which are self-funded and operate completely independently from the University, there is a great loss of autonomy that the students currently maintain.

The voice of the students is vital to the success and flourishing of the University. Because this campus has such a wide array of students, many different cultures and religions are accented in UMass brochures, enforcing the diversely appealing aspect to all prospective students. In grouping all RSOs together under one heading, that diversity is being eliminated.

What makes many of these student groups stand out is the fact that they are independent. The fact that the University does not censor them is what gives them the drive to be, in actuality, the voice of the University. To actually speak on behalf of the student body pertaining to students' true feelings on issues that really affect them is a privilege that not all universities allow, and is one of the many things that makes UMass special.

For Lombardi to reevaluate his "Draft Action Plan" is not only a smart move, but also one that is vital if this University is to continue functioning in the way that has garnered it success for so long. The most effective way to go about approaching this situation is for the Administration to stop deciding what they think is best for the student body and actually listen to them. Like any democracy, those who are ruled by it have a say in how they are ruled. Apply this principle to UMass and there just might be a recipe for success.

Ta- Ta- Ta- Tase me!

Thomas Naughton

I had to chuckle when I saw the "No TASERs" banner that adorns the office window of the Student Government Association. It's nice to see the SGA doing something that doesn't involve getting drunk in the SCERA Office, pouting or immaturely insulting the Administration.

The "No Tasers" message is a reaction to the September announcement that four UMDP officers would be trained to use TASERs. Nothing scares the SGA like education (or having their private party photos published). I'm personally excited by the idea of TASERs being integrated into campus life. I have a hard time waking up in the morning sometimes and it would be nice to make a short phone call and get myself a good old tasing to start the day right.

You can't blame the UMPD for wanting to buy TASERs. On a campus where a sports victory means setting things on fire, girls gone wild and jumping off the DC, a certain level of force, or the threat of that force, must be considered. If I was a police officer (give me 30 pounds, the sense of right and wrong and a sexy haircut) facing the riots in Southwest, I'd want to tase the crap out of drunk delinquents too.

I don't really like the idea of TASERs, and I don't think the police really want to use them, but I also don't like the culture of rioting that continues on this campus. We are not entitled to riot; when you receive your acceptance letter to enroll at University of Massachusetts, there isn't a section that states "rioting will be permitted in the event of a Boston/New England sports team victory."

Let's really examine the issue of rioting, since Hobart Hoedown is on its way and that event never fails to show off just how stupid some UMass students can be. Those of you who rioted in Southwest did so because the Red Sox won the World Series and because the Patriots won the Super Bowl. Woop-de-doo. I was happy that both teams won, but it never occurred to me after those wins that I should find the nearest trashcan and set it on fire, flash people, throw stuff out my window or start fights with people.

Rioting isn't funny (well, actually I laughed a lot when I read the numerous arrests in the police log; that was real funny) and it does nothing for the image or budget of our school. Do you want better dorms, more classes, competitive programs and opportunities? Then stop wasting our money by setting stuff on fire and screaming "Yankees Suck." Mitt Romney is a Mormon. Mormons don't riot; do you think he's going to give a budget increase to a bunch of spoiled animals?

I don't really like the idea of TASERs, and I don't think the police really want to use them, but I also don't like the culture of rioting that continues on this campus.

What exactly do you accomplish by screaming "Yankees Suck"? I'm sure that after the Yankees lose a game they sit in the dugout, look at each other and say "You know, it's not the losing that hurts, what really hurts my heart is when those kids at UMass set stuff on fire and say 'Yankees Suck.' When beer-bellied college kids drunk out of their minds say that we suck, I start to really believe it."

I'm pleased that people in Southwest are passionate enough about something to get all riled up, but to embarrass the campus because of a sports team? Give me a break. 1,500 soldiers are dead — where's that riot? Gas is now at $2.15, making the possibility of setting things on fire more difficult, not to mention that we can't afford to drive anywhere — where's that riot? George W. Bush is spending billions on a war that 52 percent of the country thinks was a mistake — where's the riot over the fact that money is being taken from our education?

I'm sorry, I'm being stupid, letting the Yankees know that they "suck" is way more important. Carry on then, rioters. Set the campus aflame, show your bare breasts proudly, disregard not only your personal safety, but also the safety of your fellow rioters, but don't be surprised if you find yourself tased on the ground. We give the UMPD no other options but to increase force when we decide we are entitled to riot.

I don't like the idea of seeing my fellow students tense and dazed on the ground after a TASER shock, but to act as though we didn't usher in this development is completely foolish and shortsighted. You have to step inside the problem the police are dealing with and ask yourself, "If faced with a mob of 1,000 drunk students, would I want to be able to protect myself, protect the campus and most of all protect rioters from themselves"?

If the SGA were against TASERs, their window display would be more effective if it said "No Riots." This is not a police state, its also not a free-for-all, an episode of "Jackass" or your favorite club scene from "Girls Gone Wild" — this is a community and in a community the only way to address and eliminate a problem is to own your half of it and work together to see the problem solved.

A tale of two nations

Andrew Freeman

Here's a quick test: take out a writing instrument and write down three things you know about Burundi. Next, try this: write down three things you know about Israel and the occupied territories. I imagine that even someone with little exposure to the news would know far more about the latter. Why should there be such a discrepancy?

Israel and Burundi both have populations of over six million people, are both small countries and both have experienced violence during and after colonial rule. Yet one of them is both known and cared about far more in our society.

A paper by Harvard fellow Ethan Zuckerman on global media distribution reveals the massive overrepresentation of Israel in the news. Israel had 1709 percent, or roughly 18 times, more articles written about it than what would be expected according to population, and over four times more than would be expected based on its economic strength. Burundi, by contrast, had 51 percent fewer articles written about it than one might expect based on population. To put this into clearer figures, in the period surveyed Burundi was discussed in 213 articles, while Israel was featured in 7,456.

One could come up with many reasons for the difference. Israel is a Western nation, while Burundi is African. Israel is substantially richer than Burundi: the former has a $120 billion economy, while the latter's amounts to only $3.7 billion. The West Bank and Gaza Strip, occupied by Israel and home to over three million Palestinians, have an economy that is similarly impoverished vis-à-vis Burundi, worth $2.8 billion.

One could argue that the country's problems are not equal, and we know more about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict than Burundi's fighting between Hutus and Tutsis, because the first is worse. However, statistically Burundi's civil war is far worse than the violence in Israel and the territories: 300,000 have died in Burundi since 1993 alone. By contrast, in the current Intifada which began in 2000, over 3,700 had died as of May 2004.

But the real reason for the overrepresentation of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the media is that it makes for excellent storytelling. The setting is the Holy Land, where three religions intersect, with ancient and recent histories as a backdrop. There is a clash of religions and of civilizations. There are strong Marxist appeals to the narrative, with the Palestinians, poor and marginalized, opposed by the comparatively wealthy Israelis. Many view the conflict as a struggle against imperialism — with the colonialist Israelis coveting Palestinian land. These are romantic descriptions: they are not reality.

I believe that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a tragic waste, and hope for an end to the violence. But I also believe that our collective fixation on it is dangerous.

I believe that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a tragic waste, and hope for an end to the violence. But I also believe that our collective fixation on it is dangerous. While any violent deaths are sad, the rest of the world suffers far worse in silence. Genocide is occurring in the Darfur region of the Sudan, and even more will die in Africa from AIDS. According to the CIA World Factbook, in Burundi, six percent of the population has the disease, while in some African nations, such as Zimbabwe, a third of the population suffers from AIDS.

A suicide bombing or drone assassination is more dramatic than 10,000 people dying quietly from AIDS, but is it more important? Whole generations are dying in Africa, and we turn our attention to the Middle East, or to the latest celebrity trial in our country.

The media is powerful because it has the power to inform and affect action. After the tsunami that struck Asia last year, ordinary people opened their hearts and wallets to help the survivors. Yet the suffering that occurs from AIDS, warfare and preventable diseases like malaria elicits no such response.

Unquestionably, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is important, if only because millions of people believe it to be a metaphor for their lives.

Ending it is also important, which would save lives, and possibly lessen the threat from Islamic terrorism. But there are many other threats and issues that we should confront. Poverty and poor health conditions breed disease, which is as true in the markets of China where SARS began as it is of Africa, where AIDS originated. Until we start learning, and caring, about Burundi and the rest of Africa, we are exposing ourselves to a grave risk.

The politics of Middle Earth

Joseph St.John

The current policies of Saruman the White are terrible. We all know they are, and it seems like there is a thing we can do to stop his errant chain of bad decisions. As a wizard, he is jokingly referred to as Saruman the unwise, Saruman the dumb and Saruman the idiot. What kind of wizard is called the unwise?

Not only is Saruman cutting down trees in Fanghorn Forest like dwarfs going after gems in a gem mine, he is destroying the ecosystem of this beautiful forest and raising tensions between Isengard and the Ent kingdom. This war is racking up war costs that will not be paid off until the coming of the next age, and unfortunately it is being fought because of Saruman's greed for power.

His recent aggressive dealings with the elves of Rivendell and Lothlorien have left him no allies there. He has become enemies of the race of men, and the other wizards have all turned their backs on him. He tried to infiltrate the Throne of Rohan with the mischievous spy Wormtounge, but that ended in a scandal sending Wormtounge back home with his tail between his legs, like an ashamed puppy. Saruman now has no allies except the Dark Lord and he is making new enemies every day.

Saruman's hopelessness and his belief that the Dark Lord could not be beaten is an attitude that permeates through all of society and is causing its degradation.

It is blatant that Saruman is joining forces with the Dark Lord only for his interests in power, and is not at all interested in the improvement of humanity in any way whatsoever. He hopes the Dark Lord will give him some power once the war is over, and that people will remember him as a fearsome leader, not at all overshadowed by the more overshadowing Sauron of Mordor.

It seems that Saruman of Isengard does not care at all for the moral issues that are at stake in this war, like which side is actually right. He did not consider whether the side that is planning to take over all of Middle Earth and subject it to millennia of darkness, slavery and death is right, or the side that enjoys eating scones, smoking shire weed and having big birthday parties in which there are many practical jokes and funny toys to play with. Not once did Saruman the White pause to consider the innocent hobbits that will brutally die at the scimitar of highly trained, highly armed, killing machines who come to exploit their sacred land in the name of the Dark Lord.

Sure, Saruman is getting all of the supplies he needs now to maintain his illusion of control, and the Dark Lord from Mordor promises to share his power equally once his conquest is over, but everyone save Saruman himself knows that you do not trust anyone who wants to take over the world, especially if that someone is from Mordor, the land of despair and darkness. Someone should tell Saruman to get better advisors.

The war economy may seem stable enough now, but there is no promise that Mordor will continue sending supplies once the war is over, or that Mordor will even share what it wins at the end of the war with Isengard. As Gandalf the Grey says, "There is only one Lord of the Rings, and he does not share power."

Saruman's agenda is to build a bigger and bigger army, in preparation for a battle against all who oppose his misguided intentions. It is rumored that he intends to attack the fortress of Minas Tirith, a stronghold of men, in order to seek out the one ring of power to give to the Dark Lord.

Saruman's hopelessness and his belief that the Dark Lord could not be beaten is an attitude that permeates through all of society and is causing its degradation. During a conflict, there are cowards, brave warrior heroes and brave thinkers. The cowards become blind to the problem and ignore or join with the enemy. The brave die nobly while trying to defeat the enemy in violent combat. They fight with force and die too easily but are remembered for their ultimate sacrifices.

It is the intelligent, free thinking problem solvers, who sometimes nobody believes in, that can come up with ways to defeat such a powerful enemy. They know how valuable life is, and would face the most difficult challenges, including crossing Mordor to reach their goal. Be a free thinker, with strong will, determination and heart! Destroy the ring!

Discrimination in Bethlehem

World Perspectives

Gilad Skolnick

His church was bombed a little while ago, but he managed to reopen it. Then it was bombed again, but the congregation successfully repaired the damage. Then it was bombed again and again —14 times total.

Steven Khoury, the Palestinian minister of his First Baptist Church of Bethlehem has received countless death threats and has been beaten up. His father has been shot at three different times, but miraculously not hit once; Khoury credits divine intervention.

Khoury's crime is wanting to love thy neighbor: He is a minister of a Baptist Church that wants peace with Israel. The plight of Middle Eastern Christians is often overlooked. NGO Monitor reports that thousands of Christian families have fled Bethlehem; reducing a city that several decades ago was 80 percent Christian to today's dismal 20 percent. More Christians are leaving as Muslim fanatics have slowly risen to control and stepped up the intense racism against Christians, all of which Khoury tells me that he has noticed firsthand.

Christian discrimination is something very real in our world today, and has been increasing at disturbing levels while continuously ignored by the western press.

The Muslims in the area frequently invade Christian homes, threatening to kill the inhabitants of the house if they fail to cooperate with their hijackers. Muslim terrorists use the Christian homes as a base to fire at home in Jerusalem neighborhoods. The Israeli army then returns fire at whoever is shooting at the Israeli homes, thereby destroying Christian homes.

There is a saying by some Muslims in Bethlehem, "The Muslims sacrifice their lives and the Christians their property," which justifies the invasion into Christian homes and Churches, theft of their cars and destruction of their businesses. To make things worse, the Palestinian government under Arafat and still now under Abu Mazen cooperates willingly with terrorist organizations like Hamas, whose goal is to establish a fundamentalist Muslim state in place of Israel.

Khoury believes that another motive for the exclusive invasions of Christian homes is to help "encourage" more Christians to leave. Terrorism has also led to a sharp reduction in the number of tourists, which hits the Christian population the hardest, as many of them make their livelihood from tourists.

Another reason that Khoury's church has been bombed so many times is it's support of Israel. Although Khoury dreams of a transparent and democratic Palestinian state, he doesn't want Israel, a country that he and his congregation recognize as a modern country with morals, to disappear.

Christian oppression and discrimination sadly is not limited to those living under the Palestinian government. A few years ago, thousands of Christian Lebanese fleeing the Muslim fundamentalist terrorist group Hezbollah, were provided with homes and money in Israel. The western press largely ignored massacres against Christians in the Lebanese civil war, and over the past few weeks, several bombs have exploded in Christian neighborhoods in Lebanon's capital Beirut, evidence of this continuing problem.

In Iraq and Pakistan, churches are firebombed. In Sudan, Christians are being massacred by the thousands. In Egypt, Christians suffer widespread job discrimination. In Iran, Christians are forbidden to testify in court against a Muslim. Most churches in Iran must function underground. In Saudi Arabia, churches are illegal.

A few years ago Palestinian Muslim terrorists forced their way into the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, one of Christianity's most sacred sites, believed to be where Jesus was born. The gunmen refused to surrender their positions inside the Church for over a month, and once they left, the church was heavily desecrated.

Christian discrimination is something very real in our world today, and has been increasing at disturbing levels while continuously ignored by the western press. What is happening here is most alarming, as the Christian population in the Palestinian territories rapidly decreases, while it grows in Israel.

Just this past May, a Christian Arab student at my university was shot to death by terrorists while jogging in a nearby Jerusalem neighborhood. It's difficult to trust that the Palestinian government will stop terrorists operating against Israelis when it won't even halt its support of those who are waging a war of terror and discrimination against its own citizens.

Commission report harmful

Leia Hlustick

Our dear Chancellor, John Lombardi has issued a new "action plan" for campus diversity, which anyone can view at www.umass.edu/campusdiversity.

If you take the time to read it, and look beyond the shroud of pretty language for this new organizational structure, like "Center for Student Development" and "A Blueprint for Change" you'll see the true plan of our beloved administration. Sure, the proposal sounds good with a catchy title slapped onto it, but the meaning of the reorganization and restructuring of our campus programs is far from pretty.

Lombardi has disregarded the Diversity Commission's recommendations and decided it best to revoke student control of all student activities agencies, and hand that control over to the administration. This has little to do with promoting diversity and everything to do with nullifying student agency. I feel I can safely say that this is an attempt to detract from the real issue of diversity at the University of Massachusetts and exploit it for the administration's expansion of its power even over student life.

What this proposal will ultimately do is take power away from the UMass student community to make vital decisions on behalf of student interests, including tuition and fee increases, bag searches and parental notification. All RSOs and student agencies, including the SGA, support programs, SCERA, the Collegian, WMUA and many more across campus will be under the umbrella of this Center for Student Development.

This means that their power to allocate funds, manage their websites and information provided to the campus community, programs and services, and space allocations, will all have to be okayed and overseen by the Vice Chancellor and the new position of the Associate Vice Chancellor within the Division of Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Forget about student agency and autonomy at this university. Every dollar allocated and every program or service provided will have Mike Gargano's dirty fingers in it. Remember it was Gargano who passed the new picketing code over the intersession with unanimous votes against it, influenced speaker Pat Higgins through emails on SGA matters and the KKK9 incident, and still is holding his position with a vote of no confidence from the SGA.

The students have run these agencies and the support programs have had autonomy from the Administration's whims up until this point because their funding has been coming from student funds allocated by the SGA. They have been very effective and beneficial to students, except for the apparent lack in funding allocated to the SGA to distribute, and the vacancies which only the administration has hindered filling. That's what the students need and have requested time and time again, and the UMass student body is still being intentionally ignored.

Forget about student agency and autonomy at this university. Every dollar allocated and every program or service provided will have Mike Gargano's dirty fingers in it.

The administration has placed blame on these agencies and organizations for the university's problems with providing an environment, which nurtures and supports the campus mission for a diverse institution. In Lombardi's plan it states, "As proposed in A Blueprint for Change, this plan will redefine and restructure the Support Programs and the offices in support of ALANA students; it will eliminate the pattern of balkanization," (balkanization means the division of an area or group into smaller and often mutually hostile units) " ... that often results in a disconnection of students of color from the general campus community, as well as within ALANA student communities."

Here's a classic case of blaming the victim. Now the ALANA community and its supporters are labeled as hostile and unwilling to work with each other and the campus community. I have seen first hand the collaboration of the ALANA students with each other and their constant devotion to outreach to non-ALANA students on a regular basis as one of the OAA staff for over a year now. I don't know where this claim comes from . This shows how little the administration understands what is going on with its students, and what a waste of student money was put into the Commission on Campus Diversity (upwards of $40,000).

This is not just a concern of the ALANA community; it is a campus issue, which means every student, every faculty member and every staff member at this institution has a responsibility to speak up and speak out for the future of a genuine diverse institution of higher education. This affects students of all colors, political persuasions, sexualities, cultures — you name it.

I myself am not an ALANA student: I am a white lower-middle class woman on this campus and this plan will affect me just as much as any other student on this campus. Why? Because just like a dictatorship, the administration has the final say in what we as the UMass community can and cannot do or say, and how our institution is run. If students sit back selfishly and simply say, "This doesn't affect me, so why bother?" this change will take place and our autonomy and rights will be violated however the administration sees fit.

Like a dominating father, if the administration wants to, they will spank you, whether it is for speaking up or not complying with their plan. Don't give them the chance. Remember, this is your school. Being apathetic makes a person a contribution to the problem. You have a responsibility to yourself and the students at UMass to take action when you know something needs to be done. I ask that you please be part of the solution.

Please email your thoughts before April 1 to CampusDiversity@umass.edu. You can also take action by contacting the Take Back UMass coalition at contact@takebackumass.com.

The faces of Lupus displayed

Meghan Healy

You probably have one. Your best friend, your TA and maybe even your grandmother — they probably have one, too. Like me, I am sure you all have noticed the proliferation of rubber bracelets that have taken the wrists of pretty much everyone in the United States hostage. The most notable, the yellow Live Strong bracelets, supporting those diagnosed with cancer, began popping up over the last year. As 'yellow fever' rapidly spread, it was only a matter of time before AIDS, Democrats and even Red Sox Nation followed suit. And, though I resisted the rubber bracelet trend, for quite some time, even I have one now.

I managed to keep my wrist free for quite a while, but one day a few months back while making a donation to the Lupus Foundation of America, I found that they too had jumped on the bracelet bandwagon. I was surprised at first. Lupus is not a trendy disease. Most people have never even heard of it. To be honest, my own mother had it for as long as I can remember and until I was a junior in high school, I didn't really even understand what exactly it was.

Some weeks later, a note thanking me for my donation to LFA was accompanied by one of the organization's purple bracelets. I held it in my hand for a minute and then placed it in my jewelry box. I wasn't ready to wear it yet. I knew that wearing it would attract attention and inevitably lead to questions I was not prepared, at least not emotionally, to answer.

A few weeks later I took the bracelet out and slid it on my wrist. My first time wearing it out, my worst fear was realized. The cashier at the grocery store caught sight of a flash of purple as I went to pay. "That's a pretty color. What is it for?" I hesitated and then replied, "Lupus." She looked at me like I had said something unintelligible and questioned again, "what the heck is that?" I am not sure what she thought it was, but there was a certain change in her demeanor when I answered. "It's an autoimmune disease," I said. "It turns your own antibodies against themselves, often affecting major organs and sometimes causing death." She stared for a few seconds and when I did not offer anymore she smiled and handed me my receipt.

Although the interaction was awkward (to say the least) I walked out of the store feeling good. At least one more person knew what lupus was and maybe she would even take it upon herself to learn more.

The face of lupus is an ever-changing one. Nearly 1.5 million Americans are said to suffer from some form of the disease, with an estimated 6,000 new diagnoses being added to that total each year.

Although the interaction was awkward (to say the least) I walked out of the store feeling good. At least one more person knew what lupus was and maybe she would even take it upon herself to learn more.

Although it is two to three times more common among African Americans, Hispanics, Asians and Native Americans, lupus is not designated to any race or ethnicity. Although typically onset is between the ages of 15 and 44, lupus can be diagnosed at any age. Both men and women are at risk, though adult women are nearly 15 times more likely than men to be diagnosed with lupus. My mother happened to be one of those women.

When my mother was first diagnosed in 1989 with systematic lupus, the most severe and most prevalent form, very little was known about the disease. In fact, it took over two years of doctors' visits before anyone could really make sense of what was going on with her. In the 16 years that have passed, my family has watched as the field of medicine made great strides in the treatment of AIDS and cancer, but, comparatively, very little time or effort seemed to be devoted to lupus.

My mother went through a barrage of tests and operations, treatments and medications. She suffered two strokes, one leaving her paralyzed on her left side for nearly a year. She lost her vision for almost three. Since so little was known about lupus, her life was constantly in jeopardy. Around Christmas, when I was 11-years-old, the doctors told us that she wouldn't make it to Valentine's Day. Over the next eight years she was given similar death sentences from clueless doctors, yet, unfortunately, when she passed away in my freshman year of college no one saw it coming.

I am not sharing this story for sympathy or attention — in fact most people I have met since freshman year don't even know that my mother passed away ... at least they didn't really, until I started wearing this bracelet and opening up about it. Instead I am hoping to simply make some of you aware that lupus exists and is a reality, not only in our society, but statistically, right here in the University of Massachusetts community.

Lance Armstrong has raised millions and millions of dollars for cancer research and support with his yellow Live Strong bracelets, on top of raising awareness and garnering support for survivors and their loved ones. If a proliferation of purple bracelets is what it takes to raise public awareness about a disease that, if caught early enough, doesn't have to be as painful and life-threatening as my mother's was, then I am proud to wear it — and if you have any questions, just ask.

It's not the time for law school

S.J. Port

It's been just over three months since the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees voted to establish the Commonwealth's first public law school — and I still can't fathom how they have figured the "development" won't cost us a thing.

The idea has been in the works and in the minds of many for years. The theory is as follows: two-thirds of the Massachusetts workforce is educated in some fashion at one of the 28 state and community colleges or the state university system. The majority of these workers were educated in and will continue to reside in Massachusetts, giving back to the community in a multitude of ways.

If the Massachusetts educational system included a law school it would produce lawyers who would likely be involved in state politics. In short: if we graduate lawyers we graduate legislators, and if we graduate legislators we have more support in the legislature and less risk of major budget cutbacks by uncaring graduates of private schools.

This assumes two things: the majority of legislators are lawyers, and privately educated lawyers didn't do their undergraduate work at a public institution and don't care about the public institutions.

According to the Board of Trustees' proposal of establishment, directed to Judith Gill, the Chancellor of the Massachusetts Board of Education on Dec. 24, 2004, "No new state money will be required to complete this merger." That's a huge sigh of relief you just heard from the state legislature.

Thank goodness we don't expect state money to go into this project; there isn't any for the burdened Massachusetts higher educational body as is, let alone with a new baby to feed, develop and administrate over. But, if the state isn't paying for the law school, who is? Where is the money coming from? Show me the money! And I don't mean credit, or loans. I mean actual cold hard cash, that nobody seems to use anymore.

The "current pricing structure will support the operation of the school," according to "UMass Law: the real facts," a Web site attached to the UMass home page that outlines the merger of the Southern New England School of Law with UMass Dartmouth. The Web site neglects to specify which "pricing structure"— that of the Southern New England School of Law or UMass Dartmouth's — they are referring to.

In fact, according to the Web site, only UMass Dartmouth is referenced in terms of monetary connection to the new school. Well, if that is true perhaps UMass Dartmouth won't share the revenue either? That is somehow less doubtful than the idea of the law school not costing the University system, and taxpayers, any money.

It is true that the University system will acquire a standing, existing law school by merging with the Southern New England School of Law. However, the law school is not accredited by the American Bar Association, only by the regional bar association. Stated in its letter of purpose the BOT says that ABA accreditation is priority and can be managed within three years. Conflicting reports have come from both competitors and non-competitors, private and public, but none are as sure as the University that this is possible. The competitors' reports suggest that if the accreditation doesn't happen within three years, it would take more like six years and cost the University and taxpayers up to $39 million dollars.

The BOT contend that because both schools, UMD and SNESL, are on solid financial footing they will be able to meet the additional costs of the merger internally through private funding and reallocation of each of the school's annual budget surpluses. While this sounds peachy, the numbers don't match up. SNESL is valued at 9.7 million dollars and has a $350,000 annual budget surplus but is already 2.6 million in debt.

Two years ago Governor Mitt Romney shook up the higher education world by suggesting we downsize higher education by eliminating or merging several community colleges, combining other programs and taking severe budget cuts. Today we stand stuck in the same financial crisis and as a University are making strong strides away from state funding to be more independent and therefore more fiscally stable.

Adding a law school is just blurring the focus of our higher educational system more. The law school would be an unwieldy burden for the first ten years of existence and would drain not only the system overall but money from the individual campuses as our budgets are slashed so that the legislature can allocate funds to a failing law school we knew we didn't have the money for in the first place.

The Massachusetts Board of Higher Education will vote tomorrow, March 30, at their regular meeting on whether to approve the proposed merger and have said the decision will be based on the financial issues raised. As somebody interested in attending law school but with admittedly no funds to do so, the idea of a public law school where attendance costs $19,000 instead of $35,000 a year is like an oasis in the desert. We have to stop spending money we don't have as well as stop new projects without sound agreed upon financial and administrative plans.

'The Beekeeper' creates a buzz

Amos' latest studio album experiments with new sound

By Carey Zigouras
Collegian Correspondent

At first listen, Tori Amos' ninth studio album, "The Beekeeper," sounds no different stylistically from her previous album, 2002's "Scarlet's Walk." However, it's her lyrics that present a sense of closure to the journey experienced on her last record.

"Scarlet's Walk" left listeners at the end of a road trip, traveling along with Amos and her struggle through personal relationships. These personal themes were tied together by the recreation of the brutality and beauty of America's history. As per usual for Amos, the album was a collection of allusions, specifically to Native American folklore and stories, and combined sexual, religious, and feminist imagery created by her powerful manipulation of descriptive language. "The Beekeeper" is the conclusion to this voyage.

The intensity and directness of the opening track are thrown at the listener with the first words that writhe out of Amos' mouth: "When I come to terms with this my world will be changed. This song, "Parasol," reveals her desire to be at peace, and as the album progressively spins we are led to believe that she will be at her goal by the end. Even as the tracks waver from letting go and holding on she implies that one foot is already out the door.

The repetition of phrases such as "I know now that it's over" on the gospel-inspired track "Witness" are so obvious that the Tori fan eventually longs for the cryptic collection of images which usually dominate Amos' lyrics. On this same track, Amos uses her haunting yet honest voice to convey the difficulty of moving forward despite her desire to heal. But by this point it has become apparant that Amos has matured emotionally, so her attempts to be childish and creative are misplaced.

Amos revisits the idea of protesting original sin on "Original Sinsuality," a flashback to the lyric from "Raspberry Swirl" in which she says, "In the garden I did no crime." However, the song has no colorful lyrics and the title becomes the most original thing about the song, and becomes more of a gimmick.

The standout track named after the album will leave the listener with goosebumps. "The Beekeeper" creates a mood of impending reckoning with its electronic noise that subtely resembles buzzing and its anxious lyrics. Centering around the image of queen bee and her worker bee, Amos notes not to be confused by her just passing by because one day she will come for her. Amos' ability to lill her voice from shrillness to lower scratchiness smoothly radiate almost every track, but this track stands out, especially in the line "she's coming for you."

"The Power of Orange Knickers," which features Damien Rice on vocals, may be difficult to appreciate if you are not a fan of Amos' kookiness and wildly vivid imagination. And even if you are a fan, Amos' childish chanting now seems like a gimmick to show that although she has matured she has maintained her childishness.

On the worst track of the album, "Hoochie Woman," Amos tries to recreate the edgier sounds of 1998's "From the Choirgirl Hotel" which center around the power relations of sex. Amos attempts to recreate the grittiness of these issues light-heartedly on "Hoochie Woman," yet in eradicating the simultaneous personal and detached emptiness she loses her effectiveness. At first, it seems as if Amos strives to relax her grip on the heaviness of more serious issues. But without her usual imagery-compacted language and stylistic passion, she resorts to less passionate ways of saying the same thing over again.

Overall, it seems as if Amos is letting go of her past, and in this album she has let go of the intense passion that makes her great. Fans of "Scarlet's Walk" who want closure and maturation will get it on this album, as each track functions as a closing track. But for those who enjoy her stylistic experimentation, from the intimate piano to her techno remixes, and her dense language will find this album lacking.

U2 still chart-toppers despite Bono's pompous attitude

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

SANTA ANA, Calif. — This always surprises the true believers, but there are people who can't stand U2. And it doesn't take much more than an iPod ad to get them grumbling about the widely beloved Irish quartet.

The complaints almost always start with charismatic world-leader-pretend Bono; the Edge's guitar work and the steady thump of Adam Clayton and Larry Mullen Jr. rarely bug people. Just wait for the sanctified singer to open his mouth and make playfully pompous remarks like this, from yet another Grammy acceptance speech, in 2001:

"It's a very unusual emotion i'm feeling right now. i think it's called humility. I'm completely not used to it."

At the time, U2 was enjoying one triumph after another, confirming that the returning to old ways of its "All That You Can't Leave Behind" album was wise. "The whole year has been quite humbling," Bono continued. "Going back to scratch, reapplying for the job. What job? The best-band-in-the-world job."

Such a modest boy.

But decades of detractors haven't swayed U2's dogged determination to be rock's supreme torchbearer, nor have they affected the band's bank ledger. That's just not possible when tickets for its Vertigo Tour — likely the tour of the year — are fetching ungodly amounts on eBay.

U2 can keep reapplying for the position of world's-best if it wishes; last year's "How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb" plays like a Power Point presentation on the group's enduring strength and passion. But only the pope's job is more secure. No pretenders to the throne — those that might actually want it, like Coldplay, and those that couldn't care less, like Radiohead — come close to measuring up.

Consider U2's recent induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Typically that honor is bestowed on acts past their prime. Note U2's classmates: the Pretenders, Buddy Guy, the O'Jays, Percy Sledge. There have been forebears still making vital (or at least good) music past their 25th anniversaries: Dylan, McCartney, the Stones, Springsteen, Bowie, Elton, Prince, Sting.

None, however, can claim U2's massiveness, for none is a triple threat. Not one can (1) issue rabidly anticipated chart-topping blockbusters boasting music that defies demographics; (2) stir up effusive praise for work deemed as relevant now as its most influential albums were then; and (3) launch international juggernauts that sell out so fast millions are left furious over fan-club presales.

Yes, when the Boss or the Stones or Elton or Prince tour, that packs arenas. But what of their most recent material? The Stones have made only half-memorable albums since "Tattoo You" more than two decades ago. Elton and Prince have shaped up considerably, but "Peachtree Roud" ain't "Goodbye Yellow Brick Road" and no one's comparing "Musicology" to "Purple Rain."

Dylan, Springsteen, Paul Simon and Sting keep turning out thoughtful, incisive commentary, much of it acclaimed — yet what keeps their minions forking over hundreds to see them live isn't new work. No one, apart from maybe

'Armed and Fabulous' doesn't live up to expectations with its shaky narrative

By Chris Hewitt
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Great comedies. "Clueless." "Flirting With Disaster." "The Ref." are like rockets, with every element working together to achieve liftoff. The inconsistent "Miss Congeniality 2: Armed and Fabulous" is more like a firecracker that spirals all over the place, exploding in some places and fizzling out in others.

Luckily, there is more exploding than fizzling. "Congeniality 2" begins with an intriguing idea: What would the fallout be for FBI agent Gracie Hart, who infiltrated the Miss United States pageant in "Congeniality 1" and is now too well-known to go undercover? I like that idea, and I like it that Sandra Bullock, who plays Gracie, is a star with the instincts of an ensemble player. she'll do almost anything for a laugh, and she likes to surround herself with funny people.

Diedrich Bader is a hoot as a stylist who is Carson Kressleyer than Carson Kressley. Regina King is likable and tart as an FBI agent who thinks Gracie is a Federal Barbie of investigation. William Shatner pokes holes in his own windbag as a pageant honcho whose kidnapping gives Gracie a chance to de-Barbie herself and get back to investigating. Even an autograph hunter at a Vegas bar, a character I don't even think has a name, is briefly hilarious.

Weirdly, casting also leads to some problems. Where's Benjamin Bratt, who played Gracie's squeeze in the first "Congeniality"? We're supposed to be invested in their relationship, which is hard to do since the producers were too cheap to hire him to show up in this film. Unfortunately, they did pay a salary to the wooden Elisabeth Rohm, who was recently canned from "Law & Order." Trust me, "Law & Order's" loss is "Miss Congeniality 2's" loss, too. And, although I'm delighted to see Eileen Brennan under any circumstances, there's no way she could be William Shatner's mother unless time travel was involved.

These people have an easy rapport that helps get the movie over some humps. The clunky script, for instance, seems to have been assembled like so: Somebody came up with a list of five things they wanted to see Gracie do, then tried to come up with a "story" to connect the five things. It's as if I wrote five random paragraphs and then tried to connect them by starting each paragraph with the word "therefore."

Therefore, we have very little investment in the disjointed narrative. But the scenes that do work, like a Tina Turner impersonation in which Bullock, as is her wont, sings backup for King, if not fabulous are, at least, quite congenial.

Punk landmark is a letdown

By Malcolm X Abram
Knight Ridder Newspapers

NEW YORK — It's 10:30 p.m. March 20 in New York City, and down in the Bowery at the seedy-looking little rock club Country Bluegrass Blues & Other Music For Uplifting Gormandizers, better known around the world as CBGB, a gaggle of young bands had crossed the tiny stage. The evening was winding down, and only a few music lovers and friends were left to make the remaining musicians' CBGB experience memorable.

Seven bands — Grey Tide, Sever, 7 Ways Out, Evan Tolerant, Step Aside, The Vaux and A Dying Declaration — took the stage this night, did their best to rock the smallish crowd, and as the place slowly began to clear out, the uninterested staff started to clean up so they could go home.

By 11:30 it was all over and for this reporter and music fan, the CBGB experience was underwhelming and a bit disappointing. But going to CBGB is like making a pilgrimage to punk's holy land and although I'm pretty sure I didn't see the future of rock that night, I still feel I've scratched a long-suffering itch simply by walking through the club's entrance.

CBGB is the acknowledged birthplace of American punk, and during the '70s it was the headquarters of a scene that can claim Rock and Roll Hall of Fame inductees the Ramones and the Talking Heads. It sent a wave of excitement through rock whose reverberations are still being felt in popular music.

Virtually every punk and punk/pop band on the charts today owes a debt to the owner, 75-year-old Hilly Kristal, who opened the club in December 1973 to book the country, folk and bluegrass bands he wanted to hear. That mission changed fairly quickly when three guys named Richard Lloyd, Tom Verlaine and Richard Hell had their manager book their band, Television, a Sunday night gig.

A few years later a rock revolution was born as the club was considered home to a host of exciting bands such as Blondie, Patti Smith and Richard Hell and the Voidoids, and the place where foreign bands including the Damned and the Jam made their New York debuts.

But for the last four years the club, so legendary it's used by the city of New York in advertisements, has been in danger of becoming nothing but a legend. Its landlord, the Bowery Residents' Committee, which runs the homeless shelter adjacent to the club, wants more than $91,000 in back rent owed to them by Kristal. If they don't get it, both CBGB and the much nicer-looking CB's Lounge next door will be evicted, ending 33 years of rock 'n roll history.

Like many rock fans, every time I set foot in the Big Apple I hoped I'd have time to go down to the Bowery, and not because some hot band was playing there, because these days the bands are almost secondary to experiencing the venue itself. But as I paid my $3 and walked past the musty curtain that separates the entrance from the bar, I wondered what I expected to see and whether, in 2005, CBGB is really worth saving.

I was looking for ghosts. The ghosts of a vibrant scene like no other in American rock history, the walls of the club that always appeared to be on the brink of crashing down from the noise made by the bands, covered in fliers and stickers from current and long-gone bands for whom playing at CBGB was the zenith of their careers. I was looking for something ephemeral, a feeling, a vibe, a bit of graffiti from an admired musician scrawled on the walls of the legendary repulsive bathroom, anything that could take me back to 1977, when the club and the bands that played there mattered.

In reality, what's left is a felsty old man who naturally doesn't want to give up his business or his place in rock history ("I'm energized, I'm going to fight," Kristal told the Associated Press), and musicians who remember what was.

"I consider it a historic place, It would be like losing a landmark of sorts, you know?" former Ramones drummer Tommy Erdelyi, better known as Tommy Ramone, recently told the AP.

But Erdelyi didn't mention the last time he actually went to CBGB and checked out a band, or how much of his (likely very small) Ramones royalties he was willing to give to help save the club.

At the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame induction, where Kristal was an invited guest, just about every rock star, movie star and record executive in the room could afford to dig the club out of its current predicament. But beyond delaying Kristal's transition into retirement, what would be the point? The trails have been blazed, the legend solidified, the books written, and now the place is a shell of its former self.

As I watched the average hardcore band Sever give way to nominal headliners A Dying Declaration, an equally average emo band, there was no excitement, no feeling that I was witnessing the next revolution in rock or even a soon-to-be popular band. There were no famed rock critics such as Lester Bangs or Robert Christgau checking out the next thing, no record label weasels looking to jump on a new zeitgeist, just friends, family and a soundman who looked liked he wished he was anywhere but the storied club.

Chances are that in a few years, the only place a hardcore rock fan will be able to see the familiar storefrunt will be as part of an exhibit at the Rock Hall or on the hot-selling T-shirts that earn Kristal about $2 million a year in sales. Perhaps that is how it should be, because those visitors will probably get as much of a sense of CBGB's former mystique as I did standing in the middle of the club looking like a tourist.

But if I happen to be at that exhibit and someone asks, I will still proudly say, "Yeah, I went there once. it was pretty cool."

Why do I have three forks?

Find ABC's 'Lost' around Hawaii's beautiful Oahu

By Chuck Barney
Knight Ridder Newspapers

In the early days of "Lost," ABC's tantalizing plane-crash survival saga, a few of its stir-crazy castaways are seen gazing up at an all-encompassing drapery of majestic green mountains when one of them flashes a look of utter terror and asks, "Guys, where are we?"

Anyone familiar with Hawaii immediately could have told them that they were on the island of Oahu — and more specifically, somewhere in Kuaawa Valley region, not all that far away from civilization, some hot showers and really refreshing shave ice.

But then again, why spoil the fun? They're supposed to be lost, after all.

Since its debut last fall, "Lost," with its twisty plots and mind-blowing mysteries, has been one of prime-time's hottest shows. At least some of the credit should go to the Aloha State, according to co-creator and executive producer Damon Lindelof. The enigmatic island upon which the castaways are marooned is, of course, a key character in the show, and he says Hawaii handles the role with aplomb.

"We could have shot it in Southern California or somewhere else, but we figured that if you're doing a show about a plane wreck on an island in the South Pacific, you really need an island in the South Pacific," says Lindelof. "The jungles and the mountains and the way the water looks are all unique to Hawaii. If the audience doesn't buy the illusion, they check out."

Clearly, the audience has bought it, and now some of the show's fervent followers are starting to express an interest in "Lost" production sites. They want to know where, exactly, did Oceanic Flight 815 "crash." Or where the castaways hold those goofy golf games. Or where — shudder — that creepy unseen jungle "monster" lurks.

"The show has such a powerful pull, and people, in some way, want to be a part of it," says Honolulu film commissioner Walea Constantinau. "It's sort of like the connection Lord of the Rings' has with New Zealand. It's shot in a very intriguing, mysterious place that piques everyone's interest."

Constantinau says she has fielded numerous inquiries about the series and that her office, along with the Oahu Visitors Bureau, is planning a special Web link to help tourists get "Lost" while they're visiting Hawaii.

Unfortunately, some of the film locations are as impenetrable as the show's mythology. For example, the site where Locke (Terry O'Quinn) first eyed the island creature is on private North Shore property. And those freshwater caves where some of the castaways hang out? They're actually a fabricated set on a Honolulu soundstage, which has its own eerie story to tell. (It's a former Xerox warehouse and site of a multiple murder).

On the other hand, several sites, including the plane-crash beach, not only are open to the public, they offer all sorts of enticing diversions that go beyond just some Hollywood make-believe. Here's a rundown:

• Mokuleia Beach: Located a few miles west of the fabled beaches of Oahu's North Shore and in a mostly undeveloped area near road's end, Mokuleia is often overlooked by tourists. John R.K. Clark, author of "Oahu's Best Beaches," says that's what makes it a "haven for anyone seeking some solitude and a perfect place for all those castaways to get lost."

Indeed, Mokuleia is where the TV show's plane — or at least its hulking fuselage — performed its explosive crash-and-burn. Apparently it was quite convincing, because when the pilot episode was shot last winter, several startled residents phoned emergency officials in the area.

The plane's carcass has since been dismantled, and any remaining parts used by the castaways are now on private property. And so the stretch of sand where Jack (Matthew Fox) tended to all those injured crash victims is open to beachcombers, snorkelers, swimmers, campers and anyone else seeking to commune with nature. (Visitors should be aware that it can be subject to dangerously high waves in winter). During periods of high winds, the waters off Mokuleia (the word means "district of abundance" says Clark) become a premier windsurfing spot.

• Kualoa Ranch: This 4,000-acre working cattle ranch, which spreads from breathtaking mountain cliffs to the sparkling Pacific, is an outdoor lover's paradise — offering horseback riding, ATV rides, kayaking and more.

It's no wonder, then, that Hurley (Jorge Garcia) picked this spot to lay out his makeshift two-hole golf course. Yes, Kualoa Ranch, near the city of Kaneohe, is where the castaways go to get their minds off the island heebie-jeebies and work on their putting.

"We've had some people ask us when it is that we're going to put in an actual golf course, but I don't think that's in the plans," says ranch owner and general manager John Morgan.

The "Lost" film crew drops by Kualoa at least a couple of times a month (production ends this month) to shoot many of those gorgeous valley scenes. This is also where Sayid (Naveen Andrews) and company hiked the hills to pull in that troubling radio transmission from the sadistic Frenchwoman.

"Lost" isn't Kualoa's first brush with Hollywood. Its credits also include parts of "Jurassic Park," "50 First Dates," "Pearl Harbor," "Godzilla" and others. Visitors here can take a tour that offers an up-close and personal view of the film sites.

• Waimea Valley Audubon Center: A three-quarter-mile walk from the park entrance will lead you to lovely Waihi Falls, which dumps into a cool jungle pool. Visitors are invited to take a dip (weather permitting), but "Lost" fans might think twice.

This, after all, is the pond where Kate (Evangeline Lilly) and Sawyer (Josh Holloway) took what they thought would be a refreshing swim, only to come upon two submerged corpses still buckled into their airplane seats.

Park director Diana King promises that visitors will find "no dead bodies — as long as you don't dive or do anything dangerous."

The lush 1,800-acre Waimea Valley actually is much more lovely than creepy. As a home to archaeological sites and remnants of old Hawaiian settlements, as well as a vast array of tropical blooms, birds, fish and other wildlife, it provides the perfect opportunity for visitors to immerse themselves in Oahu's natural and cultural history.

• Byodo-In Temple: The verdant Koolau mountains serve as a stunning backdrop for the Valley of the Temples Memorial Park, the centerpiece of which is this majestic replica of a 900-year-old temple of the same name in Uji, Japan.

Here is where, in a precrash flashback, Sun (Yunjin Kim) and Jin (Daniel Dae Kim) first met and began making plans for their marriage.

Fortunately, the environs are much more tranquil than their relationship turned out to be.

The temple is surrounded by large ponds teeming with colorful Japanese carp. An 18-foot meditation Buddha rises above the quiet scene, and the booming sounds emitted from a 3-ton temple bell occasionally disrupt the stillness.

Legend has it that good luck comes to those who are able to ring the bell. Apparently, those beleaguered castaways of "Lost" never have.

The Hawaiian island of Oahu Visitor's Bureau plans to release a Web link for fans of ABC's prime-time hit show "Lost" to explore the island.

U2 still on top

critics, goes to see Bruce hoping he'll play lots from "The Rising."

Exactly the opposite has proved true of U2, whose platform for making purposeful statements has only widened. Its fans seem as eager to hear new material in concert as they do classic anthems from the titans in the band's catalog. 1987's stately "The Joshua Tree" and 1991's extreme makeover "Achtung Baby."

There's a consumer-freshness that U2 has miraculously maintained over the years that has no parallel. Consider what song leads off the latest "Now That's What I Call Music" compendium of inescapable youth-geared hits. Not something by Gwen or Snoop or Ashlee. It's "Vertigo."

No band , its original lineup intact, that has been together as long could manage such a trick. No one else over 40 is even on Top 40 radio now.

How has U2 done it? With consistency of vision, a singular (and straightforward) marriage of music and message with global appeal, and an innate ability to stay current.

Look at that last point first, even though it seems the most frivolous. Start by recalling the up-to-the-minute openers U2 has chosen over the years: Public Enemy, Rage Against the Machine, PJ Harvey, No Doubt and, for this outing, Kings of Leon. Like Bowie, U2 stays modern simply by keeping up with the Joneses.

Yet it's said that straining to seem hip is why U2 lost its way in the '90s. I don't think it did, actually; its most maligned discs, "Zooropa" (1993) and "Pop" (1997), are not nearly the atrocities some claim.

"Zooropa," I think, is more sonically invigorating than "Achtung" and showed the band capable of Eno-abetted abstraction, where sound says more than statements. Take away those regretful nods to techno and the best of "Pop" could sit well alongside anything on their adjudged masterpieces. Likewise, moodier parts of "The Unforgettable Fire" (1984) and "War" (1983, an album as atmospheric as it was angry) wouldn't seem out-of-place on "Zooropa."

Such interchangeability is clear proof of sustained vision — and for egotism run rampant, "Rattle and Hum" (1988) is more deplorable than "Pop." But then, nothing on "Pop" could make millions sing along the way, say, "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" might. That's why it's deemed a misfire: It doesn't live up to U2's monumental reputation.

Despite the years of off-putting corporate gestures, somehow these intrinsically working-class street punks have never strayed so far into glitz that their Christian-rooted foundation has been cracked. Turning to God, questioning master plans while simultaneously pleading for salvation (for themselves, for us) always seems to restore them to their original path. And those most inspired fans, connected since "Under a Blood Red Sky" as if united in a holy war, embrace them like prodigal sons.

They seek out themes prevalent in almost any U2 song, no matter the guise: Peace for all, and lay down your guns. Give more than the crumbs from your table. Realize that sometimes you can't make it on your own, and walk on.

One love, naturally.

Which brings me back to St. Bono, the living embodiment, for better and worse, of John Lennon's social concern and indefatigable optimism. He campaigns constantly for worthy causes — AIDS prevention in Africa, Third World debt relief. He tries tirelessly to enable dialogue between battling factions, whether in Ireland, the States or throughout Europe.

No wonder he's nominated, again, for the Nobel Peace Prize, the only rocker other than Live Aid organizer Bob Geldof to get that recognition. No wonder rumor circulated that he was a candidate for the World Bank presidency. (He wasn't being considered, and he's not interested in the gig.)

No wonder people grow resentful of his omnipresence. Best intentions aside, we love to destroy crusaders.

Bono's influence, though, is immense and still growing; he can command an audience with any major leader at this point. Heaven forbid an unexpected death in his musical family brings a premature end to U2; there's no telling what sort of force he could become on the world stage.

Come to think of it, he already is that. Who else in rock 'n' roll since Lennon has been able to say the same? And still regularly hit No. 1?

Michigan State has huge task at hand in North Carolina

By Alan Schmadtke
Knight Ridder

AUSTIN, Texas — Kelvin Torbert isn't supposed to be going to this Final Four. He's supposed to already have been there and already gone to the NBA.

He and his senior classmates at Michigan State are supposed to have accounted for at least one Big Ten title and at least one more Final Four appearance than they have in hand.

That's because when Spartans Coach Tom Izzo brought in his group of newcomers four seasons ago, comparisons to former stars such as Mateen Cleaves and Magic Johnson were tossed out.

When Torbert, Alan Anderson and Chris Hill rolled into East Lansing, Mich., as freshmen in 2001, Michigan State was coming off its third consecutive trip to the Final Four, including a national-title season in 2000. That freshman class was supposed to keep the Spartans express rolling.

But this is the Spartans' first Final Four since '01, and Izzo acknowledges an abiding appreciation for a group of seniors that were, he told the Detroit Free Press earlier this season, "beaten on, run over, spit on, you name it."

Michigan State's seniors aren't the stars, but they're the emotional fuel and force for a surprising Final Four run. Reaching Saturday's national semifinal as a No. 5 regional seed, the Spartans (26-6) face North Carolina (31-4) in Saturday's prime-time game at the Edward Jones Dome. The winner gets Illinois or Louisville in Monday's title game.

"We've kind of taken to heart that our five seniors have been through a lot of things," said junior center Paul Davis, including lifth-year senior Tim Bograkos and walk-on Andy Harvey in the group. "They have been places where not a lot of people have gone. They have been successful in those places. We want to send them off right.

"That's what we are doing it for. We're going to be fighting for them, and they'll be rolling along with us."

Michigan State's run through the Austin Regional, swarming top-seeded Duke and squeezing past second-seeded Kentucky in two overtimes, provided as much relief for the Spartans as it did appreciation. This is a team that once had an 11-game losing streak against ranked opponents.

Getting to St. Louis is especially gratifying for a coach who experienced pangs of guilt about his button-pushing with his senior class. Izzo admitted that following up with a three-year run of Final Four trips with a three-year drought — and twice not getting to the Sweet 16 — forced him to appreciate the Spartans' earlier success. And how rocky and winding the road can be.

He also said he wished he could have helped more when Zach Randolph bolted for the NBA after his freshman season in 2001. Randolph would have elevated the play of this year's seniors for one or two seasons. And Izzo admitted he overscheduled last season when the Spartans were 18-12, their worst season since 1996-97, and lost in the first round of the tourney to Nevada.

"After what these guys have been through, I think this was the most satisfying of all of them," Izzo said. "This one for me (is) special, there's no question. I felt guilty that I put these seniors through more than they deserved. Now it is rewarding. What didn't kill us made us stronger. We survived."

Said Torbert: "In the years I have been here, this is the team that has been through the most. We're still standing because we fought our way through. It says a lot of all of us, not just the senior class."

One reason Izzo stands in admiration for his seniors is that Hill did get better off the bench and didn't complain when Neitzel kept starting. Torbert, a high school All-American some analysts thought might skip college altogether and go to the NBA, has accepted his bench role, too.

"I feel like everything happens for a reason," Anderson said.

high school players in the country.

He can play inside or out, but his spot has been filled by senior Jawad Williams, who gives Carolina considerable experience but only slightly more production. Marvin Williams started the season on the bench, stayed there when his play quickly accelerated and even when Jawad Williams was plagued by a hip injury.

"Marvin sees that Sean (May) and Jawad have had pretty good years, so he's accepted his role and knows that he is extremely important," Roy Williams said. "(Starting) was not what was best for our team. Jawad has struggled lately, but it has not necessarily hurt us by having Marvin come off the bench."

Not by any stretch. He was the best player in the first two rounds of the NCAA Tournament in Charlotte, scoring 40 points on 16-of-23 shooting and grabbing 23 rebounds, prompting May to say, "I call him 'Rookie', but he's not a rookie anymore."

Despite a less productive regional, Williams has received reviews approaching those of former freshman phenoms Luol Deng of Duke and Carmelo Anthony of Syracuse.

Almost. If starting, he might be at their level. But that's not an issue for Marvin Williams, who said he was "definitely comfortable with" the transformation from super prep to college reserve.

"It was kind of tough at first, but I accepted it easily," he said. "It was something Coach wanted me to do and was best for our team."

Marvin Williams could have stayed close to home and played for Lorenzo Romar at Washington.

But he was lured to North Carolina. He said he never truly gave the NBA a thought in high school, and he wanted to be somewhere that a national championship was within reach.

"Coming from a high school where we never won a state championship, I wanted to come to North Carolina to win a national championship," he said. "I'd rather be on the bench and win a national championship."

Williams rarely wastes the 22 minutes he gets per game. He averages 11.7 points and 6.6 rebounds and he can shoot from anywhere — 51 percent from the field, 45 percent beyond the 3-point arc, and 86 percent from the free-throw line.

"Marvin is as big as Jawad and Sean and comes in and is able to do so many things for us — rebounding, scoring," Roy Williams said. "That enables Sean and Jawad to not have to pace themselves."

That means one of the best players in the country will come off the bench at the Edward Jones Dome on Saturday night.

"I'm on a team where everyone is good," he said, "and I'm just looking to win a national championship."

NBA talent backfires for Cards

By George Richards
Knight Ridder

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Just imagine how good Louisville could be right now.

The Cardinals, winners of 22 of their past 23 games, head into the Final Four one of the hottest teams in the nation.

When Louisville tips off Saturday night against top-ranked Illinois in a national semifinal, the Cardinals will celebrate their current position and not worry about what could have been.

Think about this: Louisville signed prep star Sebastian Telfair and junior college standout Donta Smith, yet both opted for the NBA draft. Brian Johnson, a 6-9 freshman, had season-ending surgery on his right knee in November.

Despite all the adversity, the Cardinals have rolled right along.

All the way to St. Louis.

"It has happened so quick, and this season has caught me off guard because we felt we really were going to struggle to make the tournament this year," said coach Rick Pitino, the first to take three different programs to the Final Four.

"We thought we were thin. We thought we were going to fight. We were willing to fight to make the tournament, and suddenly we realize we have a really good basketball team that was unselfish and certain things you cannot measure. We had injuries throughout the season, but we kept winning despite all of that.

"These guys just have great character and they are all very different people, but they are all in together. It's one heartbeat."

For Larry O'Bannon, this trip to St. Louis may be a little more special. A native of Louisville, he knows firsthand what the success of this team means to the people of the city.

This is Louisville's first trip to the Final Four since the Cardinals won the 1986 national championship by knocking off Duke in Dallas.

"This really brings the community together," he said. "They really support this team."

Pitino has the Cardinals playing great basketball while stressing the team game. While players such as Francisco Garcia, O'Bannon and Taquan Dean have stood out throughout the season and the tournament, none of them plays selfish basketball.

In wins against top-seeded Washington and West Virginia in the Albuquerque Regional, the Cardinals won because players broke inside and dished out to the open man.

"When you win and are successful," Pitino said, "opportunities and doors open for each one of them individually if they play as a team.

"When you're regarded as a winner and you're successful, money chases you. When you go out for yourselves and you go after your points or your stats and you lose, success and opportunities never follow you."

After beating Washington in impressive fashion, O'Bannon and Garcia spoke to the media. While they joked, they got serious when talk turned to their team.

"From Day One we preached team balance and unselfishness," O'Bannon said, "and to always make that extra pass to your teammates. That's our team motto. And when we go out there and play, that's what we show.

Weber feeling out of place

By Jeremy Rutherford
Knight Ridder

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Illinois coach Bruce Weber said he took one look at his coaching counterparts in the NCAA Final Four and discovered, "I'm the pup."

Weber, 48, will be coaching in his first Final Four when Illinois (36-1) faces Louisville (33-4) at 5:07 p.m. Saturday at the Edward Jones Dome.

Louisville's Rick Pitino (five), North Carolina's Roy Williams (five) and Michigan State's Tom Izzo (four) will have combined for 14 Final Four appearances after this weekend. Among active coaches, the three coaches rank among the top six in trips to the Final Four.

Despite Illinois' success this year, which now includes the school's first trip to the Final Four since 1989, Weber said he has a long way to go to be considered one of the top coaches in the game.

"I think you have to do it over the course of time," said Weber, who is in his seventh season as a head coach, the last two with the Illini. "It's a dream, there's no doubt. But there are so many coaches that have put in so much more time than I have. To have that opportunity to go, it's very humbling."

The hysteria from Saturday night's 90-89 overtime victory over Arizona has made it tough for Weber to realize the next step for the Illini. The Final Four is a whole new world.

"I'm not sure it's sunk in," Weber said. "I've gone 20-something years (to the Final Four), but you go to a couple meetings, it's sort of a social, all the coaches having fun. This time, we're not going to get an opportunity to do that."

Weber has a busy itinerary in St. Louis. In addition to coaching the Illini on Saturday, he will attend two banquets — for the US Basketball Writers Association and The Associated Press — to receive national coaching awards over the weekend.

Weber already has placed a couple of phone calls to colleagues to ask how they handled the business of playing in the Final Four. He left messages for Connecticut's Jim Calhoun and even Michigan State's Tom Izzo.

Wait a minute. Izzo's in the Final Four.

"He'll call me," Weber said. "The couple of comments I heard from different people were ... they wished they would have let their kids enjoy it more because, all of the sudden, it's over.

"I told them (Sunday), 'I know you're tired, I know it's a long season, but at the same time, you're probably not going to get to come here again, the seniors for sure. Enjoy the fun.'"

Weber admitted that while the Illini's goal is winning the national championship, it has felt like a relief advancing to the Final Four.

"Because so many people have pointed to it," he said. "Every (computer) screen saver I see is 'March to the Arch.' It's all over the place. But that's what we talked about conveying to the players: 'Let's not be satisfied: let's go for the whole thing.'"

Then, Weber's name would be added to an elite list of coaches, those who have won national championships. In this Final Four alone, Pitino and Izzo have one title apiece.

Even if the Illini don't win, Weber will have cashed in on at least one dream.

"As a coach coming up, you always watch the practices and kind of think, 'Man, I wish some day we have that opportunity,'" Weber said. "Now, people are going to be watching us. So it's a good feeling."

Augustine gets therapy

Junior forward James Augustine, who fouled out of Saturday's win late in the regulation, received therapy Sunday to help an aching left knee. He injured the knee in the game, and while Illini aren't saying how it happened, Augustine is supposed to be fine.

"This has been a problem that occurred back in the summer," Weber said. "It's just kind of reoccurred. I don't think it's anything real serious. All of the sudden it just bothered him."

Augustine was mum Monday.

"It doesn't hurt," he said. "People are blowing it out of proportion."

MICHAEL MCKEVITT/DALLAS MORNING NEWS

Illinois' Luther Head soars to the basket against Arizona on Saturday. The Illini are in the Final Four after defeating Arizona 90-89 in overtime. Illinois will play Louisville for a spot in the championship.

to be there, and the young kids have had to step up," Twomley said.

"Look at the infield. The oldest guys are Bryan Adamski and Anthony Santos (both sophomores), and the rest are all freshmen. They all know their role; they all know what they have to do.

"In close, one-run games, maturity can play a factor, but we don't want to use that as an excuse for the way things have turned out."

Junior David Sullivan (0-1) is penciled in as starter for tomorrow, though Stone will likely use a committee approach similar to their mid-week game against UConn on March 22, and Sullivan will probably only see a few innings of work. Sullivan has one blown save this year to go along with a 2.35 earned run average.

In his last outing, Saturday's 6-5 loss to Xavier, Sullivan allowed one run on three hits in 3-1/3 innings of relief of Doherty while walking one and striking out three.

Sacred Heart comes into today's contest batting .211 as a team, compared to UMass's team average of a mere .192.

The Pioneers are led by senior outfielder Curtis Lewsey, who in 18 games at second base is hitting .339 while ranking first on the team in runs (seven), hits (20) and doubles (three).

Smith starstruck at tourney

By David Haugh
Knight Ridder

CHICAGO — Queasiness set in for Dean Smith shortly after he walked into the Los Angeles Sports Arena hours before the 1968 NCAA men's basketball title game between his North Carolina Tar Heels and UCLA.

Smith caught a glimpse of Lew Alcindor, the 7-foot-2-inch walking prescription for antacid tablets for opposing coaches. Just the sight of Alcindor put the butterflies in Smith's stomach on red alert.

"Then it kind of grabbed me what was happening to me, and I thought it was ridiculous to feel that way," recalled Smith, 37 at the time and coaching in his first of five national championship games. "So I decided to stick to my game plan. I thought maybe we could play [Alcindor] straight up. Except our center (Rusty Clark) was a future thoracic surgeon and theirs became Kareem Abdul-Jabbar. Shows you what I knew."

Alcindor, who later changed his name to Abdul-Jabbar and became the NBA's all-time leader scorer, made North Carolina pay for not double-teaming him with 34 points and 16 rebounds in a 78-55 rout that was the most lopsided championship game in NCAA history until 1990.

Smith, who eventually won more games than any men's coach in NCAA history (879), learned a valuable lesson from that experience that had nothing to do with coaching on an empty stomach.

"Coaches play a big role in making sure you're improving as a team, how you react to injuries, and many important things about the job," Smith said. "But players win championships."

Players author national titles yet even Smith concedes it is the head coach's signature that leaves the most indelible mark on a program.

The NCAA men's basketball tournament, another term for the coaching insomniacs convention that lasts three weeks every March, focuses inordinate attention on the men who lead the 65 teams lucky enough to get a bid.

For the Final Four coaches still alive in the tournament, the scrutiny increases with each step. But so do the rewards.

Wisconsin-Milwaukee coach Bruce Pearl, for example, added points to his coaching IQ in the eyes of major-college athletic directors in search of a head coach with surprise victories over Boston College and Alabama. That's why Tennessee named Pearl its newest head coach on Monday. And Pearl didn't even make the Final Four.

Illinois coach Bruce Weber probably could run for governor if he leads the Illini to a national championship as many expect.

Lute Olson of Arizona and Eddie Sutton of Oklahoma State are among the biggest celebrities in their respective states. Bob Knight, Mike Krzyzewski, Roy Williams ... the list of larger-than-life college basketball coaches goes on.

They make their reputations in March, but do they make the biggest difference in the tournament that defines their sport?

"I'm not into the whole, 'I'm smarter than you,' thing," said former Arkansas coach Nolan Richardson, who led the Razorbacks to back-to-back NCAA championship game appearances in 1994-95. Richardson's Arkansas team beat Duke in '94 but lost to UCLA in '95.

He did not consider himself a better coach than Krzyzewski after winning in the final any more than he considered himself a lesser coach than Jim Harrick after losing a year later.

"Basketball is a game of decisions and the guys who make the best decisions are going to beat you, so at tournament time you just tell the kids, 'You've been prepared, now just go out and play,'" Richardson said. "Nothing fancy."

In 17 years at Arkansas, Richardson did not believe in setting rigid times for pre-game meals, putting in specific plays on the days of games or developing elaborate scouting reports that occupy so many assistant coaches' time, especially with the quick turnaround between games during the tournament. The previous 24 weeks were for preparation more than the preceding 24 hours.

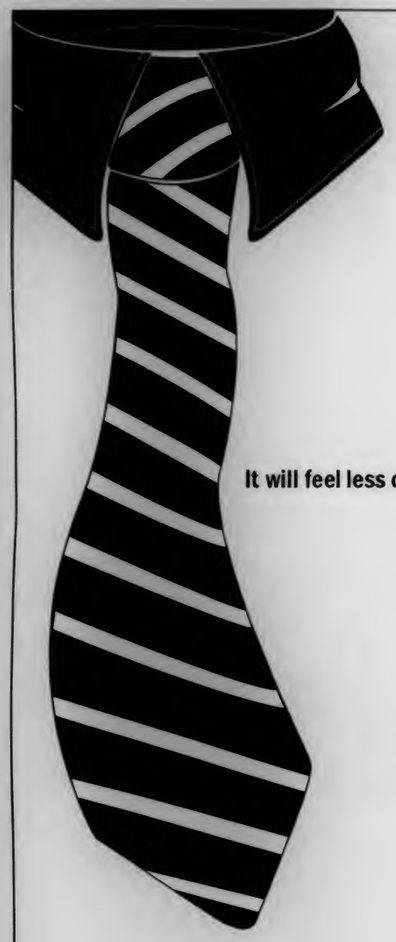
He based his philosophy from experience. When Richardson was a high school player his coach had the team spend the day before a district championship at his home studying every last detail so thoroughly that "by the time the game came, I was tighter than Dick's hat band," he said.

Former Louisville coach Denny Crum, who won national titles in 1980 and 1986, started preparing during the previous summer when the school finalized the schedule. He preferred beefing it up and building month-by-month to March, the only month Crum thought really mattered.

"We'd add a little wrinkle to our offense as the season progressed, so that by the time the tournament started, the real coaching was over," Crum said. "My feeling was you do what you do all year and don't change things just because of the added pressure of the tournament. We never did."

To wit, before each national championship game in '86, the Cardinals eschewed game-planning and the final practice focused on fundamentals with Pervis Ellison performing jump stops as if it were the first day of practice. Crum downplayed the notion of a 40-minute chess game and thought the biggest coaching challenge of the six-game season known as March Madness involved the media.

"You need to have a good sports information director who can isolate you from distractions," Crum said. "With players, they don't need to be motivated at that stage. Just be positive and supportive. From a basketball standpoint, there are not many moves you can make that will affect the outcome."



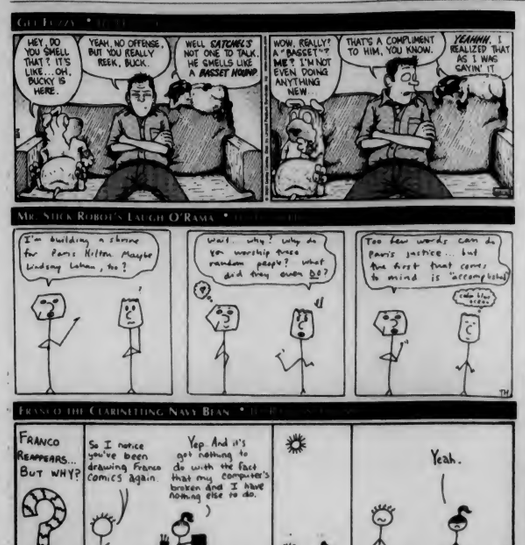
Though Crum still regrets one he never made. In the second round of a 1981 NCAA tournament game, Louisville led Arkansas by a point when the Razorbacks' U.S. Reed sank a 50-footer at the buzzer to oust the Cardinals, 73-72. Twenty-four years later, it still bugs Crum he never told the two players he assigned to Reed during a time-out to make him dribble left.

"He could not have thrown it 50 feet with his left hand," Crum said. "That's the only move I can think of I'd do over if I could."

Retired Michigan State coach Jud Heathcote can laugh about the time his biggest X-and-O miscalculation almost resulted in a Spartan SOS.

It was in the 1979 national title game and Michigan State led Indiana State by 16 just four minutes into the second half when Greg Kelser picked up his fourth foul. Heathcote pulled Kelser and left him on the bench longer than he should have, in retrospect.

"I almost blew it because they had cut it to six with about eight minutes left so I put him back in and crossed my fingers," Heathcote said. "If he had fouled out, we probably would not have won the title. It was a gamble."



It will feel less constricting at a great job.

UMass looks to end struggles

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

If last weekend's forgettable trip to Cincinnati, Ohio is any indicator of where the Massachusetts baseball team stands within the Atlantic 10 Conference, then this afternoon's contest against the Sacred Heart Pioneers (3-15) should be an excellent indicator of where it stands within the northeast.

While UMass (3-13 0-3 A-10) and the Pioneers have accumulated just six wins combined, SHU comes into today on a two-game winning streak, taking the last two in a three-game series against Mount St. Mary's last weekend. The Minutemen, on the other hand, are losers of eight straight, their last victory coming 16 days ago when Keith Doherty (1-4) earned his first and only win of the season in a complete-game shutout.

The Maroon and White have been seriously lacking in offense since that point, getting blown out (18-3 loss to Xavier) in some occasions and missing hits when they need them (2-1 loss to Illinois State, 6-5 and 2-1 losses to Xavier) at other times.

"The toughest task we're facing right now is trying to generate hits," senior Jason Twomley said. "We're popping a lot of balls up. When runners get into scoring position, we can't manage to drive them in. After games, all we can say is that we played all nine innings hard. The effort's there, the intensity's there, we just need to get one or two more big hits."

That isn't to say the pitching hasn't underperformed, as the UMass hurlers allowed a total of 24 runs over the three-game series with Xavier last weekend.

But right now the light at the end of the tunnel, though significantly diminished, is dimly-lit and flickering thanks in part to the return of Twomley (.444 batting average, five home runs) to the lineup after missing three weeks with a broken wrist.

In his return to the lineup last weekend, the Fitchburg native went 7-for-10 from the plate, accounting for six runs, three home runs and three runs batted in to garner A-10 Player of the Week honors. After breaking his wrist in a game against Delaware on March 5, Twomley did everything in his power to let the wrist heal, and it has certainly paid off.

"My wrist felt great [last weekend]," Twomley said. "The doctor said the best thing to do was to not do anything for three weeks, even if that meant not getting to play in Florida [during spring break]. I really gave it a chance to heal, and now it's in the best possible shape.

"It felt great swinging this weekend. It felt like brand new because I did everything I could to get it to 100 percent. There are no complications."

An estimate on how long Curt Szado, UMass's other leading hitter (.333, 12 hits, seven RBI) is still unknown. The senior outfielder injured his shoulder on March 19 by diving for a ball in the gap against Army, the last opponent they faced in Florida before departing back to Amherst.

With holes still in the armor of the Maroon and White batsmen, coach Mike Stone has been turning to the youth of the Minutemen to provide some spark, especially in the infield. But with youth comes lack of experience — especially at the plate — something that becomes very important in close one-run games.

"Obviously with us losing Szado, some leadership needs your advantage."

The Maroon and White come into the match having won three in a row and four-of-five. Last week they defeated Temple 4-3 on Thursday and defending A-10 champion, Richmond, 4-3 on Friday.

On March 22, URI lost to Sacred Heart 5-2 in Kingston, R.I.

"They're pretty good. They aren't Richmond or Temple, but they'll come ready to play," Frey said.

The match in Amherst is a homecoming of sorts for Rams senior Bridgette LaFlamme. LaFlamme hails from neighboring Hadley, Mass. and attended Hopkins Academy. Against Sacred Heart she gained a victory in the No. 5 slot, winning 6-3, 4-6, 10-8.

Over the years, UMass has enjoyed a lot of success against the Rams. Since 1978 the Minutewomen lead the series 29-6-1 with the latest victory coming exactly one year ago today. On March 30, 2004 UMass beat URI in a blowout 7-0.

In that match, juniors Jana Bartolini and Iwanowicz were each able to gain singles victories in straight sets. The pair defeated their opponents 6-0, 6-1 and 6-0, 6-2 respectively.

However, Frey stressed that her team can't take their opponents lightly because of what happened in the past. This is an A-10 match, and they all need to be taken seriously. Frey noted that in her four years as an assistant, this year is the closest she's seen the A-10.

"You have UMass, Richmond, Xavier, Temple and George Washington all atop the conference and any one of them can take it," Frey said.

The Minutewomen will be back in action next Wednesday as they take on Fordham (8-4) at home.

Spiess keeps UM in right direction

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Correspondent

The good news just keeps rolling in for the Massachusetts women's tennis team (10-6 2-0 Atlantic 10).

Following its two big conference wins last week, it was announced earlier this week that UMass sophomore Michele Spiess was named Co-Atlantic 10 Player of the Week and the Dinn Bros./UMass Athlete of the Week. Also, UMass freshman Masha Pozar was named A-10 Rookie of the Week.

"I wasn't surprised to hear, [Spiess and Pozar] deserve it," UMass Assistant Coach Celeste Frey said.

Spiess gained the honors by going 4-0 last week in singles and doubles matches against Temple and Richmond. On Thursday, Spiess defeated her singles opponent 6-3, 0-6, 6-0 and won an epic four-hour match on Friday by a score of 7-6 (8-6), 6-7 (5-7), 6-1.

"Michele is Michele, she had a tough week but she played well and I'm happy for her," Frey said.

Pozar teamed with Spiess to go 2-0 in doubles matches during the two-match road trip. The two cruised to an 8-0 match at No. 2 against Temple and beat Richmond by a count of 8-6.

"Masha played well, the top spot in the lineup can be tough. She came up big in doubles," Frey commented.

The Minutewomen have their first outdoor home match of the spring today as the Rhode Island (3-7 0-1 A-10) comes to Amherst for an A-10 showdown. The match marks the first time the team will be competing outdoors in Amherst this spring.

"Outdoors is whole different game," Frey noted. "You have the wind and weather that you need to watch and try to use to

Red Sox beat down Yanks in spring game

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Boston's pitcher threw a ball behind Alex Rodriguez and no one got upset.

It's only spring training and a matchup between the Red Sox and New York Yankees doesn't necessarily add to the rivalry between the teams.

Rodriguez scrambled out of the way of the first-inning pitch by John Halama, who pitched three innings and picked up the win in Boston's 7-2 victory Tuesday.

"We're great friends," Rodriguez said of Halama. "I just laughed."

Halama, who played with Rodriguez in Seattle, said he was trying to throw the pitch inside but it broke too much.

"I try not to laugh out [on the mound] because I want to try to get him out," Halama said, "but after it was over I came into the dugout and I laughed about it."

It wasn't as peaceful last July 24 when Rodriguez was hit by a pitch by Boston's Bronson Arroyo at Fenway Park. Rodriguez stared and yelled at Arroyo as he started walking toward first base. Catcher Jason Varitek then pushed Rodriguez and the dugouts and bullpens emptied.

There were other differences between the exhibition game, played five days before Boston faces New York at Yankee Stadium on opening day Sunday, and a meaningful matchup.

The Red Sox used only four regular starters and their entire outfield was made up of players not on their 40-man roster. The Yankees started most of their regulars, although first baseman Jason Giambi and second baseman Tony Womack sat out with injuries.

Giambi has minor tightness in his left hamstring and Womack had an MRI that showed no serious damage in his left knee that was hit by a pitch Monday. Both are expected to play Thursday.

"I think both clubs sort of had the same idea about this one," Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "We're so close to the season opening, that's where we're concentrating right now."

The last time the teams met in an important game, the Red Sox won Game 7 of the AL championship series 10-3 to complete a comeback after losing the first three games. Then they swept St. Louis in the World Series.

In the first inning on Tuesday, Rodriguez grounded out before Bernie Williams singled in a run off Halama, who allowed one run and five hits. The Red Sox scored twice in the third and once in the fourth against loser Aaron Small.

They made it 4-1 in the sixth on Mike Lockwood's RBI triple off Tanyon Sturtze then reached Alex Graman for three runs in the seventh.

"We had a lot of young kids play. It was fun. They had a little extra bounce in their step," Boston manager Terry Francona said. "Our veterans got what they needed out of the game and then the young kids came in and played and played well."

Next stop for both teams: Yankee Stadium. This year the Yankees, who have won 26 World Series, will be aiming to knock off the new champions, although Torre doesn't think that gives this year's games between the teams added meaning.

"You play (each other) 19 times and that doesn't guarantee anything because you still go to postseason," he said, "and have to do it all over again and it's a sport that you can't get yourself too tired up for one particular game."

Notes: Five Boston relievers allowed just three hits in the last six innings. ... New York's Paul Quantrill struck out the side in the ninth. ... Boston designated hitter David Ortiz wore No. 79 because his usual No. 34 jersey was left behind in Fort Myers. ... New York had won its previous three games. ... Small, signed to a minor league contract last Jan. 21, allowed three runs on six hits in four innings with three strikeouts and no walks.

Sox reacquire lefty reliever from Cards

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — The Boston Red Sox reacquired reliever Mike Myers from St. Louis on Tuesday, giving them a left-handed specialist who helped them in last year's playoffs.

The Cardinals received two minor leaguers, outfielder Carlos de la Cruz and left-handed pitcher Kevin Ool. The Red Sox designated for assignment righty reliever Anastacio Martinez to make room on their 40-man roster for Myers.

"We talk so much about having an effective pitcher in when the game's on the line," Boston manager Terry Francona said after the Red Sox 7-2 win over the New York Yankees. "For me, having that left-handed matchup guy really, I think, swings the percentages in our favor."

The Red Sox obtained Myers, with an unorthodox sidearm motion, from Seattle last Aug. 6 but didn't re-sign him after they won the World Series. He has held lefties to a .212 batting average during his career and got two big strikeouts in the playoffs.

In Game 2 of the AL division series against the Angels, Boston led 4-3 but Anaheim had a runner on first with no outs in the bottom of the eighth. Myers faced one batter, striking out Garret Anderson, and Boston won 8-3 with four runs in the ninth.

In Game 5 of the AL championship series, with the Yankees up 3-1 in games and tied 4-4 in the 11th, Myers again struck out the only batter he faced, Hideki Matsui leading off the 10th. Boston won 5-4 in 14 innings.

"Mike's also a guy that can go two innings," Francona said, "so it's not a drain on your staff as much as a normal situational lefty is."

He said he probably won't keep 12 pitchers, jeopardizing Byung-Hyun Kim's bid to stay with the team. He's due to make $6 million this year and Boston would like to unload part of that salary.

Myers, 35, pitched in five AL playoff games but was not Boston's roster for the World Series. The Red Sox swept St. Louis in four games for their first championship in 86 years.

He signed a one-year, $600,000 deal with the Cardinals in December. In nine spring training appearances, he had a 2.38 ERA in 11 1-3 innings. He was competing for a spot in the St. Louis bullpen with lefties Bill Pulsipher and Randy Flores. Ray King is expected to be the team's left-handed setup man.

Myers was 1-0 with a 4.20 ERA in 25 regular-season appearances last year for the Red Sox. He was 5-1 with a 4.64 ERA overall and made 75 relief appearances, sixth-most in the AL. He has made more appearances, 671, than any other pitcher in the major leagues since 1996, his first full season.

He also has pitched for Florida, Detroit, Milwaukee, Colorado and Arizona and is 17-21 with 14 saves and a 4.40 ERA in his career.

The Cardinals get de la Cruz, 21, who played for Single-A Lowell last season, hitting .274 with one homer and 15 stolen bases in 237 at bats.

Ool, 24, played in Single-A with Lowell in 2003 and Augusta and Sarasota last year. He is 6-3 with two saves and a 3.71 ERA in 54 relief appearances with those teams.

Schilling on mound for five-inning stint

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) — Curt Schilling rebounded from a shaky beginning and allowed one earned run in five innings for a team of Red Sox minor leaguers against Indianapolis, Pittsburgh's Triple-A team on Tuesday.

Schilling, slowed by his recovery from ankle surgery last November, has pitched in just one major league exhibition game and two minor league contests. He is expected to start the season on the disabled list and be activated to pitch in mid-April.

Boston's ace allowed two runs, five hits and one walk while striking out seven. He threw 69 pitches, 54 of them strikes. From the second inning on, he gave up a single and a walk and struck out six.

"It kind of clicked for me, arm angle-wise," Schilling said. "I threw a ball and knew. It happens every spring at some point, where you make an adjustment and go, 'OK, that's what it was.' And it's always simple stuff.

"From that point on, I felt like I threw the ball much better, consistently."

He's expected to pitch in a minor-league intrasquad game on Saturday, then start the season opener for Triple-A Pawtucket in Indianapolis in April 7 so he can increase the number of pitches he throws. His next start after that could be with Boston, which begins an eight-game homestand on April 11 against the New York Yankees.

"That's the plan right now, to be ready that first homestand," he said.

Tim Wakefield is scheduled to start the home opener on April 11 and, with no game the next day, Schilling could be in line to start April 13, although he and manager Terry Francona haven't specified a date.

Tuesday's outing was his first since he said he "pitched very poorly" against Minnesota last Friday, giving up three runs and five hits in 3 2-3 innings of a 5-1 loss. His only other exhibition outing came four days before that when he threw three innings in a game involving two squads of Boston minor leaguers.

On Tuesday, Schilling gave up back-to-back doubles to former Red Sox player Cesar Crespo and Javier Guzman to start the game. After an error, Jose Leon singled in the second run, which was unearned.

While warming up before the second inning, he threw a fastball that he said felt right.

"One of the things I've been dealing with right now is my fastball and command and movement," Schilling said. "I rely on location."

Williams faces pro questions

By Stu Durantio
Knight Ridder

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — North Carolina coach Roy Williams was at an AAU camp during the summer when a couple dozen high school kids were asked about their chances of skipping college basketball for a paycheck.

Teens being teens, they envisioned themselves running with the pros. Except for Tar Heels freshman Marvin Williams.

The kid from Bremerton, Wash., conceded he wasn't ready to make the jump into the NBA draft. And the Tar Heels freshman forward is sticking with that story, even amid suggestions that he could be a lottery pick.

"I love where I am and I love playing college basketball," Williams said. "I am in the position where I want to just help my team out as much as possible, and I am willing to do whatever I have to do. My mom and my grandma support me, and I'm happy with my decision to play college ball."

Maybe the 6-9 forward will follow the lead of Carolina junior Sean May, a second-team All-American, in opting for another year in college. Maybe he will wait for the results of North Carolina's trip to the Final Four to decide.

Marvin Williams dunks over Oakland's Brandon Cassise.

But what's amazing is that he has stirred such talk without even starting one college game. Williams has embraced his role as a sixth man after arriving in Chapel Hill as one of the top five

Disability access at university needs help

By Meng-Yi Liu
Collegian Correspondent

Disabled students at the University of Massachusetts have to live every day of their lives overcoming many obstacles.

Lisa Shiozaki, a senior who lives in the Northeast residential area, is one of these students. Lacking an elevator, Shiozaki has to climb down stairs with crutches every morning. Between narrow stairs, she has to be cautious of each placement of her crutches, especially when the stairs get slippery from rain or snow. The dorm's heavy door lacks an automatic opener, and is also a problem. When she reaches the ground floor, the only way she can walk out without losing her balance is waiting in front of the door until someone opens it.

Due to the unavailability of Special Transportation services at the time she requires, Shiozaki has to conquer walking down a long steep hill and faces many more barriers before she gets to classroom.

On the main campus, the ongoing library construction adds more troubles for disabled students. The library construction site has divided the campus into two distinct sides. Circling around construction site has made walking distance twice as far.

"I have to leave [the dormitory] a lot earlier before the classes start and it's not easy to walk up and down the hills [around the construction site] with my crutches," said Shiozaki.

Transportation on campus is the major difficulty for disabled students. There are three vans that serve the entire Amherst community while there are more than 10 disabled students attending classes on the huge campus, let alone the temporarily injured students.

"About the van services, it is because of the limited budget," said Madeline Peters, director of the Disability Services Office at UMass. As a state school with extremely limited financial budget, an appeal by UMass to improve the situation for the minority of handicapped students is unlikely to grab attention of the public.

"Most disabled students are accustomed to deal with barriers or just tolerate the inconveniences by themselves," said Peters. "But we are willing to hear any feedback from students."

Peters also said that people should be more caring to disabled students.

"It is hard for people who don't have difficulties to understand the difficulties of disabled students, but I'm sure everyone would have the difficult moments in their lives and need help from other people," she said.

UMass makes last statment on law school

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — University of Massachusetts officials say they'll reduce in-state tuition and step up private fund-raising to win the approval of the Board of Higher Education for a proposed public law school.

The board was scheduled to vote Thursday on UMass' plan to acquire the Southern New England School of Law in Dartmouth and create the state's first public law school. UMass claims it can operate the school at no cost to taxpayers.

Backers and opponents of the law school both lobbied hard Wednesday in hopes of swaying the vote.

John F. O'Brien, dean of the New England School of Law in Boston, wrote to the board saying it would hard for the law school to draw top students without national accreditation, while UMass administrators fine-tuned their sales pitch to respond to board members' concerns.

UMass President Jack Wilson told The Associated Press Wednesday that in-state tuition and fees would be around $16,000

Payano sworn in as SGA President

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

After extensive deliberation, Student Government Association elections were ratified last night and Pavel Payano and Valerie Lewis have been sworn in officially as the next President and Trustee respectively to serve the student body.

The result numbers, which were just recently approved, showed Payano and Lewis winning the positions by nearly double the numbers of runners up Sean Bliss and Craig Goldschmidt. Additionally, nearly 13 percent of the student body voted, setting a record number of voters compared to recent years.

Both Payano and Lewis said that they have immediate goals for the SGA. "We need to immediately tackle the Chancellor's plan," Payano said. "We have to stop it because if it happens it will change the SGA drastically."

In response to the Diversity Commission, Chancellor John V. Lombardi issued a report of necessary recommendations for the University to uphold its commitment to diversity. The report stated that all student groups on campus including Registered Student Organizations, SGA and the Daily Collegian would be overseen by a new vice chancellor who will ensure diversity among these groups. The SGA argues, however, that this recommendation is a "waste of time," and that the university "needs to be more focused on supporting diversity," according to Speaker Mark Morrison.

Pavel Payano and Valerie Louis were sworn in last night as Student Government Association President and Student Trustee.

"The administration is using the diversity commission as a shield to go after student development," Morrison said.

Lewis also added that if these recommendations were to be implemented in the coming weeks, not only would it change SGA, but the entire campus for many years to follow.

"[The report] is a drastic change and plan that would affect the next 30 to 40 years," she said. "we are interesting in having Lombardi agree with President Bustamanic's report."

Native American angry at the 'politically correct'

By Kathryn Sullivan
Collegian Correspondent

That box of cherished Crayola crayons that marked the early years of our childhood may have been teaching us racism. According to angry educators, the color "Indian Red" was insulting to Native Americans. It was consequently changed to "Chestnut" in 1999. The Stanford and Dartmouth "Indians" mascot have been changed to "Cardinals" and "Big Green" and instead of watching the St. John's "Redmen" basketball games, we watch the "Redstorm".

These schools are among over 200 organizations that have changed their mascots to avoid any disrespect for Indian forefathers. Doctor David Yeagley, a scholar and Comanche Indian, who spoke Tuesday night at a UMass Republican Club event, said he would rather see the teams retain their original names and children color with "Indian Red" crayons.

In his speech, Yeagley denounced leftist organizations that support "politically correct" movements and accused them of perpetuating the "you owe me attitude" held by Native American leaders — an attitude he says is not working.

Through University lectures and the Web site FrontPageNews.com, Yeagley is advocating for a stance of strength rather than weakness for his native people.

"I'm trying to revive a different stereotype," he explained to a modest audience of mostly white, college-aged males Tuesday night.

Supported by the Republican party, Yeagley said he urges his people to "stop asking for handouts" and embrace his strong support of American patriotism.

Yeagley's speech criticized the lack of attention paid to the Indian heritage of the shooter in the Red Lake school incident, claiming the media was trying to misrepresent the shooting as a white gun control issue.

Yeagley pointed out that he isn't the only Native American speaking out against the media coverage. Clyde Bellecourt, founder of the American Indian Movement, has complained about to the lack of attention the incident received from the media and President Bush.

"He does not have any problems flying in to restore the feeding tube to Terri Schiavo. I'm sure if this [shooting] happened in some school in Texas and a bunch of white kids were shot down, he would have been there too," Bellecourt said, according to the Washington Post.

However, in his speech Yeagley lashed out against Bellecourt and similar comments from other "leftist trained" Indian leaders.

According to Yeagley, Bellecourt comments that "Indians deserve more sympathy, pity than a helpless, dying woman in a Florida hospice have dragged Indian pride to the lowest it can be drug."

"[These leaders] do not know what it means to be Indian," said Yeagley.

Yeagley isn't a stranger to conflict, and Tuesday night was no exception. The question and answer portion of the evening resulted in the temporary panic of Republican club leaders when an outspoken audience member challenged Yeagley's views on the roots of Indian poverty and alcoholism.

The young man, seated in the front row, went on a tirade about America's mistreatment of Native Americans, criticizing Yeagley for dancing around issues of importance.

"I blame Indians for Indian problems," Yeagley responded. The verbal spar, which lasted for several minutes, was consequently silenced by leaders of the Republican Club. Yeagley said his position as a Native American and patriot has made it difficult for him to negotiate opinions on Americans' mistreatment of his people.

However, he said that no great nation is without.

"If [the] were trying to commit genocide on my people, then I wouldn't still be here," he said.

Jackson accuser boasted about gifts from popstar

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. — The boy who has accused Michael Jackson of molestation proudly showed off an expensive watch the singer gave him and boasted that Jackson would buy him anything, a flight attendant testified Wednesday.

Cynthia Bell said the boy bragged about the watch on a flight with Jackson and members of the boy's family from Miami to California in 2003.

"He was saying things like, 'Look at what Michael got me,' and, 'These are very expensive watches,'" she said. "He did say, Michael bought this watch for me and he'll buy me anything.'"

Prosecutors contend the watch was a bribe to keep the boy from revealing that Jackson gave him alcohol. Defense attorneys contend the boy and his family were out to bilk Jackson and other celebrities. They have portrayed the child-molestation charges as a shakedown attempt.

Bell also testified that she served Jackson wine in a Diet Coke can but did not see his accuser drink from it, as the prosecution says happened.

Federal court rejects latest Schiavo appeal

By Ron Word

PINELLAS PARK, Fla. — With time running out for Terri Schiavo, a federal appeals court Wednesday rejected her parents' latest attempt to get the brain-damaged woman's feeding tube reconnected.

The Atlanta-based 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed to consider an emergency bid by Bob and Mary Schindler for a new hearing in their case, raising a flicker of hope for the parents after a series of setbacks in the case. But the court rejected the bid 15 hours later, the fourth sition of Lombardi's arguing that the recommendation's are not in the best interest of the University's commitment to diversity.

Bustamante told Senators in his last officer report that he felt honored to have served the student body in the past year although he is uncertain what his role may be in the SGA.

"I will have an active role on campus," he said, "the SGA ought to consider some serious reform, the energy here sometimes seems poisonous, bitter and hostile at times; I have mixed feelings."

As for his efforts in his recommendations diversity commission report, he said that he will continue to work for positive change.

Both Payano and Lewis agreed that the SGA is in need of serious reform. "We need to change some things with the way Senate is run," Payano said, "and something just happen."

Specifically, he mentioned the way the Senate committees are currently being run. He scrutinized the titles of the committees emphasizing that many Senators don't know what the "UPOL" committee is, and that a better name would be helpful and beneficial.

Lewis also agreed that, "the SGA needs to change in order to function."

Students were also able to vote on a number of referendum questions. Questions in which students voted overwhelmingly for or against were the following. Ninety-seven percent of voting students voted in favor of RSO's being allowed to cook their own food for their functions. Seventy-four percent of voting students voted that the UMass Police Department should not be allowed to carry guns because of the low crime rate area. Ninety-three percent of voting students voted that RSO should remain solely under student control and not have any influence from the administration. And finally, eighty-two percent of voting students voted that UMass administration actions and policies are not conducive with putting students first.

In addition to President and Trustee, many other students were elected into high-ranking SGA positions that serve all areas of campus.

In Central, the area governor is John Williams, Lit. Governor Lauria Lucien, Treasurer and Secretary Bobby Chase.

In Northeast, the area Governor is Elizabeth Ayers, Lit. Governor Rachel Kaplan, Treasurer Marisa Kanof and Secretary Ashley Toolan.

In Orchard Hill, Area Governor is Andrew Taft, Lit. Governor Marissa Milton, Treasurer John Broduer and Secretary Lindsay Price.

In Southwest, Area Governor is Kraig Moore, Lit. Governor Amy Ciaramitaro, Treasurer Golien Safain and Secretary Lauren Falardeu.

For the Commuters, Area Governer Jeff Napolitano, Lit. Governor Matt Murphy, Treasurer and Secretary Eduardo Bustamante.

Witness says boy was rude

On Tuesday, Bell said it was her idea to serve Jackson wine in soda cans and it became a routine on all of the pop star's flights, because "Michael Jackson is a very private drinker." She said Jackson was a nervous flier who could not stand turbulence.

She testified that the boy was rude and unruly throughout the flight, at one point starting a food fight by throwing mashed potatoes at a sleeping doctor who was traveling with Jackson.

The flight attendant also said the boy had a wide range of unreasonable complaints. "His chicken was warm. 'I want a side of coleslaw. I don't want it on the same plate.' ... He was very demanding throughout the entire flight," she said.

At one point, prosecutor Gordon Auchincloss asked Bell if she saw Jackson cuddling the boy. She said she did not think so but that Jackson had an arm around the boy while listening to music.

UMass law school still getting mixed reviews in the first year. That's down from earlier projections of about $19,000, which would have been the fourth highest in-state tuition among the nation's public law schools.

Board Chairman Stephen P. Tocco said in a hearing last week that $19,000 was "much too high," and told school officials to bring the cost in line with other public law schools in the region.

In-state tuition is about $13,000 at the University of Maine's law school, and $14,000 at the University of Connecticut.

"The goal is to match (tuition) to the surrounding states," Wilson said.

But lowering in-state tuition means nonresidents would pay more.

"But it's not going to be that much larger," he said. "It doesn't have to go up by the same amount."

UMass has also pledged to raise $5 million to help offset the lower tuition, beef up the library, increase financial aid, and cover any shortfalls in enrollment projections — all of which is geared toward gaining national accreditation.

"We've increased the pledge of fund-raising, and we've shown where it would go," Wilson said.

Still, Board of Higher Education member Matthew E. Carlin said he plans to vote against the proposal. "From my standpoint: wrong initiative, wrong place at the wrong time," he said, declining to comment further.

verne in the judicial process, by saying: "In resolving the Schiavo controversy, it is my judgment that, despite sincere and altruistic motivation, the legislative and executive branches of our government have acted in a manner demonstrably at odds with our Founding Fathers' blueprint for the governance of a free people ... our Constitution."

The decision came as Schiavo approached her 13th day without food or water.

To be granted, the parents' request would have needed the support of seven of the court's 12 judges. The court did not disclose the vote breakdown.

Judges Gerald Tjoflat and Charles R. Wilson, the same two judges who issued a dissenting opinion last week when the full court considered the case for the first time, also issued a statement in Wednesday's ruling.

"The relevant question here is whether a rational factfinder could have found by clear and convincing evidence that Mrs. Schiavo would have wanted nutrition and hydration to be withdrawn under these circumstances. The plaintiffs carry a heavy burden, but I do not believe that this question can be determined in this expedited fashion without a hearing on the merits," wrote Tjoflat, who was appointed to the bench by Gerald Ford. Wilson was nominated by former President Clinton.

The Schindlers visited their daughter Wednesday morning at her hospice and urged their supporters to keep trying. "I was pleasantly surprised by what I saw," Bob Schindler said. "So she's still fighting, and we'll keep fighting."

"We know that some of her organs are still functioning. ... It's not too late," he said.

Organ donors may get new safeguards

By Laura Meckler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Hospitals would be required to tell prospective living organ donors of the risks of donating a kidney or a slice of liver under proposed government rules that seek to protect those donors and ensure quality care at transplant centers.

While many living donors suffer no problems, others fight pain after surgery and other complications, and a few die. Hospitals vary widely in what they tell potential donors and how they screen them.

The new rules would require hospitals to spell out the risks. Those that fail to comply could lose Medicare payments, a powerful tool aimed at ensuring that centers are providing quality care and looking out for living donors, whose numbers have soared amid an acute shortage of organs from the dead.

"That's really going to get people's attention," said Rhonda Boone of Burnsville, N.C., whose husband died in 1999 after donating a piece of liver to his half brother. "When you dip into their pocketbooks, they start paying attention."

The proposed regulation touches on a wide set of transplantation issues. Several aspects mirror guidelines already used by the United Network for Organ Sharing, a private group that runs the nation's transplant system under a government contract.

But federal regulations carry more weight. Medicare now pays for more than half of kidney transplants done each year and a smaller portion of other transplants. Beyond that, if Medicare drops a program, private insurance companies sometimes follow suit.

The proposal, which would subject transplant centers to more scrutiny, is getting a mixed reaction. Some say the government has no business trying to judge medical practice; others contend the oversight is overdue.

The Department of Health and Human Services is seeking comments on the regulations, published last month. Officials expect it will be two years before they are put in place.

For hospitals, the biggest change would require organ donor programs to be certified by the government every three years.

British surfer attacked by great white shark

By Clare Nullis
Associated Press

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — A British surfer attacked by a great white shark described Wednesday how he kicked and lashed out wildly to free his leg from the shark's jaws, which sliced his flesh "like a knife through butter."

Chris Sullivan was surfing with friends Monday when the 13-foot shark attacked.

"It came up slow and I saw its eyes and it looked really dark gray," said Sullivan, sitting in a wheelchair at a clinic. "I turned and I saw the underneath of its belly. Then I saw its mouth. Then it grabbed hold of my leg."

"I started lashing out, hitting it. I think I kicked it. I pulled the leg out. It felt like a knife through butter and I thought 'oops,'" said the school teacher who has traveled the world in pursuit of his surfing passion.

Sullivan, 32, said he managed to stay on his surf board and catch a wave back to shore, where a local veterinary surgeon who had also been surfing applied an emergency tourniquet to his leg.

Sullivan needed 200 stitches in his calf.

The attack at Nordhoek on a stunning stretch of beach about 12 miles from Cape Town occurred at the same point where a bodyboarder was killed 18 months ago.

A great white bit off the leg of a teenage surfer one year ago nearby, and a 77-year-old swimmer was eaten by a great white in nearby Fish Hoek last October.

Clive Mortimer, the station commander of the National Sea Rescue Institute, said Sullivan was "extremely lucky" to have escaped alive.

Sullivan dismissed suggestions that sharks deemed to be a threat should be culled.

"I haven't got a problem with the shark," he said. "I was in its water and I was stupid enough to go surfing where there was a lot of sharks."

Volunteers to partrol boarder

By Arthur H. Rotstein
Associated Press

TOMBSTONE, Ariz. — Hundreds of volunteers, some of them armed, are expected to take up positions along the Mexican border Friday and begin patrolling for illegal immigrants.

Organizers of the Minuteman Project said the civilian volunteers, many of whom were recruited over the Internet, will meet first for a rally in this one-time silver mining town, then fan out across 23 miles of the San Pedro Valley to watch the border for a month and report sightings of illegal activity to Border Patrol agents.

Minuteman field operations director Chris Simcox described the project as "the nation's largest neighborhood watch group" and said one of the goals is to make the public aware of how porous the border is.

Jim Gilchrist, a retired accountant from Aliso Viejo, Calif., who organized the project, said that some volunteers will carry handguns, which is allowed under Arizona law, but are being instructed to avoid confrontation, even if shot at.

Law enforcement officials and human rights advocates are worried about the potential for bloodshed.

Critics contend the project may attract anti-immigrant racists and vigilantes looking to confront illegal immigrants. At least one white supremacist group has mentioned the project on its Web site.

"They are domestic terrorists that represent a danger to the country and could promote a major border conflict that will have serious ramifications and consequences," said Armando Navarro, a University of California-Riverside political science professor and coordinator of the National Alliance for Human Rights, made up mostly of Hispanic activists.

Michael Nicley, chief of the U.S. Border Patrol's Tucson sector, said the volunteers are "not the kind of help the Border Patrol is asking for."

Cochise County Sheriff Larry Dever said he fears immigrant smugglers might open fire on the volunteers.

"I wouldn't anticipate that people of that persuasion would act or react any differently to anybody, citizen or law enforcement alike, if they were confronted and felt like their cargo was in jeopardy," he said.

The project's organizers gave assurances the volunteers will be closely monitored. "If it gets to a situation where someone's life is in danger," said David Helppler, Minuteman security coordinator, "I will end the project."

Project organizers said they expect 800 to 1,000 volunteers. How many might actually show is unclear; similar efforts in the past few years flopped. One of them drew only about a half-dozen people.

On Wednesday, the Homeland Security Department announced that it is assigning 534 additional agents to the porous Arizona border to help keep out potential terrorists and illegal immigran

1,000 dead in Indonesian earthquake

By Chris Brummitt
Associated Press

GUNUNG SITOLI, Indonesia — Firefighters freed a man trapped in a crumpled house on remote Nias island on Wednesday, 36 hours after he was buried in rubble. As the first foreign military help arrived, officials said an estimated 1,000 people had died in the region's latest large earthquake.

Residents swarmed over collapsed buildings in Nias island's main town of Gunung Sitoli, searching frantically for survivors of the country's second catastrophe in three months, after December's massive quake and tsunami.

French firefighters from the agency Firefighters Without Borders — who rushed to the island from Aceh province's west coast — used a car jack to free the legs of 25-year-old television repairman Iansen Silalalahi, who had been pinned between a motorbike and a cupboard.

As he was lifted out of the rubble of what was once a three-story building, Silalalahi smiled weakly and gave a thumbs-up.

"People know I was there but it was difficult to reach me. I kept screaming whenever I heard anyone," said Silalalahi, who did not appear to be badly injured. "I feel relief because now I am safe."

The improvised rescue highlighted the crisis situation officials face here: there are thousands of collapsed buildings and no machinery to help search through the rubble for survivors.

The town's hospital was barely functioning: It lacked power or water, and it had no fuel for generators.

"We know there are many people critically injured," said Dr. Norman Peeler, a medical coordinator from the World Health Organization. "It is essential they get treatment, infections spread easily in open wounds."

Two Singaporean military helicopters landed Wednesday and distributed food and water to a frantic crowd of survivors. They also delivered a car, medical supplies, generators and 20 Singaporean troops and medics. A third helicopter was unable to touch down because there were so many survivors at the landing area.

Parts of Banyak island appeared to have sunk by up to 3 feet, leaving some coastal homes inundated with sea water, Aceh province's acting governor said. The good news: Despite previous reports, there were no confirmed deaths on the island, Azwar Abubakar said in televised comments.

Monday's 8.7-magnitude quake struck off Indonesia's Sumatra island, some 75 miles north of Nias. The even-bigger quake that generated the region's devastating tsunami on Dec. 26 hit an area further northwest along the Sumatran coast.

The latest quake initially raised fears of another tsunami and sent people scrambling for high ground in several Indian Ocean countries lashed by December's killer waves, but no big waves materialized.

North Sumatra Gov. Rizal Nurdin estimated that 1,000 people died in the latest disaster, but officials feared the number could climb to 2,000. Bodies were still being discovered in the ruins of houses and shops on Wednesday and laid out in front of churches and mosques.

Looting broke out in at least one location on Nias when men, women and children scrabbled through a two-story store and left with boxes of noodles, clothes and a television set.

"There is no water, electricity or rice. Things are getting tough, we have had no help so what can we do?" asked Marzuki Tanjung, who was not among the looters.

Andi Malarangeng, a spokesman for President Susilo Bambung Yudhoyono, said the president would visit Nias island on Thursday.

Indonesia "welcomes and is open to all kind of assistance, including help from foreign troops, to assist in the disaster zone," Malarangeng told The Associated Press.

Australia and Japan were also planning military relief operations.

Japan said Wednesday it would send an 11-member emergency medical team and $1-40,000 worth of blankets, generators, sleeping pads and tents. Australia dispatched two military transport planes with medical supplies, and diverted a transport ship to the new disaster zone.

U.N. agencies were trying to coordinate deliveries of food, fresh water and medical supplies by helicopter. The agencies have stockpiles of supplies in the region to help feed and care for survivors of the Dec. 26 quake and tsunami, which killed more than 126,000 on Sumatra and left about half a million homeless.

Above, a mother and her two small children rest and recover from their wounds after their home was destroyed by the earthquake.

Laura Bush pays visit to Afghan women

By Deb Riechmann
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Inspired by Afghan women who have boldly shed their burqas after years of Taliban repression, Laura Bush urged more educational opportunities and greater rights for women Wednesday in this war-wrecked nation.

Under heavy security, Mrs. Bush spent just six hours on the ground after flying nearly halfway around the world. U.S. troops manned M-60 rifles at either end of four helicopters that flew the first lady and her entourage to Kabul University.

"We are only a few years removed from the rule of the terrorists, when women were denied education and every basic human right," Mrs. Bush said at a teacher training institute. "That tyranny has been replaced by a young democracy and the power of freedom is on display across Afghanistan.

"We must be mindful though, that democracy is more than just elections. The survival of a free society ultimately depends on the participation of all its citizens, both men and women," she said. "This is possible if institutions like this exist to give women the basic tools they need to contribute fully to society — and the most critical tool of all is an education."

She wore an Afghan scarf on her shoulders as she met with teachers and talked with Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan. Stopping at a bakery, Mrs. Bush filled a box with cookies and paid one dollar.

"Good deal," she said. She paused outside the shop to talk with three young children positioned to receive gifts from Mrs. Bush, who gave them a kaleidoscope and a bookmark.

"This matters much more than hundreds of millions of dollars," Karzai said of Mrs. Bush's visit, although the fragile democracy is heavily dependent on international aid. "Much more."

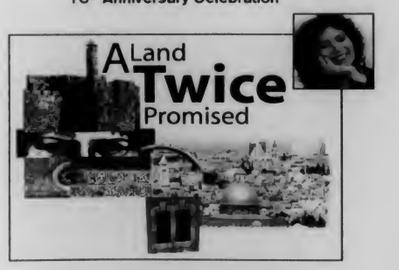
In remarks to U.S. troops after dining with them at Bagram Air Base, Mrs. Bush told them, "Millions of Americans are thinking of you and praying for you every single day and one of them is your commander in chief," she said. She said her day of meetings with Afghans found great appreciation for U.S. efforts.

"Thanks to you, millions of little girls are going to school in this country," she said.

Pope John Paul II to receive feeding tube

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — In another sign of Pope John Paul II's growing frailty, the Vatican said Wednesday that the 84-year-old pontiff was getting nutrition from a tube in his nose and acknowledged his convalescence from throat surgery last month has been "slow."



Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said John Paul was fitted with a nasogastric tube to "improve the calorie intake" and help him recover his strength.

The statement was issued shortly after the pope tried unsuccessfully to speak to the crowds in St. Peter's Square for the second time in a week. After managing just a rasp of his voice, he blessed well-wishers by making the sign of the cross with his hand and withdrew from his window.

A nasogastric tube is common in people requiring supplemental nutrition. The tube is threaded down the nose and throat into the stomach and liquid food is fed through it. While uncomfortable, no sedation or surgery is required. The patient can eat and speak with the tube in place.

Dr. Barbara Paris, director of geriatrics at Maimonides Medical Center in New York City, said the tube might be just a temporary measure to boost John Paul's nutrition during his recovery.

States that require no-fault auto insurance pay highest premiums

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — States like Massachusetts that require no-fault auto insurance have some of the nation's highest premiums, and should change their laws to require insurers of at-fault drivers to pay for accidents, according to a report released in Boston on Tuesday.

"The bottom line is that no-fault is a bonanza for insurance companies. It's a disaster for consumers," said Harvey Rosenfield, an attorney with the nonprofit consumer group sponsoring the report, the California-based Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights.

Most states have standard liability insurance, or what the report called "personal responsibility insurance," in which insurers of drivers found to be at fault in accidents must pay costs for the innocent parties.

Nine states, including Massachusetts, now have mandatory no-fault insurance. The law requires drivers to be compensated by their own insurer, regardless of who caused the accident. During the time covered by the report, there were 10 states with no-fault insurance; Colorado dropped its mandatory no-fault policy in 2003.

Premiums in states with no-fault insurance are 19 percent higher on average than in states with personal responsibility insurance, according to the report. The report also found that rates went up on average 9.8 percent between 1998 and 2002, compared with 5.1 percent in states with personal responsibility insurance.

Massachusetts rates in 2002 averaged $624, making it the third highest in the country. New York, which also has no-fault, had the highest average auto insurance of $741, and New Jersey, which has a mix of no-fault and liability, averaged $659, according to the report.

Rosenfield acknowledged that no-fault insurance is not the sole factor behind rates. Rhode Island, for example, has standard liability insurance with average rates of $610, the fourth highest in the country, while Connecticut was the sixth highest rates of $600.

The report also found that rates fell when states abolished mandatory no-fault insurance, and also recommended stringent industry regulation.

Daniel J. Johnston, president of the Automobile Insurers Bureau of Massachusetts, said there's no consensus that no-fault insurance causes high rates.

Getting teachers to teach

Sanam Hakim

I am sitting in one of my lectures right now and half the room is asleep. I am writing a column and the guy sitting next to me is drawing a picture of a dragon. The teacher, pleased to hear the sound of his own voice, keeps talking, as if nothing is wrong. About three times a semester, we will be tested on these lectures.

However, there are many things wrong with this picture. I will point out three:

My first suggestion is to all the boring professors with lecture halls filled with sleeping students: stop taking attendance. All you are doing is making me wake up early, put my clothes on, walk down the hill, and fall asleep in your class, just so you can put a little checkmark next to my name in your attendance book. I am not walking down the hill to sleep in a hard chair under your supervision; I am there to learn. If you look around and see that students are silent, twisted in an awkward position, with closed eyes or a hand over their faces, chances are pretty good that they are sleeping.

Instead of teaching over sleeping corpses, why don't you make your lesson plans more exciting? Don't talk in a monotone voice, crack a joke or two, use music, and/or let us move around. Too many teachers feel that it is the student's responsibility to pay attention and learn, but it is also the teacher's responsibility to make students stay awake. Taking attendance is a cheap way of making people sit through your class. If your class is interesting, students will show up and actually stay awake through it.

Too many teachers feel that it is the student's responsibility to pay attention and learn, but it is also the teacher's responsibility to make students stay awake.

My second suggestion is to use different methods of teaching to get your point across. Human beings are not designed to sit in a small hard chair and listen to a professor speak for an hour and a half. They are multidimensional and respond to different forms of teaching. This is why people pick different majors. If some students draw better than they read or do math better than they write, I find it hard to believe that all students learn best by listening to a monotone professor.

Teachers need to use something other than written slides to teach a lesson. They need to use personal stories, play videos, do group work, and be organized. There is a reason why some teachers are amazing and make you remember the material, while others make you want to fork out your eyeballs and learn nothing. Part of this is because some teachers test us on material that has no relevance to the course whatsoever.

My first suggestion is to all the boring professors with lecture halls filled with sleeping students: stop taking attendance. All you are doing is making me wake up early, put my clothes on, walk down the hill, and fall asleep in your class, just so you can put a little checkmark next to my name in your attendance book. I am not walking down the hill to sleep in a hard chair under your supervision; I am there to learn. If you look around and see that students are silent, twisted in an awkward position, with closed eyes or a hand over their faces, chances are pretty good that they are sleeping.

My third suggestion is to teach as if you're teaching "teaching." I am personally studying to become a teacher right now and have been learning most from my professors. I have learned how to incorporate personal stories in teaching. I have learned how to sound excited and provoke interest in the subject I am teaching, simply by being excited myself. I have learned how sarcasm in teaching is effective with older students. I have learned what pyramid testing is, and how it actually helps you retain the information you learn. When I am sitting in these classrooms, I am not only learning the subject, I am learning how to teach — which is something that teachers need to remember. They are setting an example for future teachers, not just teaching students a random subject.

Everyone has had teachers: some good, and some bad. I hope that someday, the bad teachers will look around in a lecture hall full of sleeping kids and try to wake them up, test students on relevant material, and try to make the lecture unique and interesting. It's really a shame that it's not like that now, because we're paying a lot of money to go to this school.

The state of the "Uni"

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

I would like to begin this article by congratulating all of the people that worked so hard last week and came out to the Faculty Senate meeting and/or the presentation of the UMass Community Action Plan for implementing the Diversity Commission's recommendations by Eduardo Bustamante and Uri Strauss. The outpouring of student power and ideas has pushed Lombardi into adding "a few extra weeks" to the comment period, as many of the faculty had demanded. While this is not much of a victory, since an additional couple of weeks for commentary on an inherently flawed document means nothing if there are no responses to community input and no actual dialogue with the administration, it did demonstrate that there is power in our united action.

The student body has achieved further gains with the election of Pavel Payano and Valerie Louis as SGA President and Trustee, respectively, and we should use the current momentum to continue to press our case against the onslaught of administrative abuses perpetrated by Lombardi and company.

If you can forgive my optimistic tone, it is essential that we focus not upon the presumed futility of affecting the policies of the current administration, but rather on our ability to achieve something special at this juncture of historical proportions. We need not shy away in embarrassment from the notion of accepting the power that we wield. It seems to many of us a wonderful idea, but an anachronistic one. This should not be the case.
